(By ELBERT D. THOMAS)

When I came to the Senate in 1933, I was appointed to two very important committees, both of which gave me, as a freshman Senator, a remarkable insight into many things connected with our political and industrial life.

I was made a member of the subcommittee that brought to an end what were called the Huey Long hearings in Louisiana. They were in reality hearings on the Overton election. The experience in these hearings resulted in my hearing at first hand many incidents of political life which Americans generally condemn.

Incidentally, at those hearings radio was used for the first time in a Senate hearing and I, myself, believe that from the use of the radio much information was gotten out to the people generally which influenced greatly the acceptance of the report of our committee.

Another committee assignment which resulted in gaining an insight into our industry-laden life in America, was to be made one of a committee of three to hold hearings for the Committee on Education and Labor, to decide whether further hearings were justifiable in regard to the infringement of civil rights in relation to American labor's attempt to organize.

As we made our preliminary report the Committee on Education and Labor decided to continue the hearings and those hearings became what are now known as the La-Follette-Thomas civil liberty hearings. The hearings lasted for nearly 6 years and the committee was kept in existence for that time. It was deemed wise to continue the committee on the theory that a committee in being, to which abuses could be referred, tended toward overcoming those abuses.

I had had experience in troubled industry-labor relations. My biggest experience was in the coal and railway strikes of 1922 when I represented my governor; when the coal mines in Utah were put under martial law.

I learned much from those experiences; much which has caused me to give my best energies and thought to attempting to correct abuses and to advance the cause of the working man and for the benefit of the employer; to clear his fear of the resort to a strike.

Many things have come from the experiences of our Civil Liberty Committee. I do not have to recall for you the efforts which were made by certain employers and employer organizations to prevent labor's right to organize and to stop, if possible, labor and industry from bargaining collectively.

The hearings ran into over 76 big volumes. The strikes reviewed were some of the "sit-down" strikes, the Republic Steel and coal strikes, especially in Harlan County, Ky.

From the hearings came the impetus to present to the Senate the National Labor Relations Act and, in due course, after the National Labor Relations Act became law, to bring into existence what is now known as the Fair Labor Standards Act. The first, to protect labor; the second, to protect the workers in those fields which were not completely organized.

The Fair Labor Standards Act put a ceiling on hours and a floor under wages, and from that act comes now our national theory in regard to labor's rights as to maximum hours of employment and to minimum wages.

To persons whose experience does not go back before 1933, it is hard to understand the great struggles incident to bringing about what we call today "better conditions for working people" and "better mehods for industry." Out of it all has come social security, social security pensions, and now a great series of pension arrangements, private contracts, entered into between employers and employees.

America in 1950, especially in the theory and in the facts of industry-labor relations and labor's rights, is in reality a different country than it was in 1933. And the gains which have been made by labor are gains which have contributed greatly to our higher standard of living, enjoyed by all of the people of our country, and also to our better methods of living and working together.

All problems have not been solved, all problems will not be solved; but more and more the fundamental rights which have grown out of a recognition of man's civil liberties, have all been to the good and no one regrets them as far as Congress and the national laws are concerned.

In 1933 there was a great constitutional question as to whether the Federal Government should get into industry-labor relations. It was argued that that phase of our life was a phase which should be controlled by the separate States alone.

Railway labor had, of course, been recognized as being under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government because of the interstate commerce clause. Labor law in Congress was developed by two committees instead of just by one, as it is today.

All of the railway labor law, for example, was reported by a Labor Committee on Interstate Commerce, while other laws came out of the Committee on Education and Labor.

Now the Senate has seen fit to put all labor with which the Federal Government has to deal in the jurisdiction of but one committee, the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the committee over which I now preside, as I did years ago over the Committee on Education and Labor.

The gains which have been made are great, indeed, but they are merely starters because as labor learns to develop its own resources and as management learns to develop its own resources and as management learns to understand that happy labor conditions develop greater production, and constant labor employment produces greater consumption, much happier communities and much more prosperous stores, trucking firms, manufacturers, and all sorts of business follow.

In the wake of the National Labor Relations Act, Fair Labor Standards Act, Social Security Act, has followed, just as naturally as night follows day, the Full Employment Act.

Before 1933 the philosophy of the American people was pretty much a philosophy based upon the theory that men had to take care of themselves. That is a good philosophy in times that are good, when a man is able to take care of himself, able to get a job, and so forth.

In addition to that we heard that there was plenty of room at the top. That, too, is good philosophy, because no man succeeds in life if he lacks an initiative to do better and if he does not want to become an independent person, have a bank account, own a little bit of property and ultimately a home.

Those are the things that should characterize a real American citizen. The right to have and to hold is a good right, and the notion of being able to say, "this is mine," and to have respect for something which is someone else's, is the basis for our American private property and dollar democracy. We like them both and we want to preserve them, but we are sure that they can be preserved better if we can keep fully employed and if we can keep our country prosperous through full employment.

Therefore, since 1933, despite the fact that many said all that we were going to do was unconstitutional; and despite the fact that these laws have been tested in our courts, they have all been sustained.

We are now working on a new foundation and a new outlook. We have had half a generation with this new foundation and this new outlook and I believe that most of the people of America call what has been done, good. It all has to be developed. It isn't perfect by any means, but we are on the right track and the things which we are doing are based on good law, good economics, and good practice.

I look forward to the future with more firm belief in the basic characteristics of our Government and the full success of American democracy now that we have gotten rid of many of the abuses Americans had to face in the disastrous labor relations before 1933.

I trust that our outlook will be ever forward and that our accomplishments will be ever onward.

Address by Hon. William F. Knowland, of California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of an address I was scheduled to make today before the National Federation of Republican Women's Clubs in Cleveland, Ohio, but which I was unable to deliver because of the importance of the legislation before the Senate. The address has been released and read to the members of the federation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Madam Chairman, members of the National Federation of Republican Women's Clubs, first of all I wish to bring you a hands across the continent greeting from the Republicans of California to those of our other 47 States. I am convinced that the people of California are going to reelect Governor Earl Warren and will send Congressman RICHARD NIXON to the Senate this November.

It is also with a great deal of pleasure that I come to the State of two of my friends and colleagues, ROBERT A. TAFT and JOHN BRICKER.

There is no job which is more important this year than the reelection of BOB TAFT. Wherever political courage and intellectual integrity are admired the service of ROBERT A. TAFT, of Ohio, is acclaimed. Men and women throughout the Nation do not have to agree with him on every issue to know that his retention in the Senate is of great importance to the maintenance of the legislative arm of our Government as an independent legislative body free from political domination or intimidation from either the administration in power or from powerful forces on the outside.

Today I wish to speak frankly about the grave international situation we now face. All Americans, regardless of their partisan affiliation, must put their shoulders to the wheel in order to win the battle of Korea. The success we achieve may determine whether or not we are to have a free world of freemen. One of the reasons why so many people around the world admire Winston Churchill is that during "Britain's darkest hour" he dealt frankly with the people of his country. He treated them as adults and they responded as such, as free people always do if they have confidence in their leadership and their leadership has confidence in them.

Within the last year, two catastrophic events have taken place. These are the Soviet success in atomic development (as announced by the President of the United States, September 23, 1949) and the establishment of the Soviet Communist regime in China.

Only in retrospect will we be able to finally determine which event will have the most far-reaching influence. Both have set off chain reactions that have not yet run their full course.

Fifty years of friendly interest on the part of our Government and our people in a free and independent China and the overwhelming contribution made by our Army, Navy, and Air Force in the Pacific during World War II gave us the opportunity for constructive action no nation had ever before possessed. We could have pioneered in exporting the ideals that inspired men who loved freedom everywhere following our own break away from colonial status.

This opportunity has been largely frittered away by a willful group of men in the Far Eastern Division of the State Department who had the backing of their superiors.

No such bankrupt policy could have been followed without the approval of the Secretary of State and no Secretary of State could have continued such a policy without the support of the President. Under the Constitution there can be no escape from the fact that ultimate responsibility rest there.

Communism is destructive of human liberty everywhere in the world. It is no less destructive in China or Korea than it is in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Latvia, Estonia Lithuania, Hungary, Rumania, or Bulgaria. The pattern may differ slightly.

In Poland the opposition leader, Mikolajcazyk, was forced to flee. In Bulgaria, Petkov was hanged. In Rumania, the king was given a 2-hour ultimatum to change the government regardless of the constitution. In Czechoslovakia, Masaryk's life was forfeited when it became apparent that coalition with communism would not work.

In Europe, we have had a policy, bi-partisan in character, which the Congress and the country could understand.

In the formulation of the United Nations, the creation of the North Atlantic Pact and its implementation, in the development of the Economic Cooperation Administration legislation, Republicans and Democrats contributed to the working out of the policies involved. Basically, our aim was to help in the rehabilitation of a war-torn Europe, to restore strength to their economics and stability to their systems. It was to help the nations of Europe to live as free men in a free world.

There has been a considerable measure of success in our efforts and though some of the nations we seek to help have been slow in carrying their full share of the burden of mutual defense, the objective is a good one and its ultimate success is essential if the free way of life is to continue.

In the Far East there has been no such bi-partisan policy. The Republicans have not been consulted in the major decisions which led to the debacle which has taken place in that area of the world.

Our historic policy in support of a free and independent China (which means a non-Communist China) was first compromised at Yalta. That agreement was a violation of the "open door" policy of John Hay and of Woodrow Wilson's concept of "open covenants openly arrived at."

The Yalta agreement made Soviet domination of Manchuria and other border provinces inevitable. It made possible Chinese Communist domination of the balance of continental China and has opened the door to bringing the entire continent of Asia, with more than a billion people and vast resources into the orbit of international communism.

Following VJ-day, the representatives of our Department of State persistently tried to get the government of the Republic of China to form a coalition with the Communists.

One prominent Chinese official put it to me in Chungking last November in this way: "Senator, there can be no coalition with a tiger unless you are inside the beast."

When the Republic of China refused to take Communists into their government, we placed an embargo against the shipments of any arms or ammunition to the legal government of the country. While during those same months, the Soviet army of occupation, in Manchuria as the result of the Yalta agreement, was turning over to the Communist forces large amounts of captured Japanese war stocks.

The State Department on August 6, 1949, released the China white paper All the blame was placed on the National Government, then with its back to the wall. It was apparently issued with the hope that our own part and share of responsibility might be overlooked.

That the National Government of China made mistakes, has had more than their share of Benedict Arnolds, and men who betrayed their trust needed no underscoring from us in the way and at the time it was done.

Our own history also has examples of men who have betrayed their trust from Cabinet Members down to ward bosses. We have also been plagued with racketeers, highwaymen, and five-percenters at various times.

The basic objective the United States should have kept constantly in mind was to preserve a free, independent, united non-Communist China. In the postwar illness of that nation, we prescribed that the strychnine of communism be taken.

In a very well written article in the January 7 issue of the Saturday Evening Post, Joseph Alsop has this to say about State Department excuses as contained in the China white paper:

"But there is also one carefully concealed defect in the State Department argument. If you have kicked a drowning friend briskly in the face as he sank for the second and third times, you cannot later explain that he was doomed anyway because he was such a bad swimmer.

"The question that must be answered is not whether the Chinese did their best to save themselves, which they most certainly did not, the question is whether we did our best to save China.

"The answer to this question is contained in the strange, still secret inner history of our China policy. And this true history, for which the State Department could find no room in all the 1054 pages of the white paper, may be simply, if grimly, summarized.

"Throughout the fateful years in China, the American representatives there actively favored the Chinese Communists They also contributed to the weakness, both political and military, of the National Government, and in the end they came close to offering China up to the Communists, like a trussed bird on a platter, over 4 years before the eventual Communist triumph."

There are strong indications that our State Department did nothing to discourage the British recognition which was finally given to the Chinese Communists on January 6, 1950.

On August 5, 1949, the State Department, by direction of Secretary Acheson, issued the China white paper, which had been compiled under the direction of Mr. Philip Jessup. At that time, the Republic of China held all of the country south of the Yangtze River. The publication of this document, at the time and in the manner that it was done, was the greatest blow to a friendly power ever given by this Nation. Its effect was to sabotage morale of the non-Communist Chinese, both military and civilian, in a way that international communism, with all its cleverness, had not been able to do. It undid in one ill-considered blow what more than 50 years of friendly interest by this Government and the American people had sought to build.

As long as the non-Communist Republic of China held the southern provinces of their country, there was no way for the Communists of southeast Asia to get resupplied in men and munitions from the Chinese Communist forces of Mao Tse-tung. When south China fell to the Communists, all of southeast Asia was placed in jeopardy. How long are the American people expected to tolerate the same fuzzy thinking that was exemplified by allowing Berlin and Vienna to be islands in a Russian area or territory?

Although the State Department was prepared to let the Republic of China go down the drain in August of 1949, the Congress of the United States was not. When the Arms Implementation Bill passed the Senate on September 23 last year, an amount of $75,000,000 was provided for the general area of China. The amount was arrived at by the combined Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees, based on competent testimony that that sum would be needed in our effort to give effective aid to the Republic of China. Up until the outbreak of hostilities in Korea, not a single penny of this sum had been expended to rearm the forces of the Republic of China on the island of Formosa.

There had been allocations to help other nations in the general area of China. The record is clear that the Congress had provided the authorization of the funds. The responsibility for action or inaction in the supply of arms rests solely with the executive branch of the Government. Up until hostilities broke out in Korea on June 25 of this year, only $200 had been spent out of the approximate $10,000,000 allocated for Korea. The balance was on order or unobligated. For the Republic of China, nothing had been spent or allocated out of the funds provided by the Congress.

For a long time, the Pacific flank of our defenses has been undernourished. In the arms-implementation bill of 1949, providing for $1,314,010,000 less than 8 percent of the amount was provided for the Far East. This amount was placed in the bill over the early and strenuous opposition by the administration, and had this amendment not been placed in the bill by the Congress, the amount of arms implementation aid to the Far East would have been less than 1½ percent of the total—this despite the fact that our responsible commander in the Far East had constantly pointed out over a period of years the dangers inherent in the overwhelming of China by communism and the urgent need for strengthening our defenses in Japan and the Far East.

The Department of State, in its bulletin of June 3, 1945, volume 12, No. 310, had this to say about Formosa:

"Strategic factors greatly influence the problem of Formosa. With the exception of Singapore, no location in the Far East occupies such a controlling position. Formosa is separated from the continent of Asia by 100 miles; from the main island of the Philippines by 200 miles; and from Kyushu, the nearest home island of Japan, by 700 miles. Flying distance from military airports in Formosa is 559 miles to Manila, 410 miles to Canton, 428 miles to Shanghai, 1,290 miles to Tokyo. Formosa, larger than the State of Maryland, stands in a strategic relation to the China coast comparable for the United States to an imaginary island of such size 100 miles off the coast of North Carolina, 400 miles from New York City.

"Every point on the entire coast of China falls within a radius of 1,100 miles. A radius of 2,000 miles includes Burma, Singapore, Borneo, Guam, and Japan, including Hokkaido.

"Formosa has two important ports: Takao and Heelung. The main naval base is located in the Pescadores at Balo, which, in the hands of the Japanese, has been the most important base for Japanese aggression in the Southwest Pacific and for preparation of the present war."

Despite this prior recognition by the State Department itself and despite the fact that our responsible military commander in the Far East had made clear that Formosa's falling into unfriendly hands would jeopardize the defense line of Japan-Okinawa-Philippines, which views were concurred in by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the following amazing and disturbing news story was published on January 3, 1950:

"TOKYO.—The United States State Department has notified its attachés that the loss of Formosa, island redoubt of the Chinese Nationalists, to the Communists was to be anticipated."

"The Department said the public must be sold on the idea that the island is of no strategic value in order to prevent the loss of prestige at home and abroad.

"A document containing the Department's instructions on how to erase the false impressions of those pro-Nationalists interested in a save-Formosa drive has been circulated here, it can be disclosed today.

"The document was prepared by the State Department's Public Affairs Area Policy Advisory Staff, and was dated December 23. The word was sent to members of the Department and of some other Government offices.

"The document said there are pro-Nationalists [principally in the United States] who consider Formosa a redoubt in which the Government could survive, and who tend to create an impression that the United States is delinquent if it fails to save Formosa.

"It said there are groups in the United States 'who are inclined to be critical of the United States for failure to act to prevent the loss of the island to the Communists.' This is 'largely because of a mistaken popular conception of its strategic importance to United States defense in the Pacific.'"

It is apparent that the Secretary of State on December 23, 1949, had determined to write off Formosa in the same way that the China white paper had attempted to write off the mainland of China.

It was State Department policy to prepare the American public for the movement of international communism off the Asiatic land mass out into the Pacific Ocean. This despite the fact that the State Department and the President had military advice to the contrary which showed that Formosa in unfriendly hands—there can be no doubt that the control by Communist forces would be unfriendly hands—would be detrimental to the security of this Nation.

Yet, this continued to be the stated policy of the President and the State Department until after the overt aggression against Korea on June 24 our time, June 25 Korea time.

The text of the President's statement of June 27 contains the following language:

"In these circumstances the occupation of Formosa by Communist forces would be a direct threat to the security of the Pacific area and to United States forces performing their lawful and necessary functions in that area.

"Accordingly I have ordered the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa.

"As a corollary of this action, I am calling upon the Chinese Government on Formosa to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland. The Seventh Fleet will see that this is done. The determination of the future status of Formosa must await the restoration of security in the Pacific, a peace settlement with Japan, or consideration by the United Nations."

Members of Congress, as well as the public, have been disturbed by the obvious movements that were being made both before and since the Korean invasion to accept the Communist regime of China as a permanent member of the Security Council. This has been one of the Russian demands. In order to force her views upon the other members of the United Nations the Soviet Union walked out of the deliberations of the Security Council and the other United Nations agencies in an attempt to force the Soviet will on other member states. The Soviet Union continued its walk-out in the Security Council until, under the utterly unrealistic alphabetical rotation system, the Soviet's turn to preside arrived on August 1 at a critical point in the world's history.

The Soviet Union ordered their delegate back to the Security Council in order to preside so that he could obstruct the action of the law-abiding nations in resisting overt aggression. So that the Soviet Union and international communism would have a propaganda sounding board; in order to attempt once again to force the seating of the Communist regime of China in place of the representative of the Republic of China. In addition, the Soviet Union may be preparing for aggression elsewhere and may want to be in position to veto Security Council action.

Yet with the clear record before us that appeasement is but surrender on the installment plan, the State Department has continued to take a weak attitude—in regard to the question of the representation of China in the United Nations.

At this very moment our position is that while our own representative will vote against the unseating of the representative of the Republic of China and the subsequent seating of the Communist representative, we will not make any all-out attempt to influence others to support our position and we will not use our veto.

What is needed now more than anything else is a clarification of the issues.

As to China, we should make it clear that we have no intention of recognizing the Communist regime in that country.

It is equally important that we support the representative of the Republic of China in the United Nations.

The Government of the Republic is temporarily on the island of Formosa. The Government of the Republic is friendly to the United States and is a strong supporter of the Charter of the United Nations, and the action taken by the Security Council against the Communist aggression in Korea. The Republic of China's representative has voted 100 percent for effective United Nations action in Korea, and has consistently opposed the obstructionist tactics of Malik, the Soviet representative. The Republic of China was the first nation outside of the United States to offer ground troops and to date has offered the largest number, some 30,000. The fact that we have not accepted the offer does not lessen this substantial support for collective security against aggression.

Under the United Nations Charter seven votes are required to pass a resolution. Had it not been for the vote of the Republic of China on the Security Council the prompt United Nations action which was so vital to success would have been delayed at a time when 1 day might have been the difference between ultimate victory and defeat.

Is all this to be ignored to give Malik and the Soviet Union another obstructionist on the Security Council? Under the rotation system, will Mao Tse-tung as well as Stalin have a saboteur at the very heart of the world's collective security system? Instead of one arsonist heading the fire department, are we to double the number?

On August 7, at Peterborough, N. H., Owen Lattimore said that a Communist China delegation should be seated in the United Nations. Does this far-eastern expert still advise our State Department? Do we check communism in Asia by surrendering to it?

In contrast to the support given to the UN Korean position by the Republic of China let us examine the record of India. I have a high regard for Nehru and wish the people of that great country well in the multitudinous problems they face. Let us look at the facts.

India, on December 30, 1949, recognized the Communist regime as the government of China. It was the first large power to give Mao Tse-tung such prestige.

There have been a number of crucial votes in the Security Council since the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. These were:

First, June 25, 1950, called for immediate cessation of hostilities, for North Korean forces to immediately withdraw north of the thirty-eighth parallel, and for members of the United Nations to support the world organization and to refrain from giving assistance to the Communist North Korean aggressors. The vote was 9 to 0, with the Soviet Union absent and Yugoslavia abstaining. Those voting for the first resolution were: The United States, Great Britain, France, the Republic of China, India, Egypt, Ecuador, Cuba, and Norway.

Second, June 27, 1950, resolution called for member states of United Nations to oppose aggression in Korea. The vote was 7 to 1. The Soviet Union was absent. India and Egypt abstained. Yugoslavia voted in opposition. The minimum majority needed in order for the resolution to pass on this date was furnished by the United States, Great Britain, France, the Republic of China, Ecuador, Cuba, and Norway.

Third, August 1, 1950, Soviet Representative Malik returned to the Security Council as presiding officer under rotation system. He ruled that the representative of the Republic of China did not represent China and could not take part in deliberations. Malik was overruled by a vote of 8 to 3.

For Malik's ruling: Soviet Union, India, and Yugoslavia. Against his ruling: The United States, Great Britain, France, the Republic of China, Ecuador, Egypt, Cuba, and Norway.

Fourth, August 3, 1950, Malik resolution to place American resolution against Korean aggression in last place on the agenda. Vote was 7 to 2 against Malik. Egypt and Yugoslavia abstained. For Malik's ruling were the Soviet Union and India. Against his ruling were the United States, Great Britain, France, the Republic of China, Ecuador, Cuba, and Norway.

Fifth, the second vote on this date was to place the complaint of aggression upon the Republic of Korea at the top of the agenda.

The vote was 8 to 1. On this vote India and Yugoslavia abstained. The Soviet Union voted "no." Voting in favor of this action were the United States, Great Britain, France, the Republic of China, Ecuador, Cuba, Egypt, and Norway.

Sixth, the third vote was to remove from the agenda the Soviet Union's proposal to discuss the admission of Communist China. The vote was 5 to 5, with Egypt abstaining. Supporting the Malik position were the Soviet Union, India, Yugoslavia, Great Britain, and Norway. Opposing the Soviet position were the United States, France, the Republic of China, Cuba, and Ecuador.

Seventh, the fourth and final vote on this day was on the Soviet propaganda resolution entitled "Peaceful settlement of the Korean question."

The vote was 7 to 3 against. Yugoslavia abstained. For the Soviet resolution were the Soviet Union, India, and Egypt. Against were the United States, France, the Republic of China, Cuba, Ecuador, Great Britain, and Norway.

Mr. President, the record clearly shows that on seven crucial votes since the Korean invasion India has voted with the free nations on the roll call once, has abstained twice, and has voted with the Soviet Union four times. I submit that this is not a good batting average. To the contrary, the Republic of China has voted with the free nations of the world 100 percent of the time.

International communism will not be stopped in Europe, in the Far East, in the Middle East, or at the gates of India by passive resistance; nor will the appeasement of the Soviet Union in the United Nations at the expense of the Republic of China assure the peace any more than did Munich. As I have said before, appeasement, then and now, is but surrender on the installment plan.

Yet, despite the mounting evidence of the fact that we are dealing with a potential twentieth-century Genghis Khan, there are those who would put off until another day the facing of the realities of the present.

Our Pacific flank is no less vital to our security than is the European flank to ourselves and our North Atlantic allies. They must recognize that what jeopardizes our national security weakens them as well.

It is never profitable to abandon your friends to please your enemies when the record is clear that your enemies have announced that your world and theirs cannot exist on the same planet. It is no more profitable to do it, in my opinion, to kowtow the fence straddlers who by attempting to please both sides generally end up by pleasing neither.

Now is the time for the President of the United States, in my judgment, to make clear to the free people of the world that while the Soviet stockpile of atomic weapons can do considerable damage today, their potential will be catastrophic 2 or 3 years from now.

We should not delay in giving the defenders of Formosa the tools with which to defend themselves, because, as we have pointed out before today, it is the judgment of our responsible commanders that if the island of Formosa falls into unfriendly hands--and Communist hands are unfriendly—it breaks the American defense position from Japan to Okinawa to the Philippines and throws the defense of the United States back on the Coast States, California, Oregon, and Washington, with perhaps a triangle at Hawaii.

It was the lack of such equipment in the hands of the Republic of Korea which encouraged the aggression by the Communist forces.

The mistake of too little and too late which we saw in Korea, should not be repeated on the island of Formosa.

We should make it clear that the choice of widening the conflict is in their hands and not in ours. We want no war but we will not shirk from accepting it if that be the choice of the Soviet Union directly or through its satellites in Asia or in Europe.

We are determined to restore the moral leadership we lost at Yalta and, to that end, in view of the Soviet violations of their agreements we should forthwith denounce that product of the Crimean Conference of 1945.

My reason for stressing Yalta is that it seems to me that it was at Yalta that we abandoned our moral leadership of the world. We surrendered to the Soviet Government things which were not ours to surrender. In effect we betrayed a wartime ally, the Republic of China, which had been a long-time friend and ally of the United States. In effect we did much to permit Poland to go behind the iron curtain, and it will perhaps be a long time before they will see freedom again. It seems to me that is the starting point for us to reassert our moral leadership by denouncing the Yalta agreement.

It should be made clear that aggression is not profitable and the forces of the United Nations will clear not only all the areas south of the thirty-eighth parallel of Communist aggressors but that the combined forces of law and order will redeem the pledges of the great powers made at the Cairo Conference and subsequent conferences, and the United Nations that all of Korea will be free and independent. To that end the United Nations forces should occupy Korea clear up to the Manchurian border and will stay there until free and democratic elections can be held in all parts of the Republic of Korea and internal security provided Any other potential aggressor will be on notice.

Let us stop allowing the agent of the Kremlin to stay in a position where he can sabotage and obstruct the first, and perhaps last, chance the world has had for the law-abiding nations to protect themselves from overt aggression.

When peace has finally been established under a system of international law and order, let us, as Americans, determine to follow the Theodore Roosevelt doctrine of "speak softly and carry a big stick" rather than later concepts of speaking loudly while carrying a feather duster.

Had the United States Congress or the American people known about the betrayal of China at Yalta I do not believe they would have sanctioned that agreement; had they been informed of the Wedemeyer report of September 19, 1947 on China, I believe that they would have insisted that steps be taken to prevent that vast and important country from going behind the iron curtain; of historic interest is the fact that this 1947 report was not made available to either the Congress or the American people until the China white paper was published on August 5, 1949, almost 2 years later; if the Wedemeyer report on Korea, made at the same time as the one on China had been made available the Congress and the country would have insisted that steps be taken to augment the constabulary force we provided for the Republic of Korea.

Copies of this report have not been released even though they have been requested by Members of the Senate. The climax of this whole effort to suppress the facts and to bolster the State Department's bankrupt policy in China came to a head last Monday when the administration "gagged" Gen. Douglas MacArthur relative to his views on the importance of Formosa.

Action by the administration in directing General MacArthur to withdraw his message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars relative to the importance of Formosa strongly indicates that Secretary of State Acheson and Trygve Lie, Secretary General of the United Nations, are now preparing for another Munich, with the Republic of China and the island of Formosa as the pawns.

For the past several years our responsible military men have been required by the administration to support budget requests before the Congress which their professional training warned them were not adequate to the safety of this Nation.

Now once again the administration is "gagging" a patriotic soldier who sees the danger facing our Nation in the Far East and wants to warn our people before it is too late.

It now appears that the only way in which the truth will be known is for the American people to elect a Congress that will make some real investigations without fear or favor and will be prepared to recommend impeachment proceedings where the facts justify.

It is now obvious that those who have a vested interest in our past mistakes and bankrupt far eastern policy intend to pursue their way as far as they are allowed to by the Congress and the citizens of this country. A solemn referendum by the American people on our Far Eastern policy—past, present, and future—is now an urgent necessity

This Congress must provide whatever is necessary in the way of economic legislation or military appropriations. But when, to quote the Declaration of Independence, "with a firm reliance on the protection of divine providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor" to bring this effort to a successful conclusion, let us also determine that never again will we permit our diplomats to lose what our fighting men have won.

Program for the Physically Handicapped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by William A. Boyle, president of district 27 of the United Mine Workers of America and assistant to President John L. Lewis, of the United Mine Workers of America, at the fifth biennial convention of the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, in the Statler Hotel, Washington, D. C., on August 30, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

UMWA LEADER CALLS FOR IMPROVED PROGRAM FOR PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, members of this great humanitarian organization, the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, it is, indeed, an honor and privilege to have the opportunity to appear here today representing the United Mine Workers of America. I extend to you the warm and fraternal greetings of our international President John L Lewis, Vice President Thomas Kennedy, and Secretary-Treasurer John Owens, and the membership of our great union.

The United Mine Workers of America, like you, have experienced the problems, the fears, and heartaches that confront the physically handicapped, and, therefore, pay tribute to your worthy purposes and splendid accomplishments.

The coal industry is the basic industry of the American economy and the industry upon which every sector of our economy is dependent. As you know, coal mining has long been recognized as the most hazardous occupation with the highest toll of deaths and accidents, occupational sickness, and disease of any group of workers in the Nation.

It long ago became apparent that only through collective action could the coal miners of America curtail the number of deaths and accidents in the mining industry and better the lot of the workers. As a result of a bitter struggle with all odds against them, the coal miners finally succeeded in organizing themselves into a strong and aggressive union, which is now 60 years old, and is dedicated to the one objective of serving its membership

The United Mine Workers pays special tribute to the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped. You have faced your problems with a constructive program. You have not given up hope and, instead, tackled your problems in the good old American way. You did what the mine workers did. You went out and organized yourselves.

The mine workers know your problems. We know that there are 28,000,000 American citizens who are physically handicapped. We know that included in this vast group are thousands upon thousands of coal miners.

I want at this point to pay special honor to Mr. Paul A. Strachan, your able president, who despite his own handicap, has persevered in his determination to bring justice, opportunity, and equal rights to all those with physical impairments.

Since you were founded 9 years ago you have done, through your organized efforts—and only through your organized efforts, as a voluntary association of human beings—what would have been impossible to accomplish working as individuals.

I have learned from your president and from reading your dynamic and persuasive literature of the improved conditions and benefits that have accrued to you through your united efforts.

You have succeeded in bringing to the attention of the American people the one all-important fact: A physically handicapped person is able and willing to work and he is a good reliable worker.

This is an undeniable fact proven by statistics. Employers all over this great Nation of ours are being convinced of this fact as a result of the untiring work of your organization. Your job has only begun but you have already helped to overcome the prejudice that exists in the minds of many employers. This prejudice was, to a great extent, based on what the employers regarded as a practical business viewpoint and an ignorance of the fact that physically handicapped persons were good workers.

From our own long and bitter struggle, the United Mine Workers know what prejudice and misunderstanding can mean. We know that the endless task of bringing better lives to our members can sometimes seem hopeless. But through organization we are fighting just as you physically handicapped are battling for improved conditions.

The efforts of your organization are particularly noteworthy insofar as you have succeeded in causing the United States Congress and the President to declare that the employment of the physically handicapped, rather than charity to them, is a matter of public policy.

You have succeeded in directing the attention of the American public to your problems.

The mine workers' organization has been in the front lines in all the battles for social advancement down through the years. They have been in the forefront not only in behalf of their own membership; but by their very leadership, they have been the shock troops in the cause of a better life for all Americans who work for a living.

We are intensely proud of our accomplishments in the welfare field in the past few years.

To quote our president, John L. Lewis, "There was a time, as a matter of fact for some hundred of years, both in our country and in Europe, when little attention was paid to the social welfare requirements affecting the coal mines."

Mr. Lewis has noted that "during all this period, the productive years of the coal miners were utilized until their energy and life blood was taken by the industry."

"While they became disabled through the illnesses incident to their calling or the hazards of their occupations or from the ravages of old age, their services were dispensed with, their income cut off, and they could live or die according to the circumstances which attended them."

Hundreds of thousands of coal miners have died premature deaths by violence in the mines, or from injuries, sickness, and maiming as a result of underground accidents.

Those who were able to eke out a bare existence did so under circumstances of appalling poverty and tragedy.

Who was to take responsibility for these men? Society seemed content to accept their services and the products of their labor and forget the obligations they owed these men.

The coal operators gave lip service to the promotion of safety, but then maintained it was not their responsibility to care for the sick and injured. These men were no longer employees of the industry, the coal operators said.

These conditions did not change until the United Mine Workers of America, through aggressive organization, became strong enough to compel some attention to these problems. One of the great advances pioneered by our union was in 1946, when the first welfare and retirement fund was established by contract by the United Mine Workers.

Just as your promotion of National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week was a declaration of principle and public policy, so was the establishment of the first miners' welfare fund a declaration of principle and policy.

The 1946 wage agreement between the union and the United States Government which was then in legal control of the coal mines, stated in unequivocal language that the employers in the coal industry owed an obligation to the men who go down into the pits.

The principle, stated in simple human terms, was that the coal miners no longer may be used up, crippled beyond repair, and then thrown on a human scrap heap to live or die subject to the charity of the community or the inadequate contributions of the State.

In one of the most important statements of policy ever made by our organization, President Lewis said:

"The United Mine Workers of America has assumed over the years that the cost of caring for the human equity in the coal industry is inherently as valid as the cost of replacement of mining machinery, or the cost of paying taxes, or the cost of paying interest indebtedness, or the cost of any other factor incident to the production of a ton of coal for consumers' bins."

In your work in behalf of the physically handicapped, we could extend that principle to apply to all disabled persons. In other words, as a matter of basic American philosophy, industry has an obligation to all the people of this great country of ours. By the fact that the American people encourage industry to prosper under our free-enterprise system, so in turn American industry has a basic social obligation to all the American people. That obligation most certainly extends to the physically handicapped. And through the good works of your organization, American industry is beginning to realize this obligation.

Your organization has adopted this principle through your promotion of National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week. You are promoting the principle that physically handicapped persons do not want to and must not become community liabilities and social burdens. You do not want to be charges of the state.

You know that productive work is the best therapy for a handicapped person. American industry must realize that productive work for all the people is this Nation's best insurance against communism or any other form of statism.

In the traditional American way, the Government must aid and encourage. In the case of the handicapped, the Government has the obligation of giving practical and adequate aid to rehibilitation.

The United Mine Workers of America welfare and retirement fund cannot be expected to assume the whole burden of rehabilitation. Our fund can and does care for the medical, health, and hospitalization needs of injured coal miners. It takes care of much of the tremendous financial burden that suddenly descends on these disabled men.

But then it is the duty and obligation of the Government to provide an adequate rehabilitation program. This program must be designed to train the disabled for new and productive jobs that they are capable of handling. A paraplegic coal miner obviously cannot work in the mines again. But he can work. Unless he is to become a burden on society, he must be trained and given the opportunity to work.

There is, however, opposition to the attainment of this objective of rehabilitation and productive work for the disabled. There are those who claim that such a program will mean a heavier tax burden and that the increased taxes will curtail business.

This contention has no economic basis. Certainly, an adequate rehabilitation program, with the Federal Government, the States, industry and business, the labor movement and such groups as yours working together, will cost money. But it has been proved statistically time and time again that over the years a disabled worker, who has been rehabilitated and engages in productive work, returns to the economic system many times over the cost of his rehabilitation.

We know that there is not enough money or sufficient personnel, at the present time, to do the job that must be done. We know workmen's compensation and rehabilitation legislation is inadequate both from the standpoint of benefits and from the basic approach of this legislation to the whole problem we are discussing.

We must first raise the necessary money and the additional required personnel and then, most important of all, endeavor to coordinate workmen's compensation and rehabilitation.

Although the workmen's compensation benefits are assumed to be adequate, little is gained if the disabled person receiving compensation remains a charge of the community. We must then rehabilitate that disabled person, teach him a new and productive job, and then assist him in getting a job. He will do the rest. He will do a good job. He will produce. He will become a whole human being and an asset to society again.

This is the goal for which your organization must strive. It will not be an easy task to accomplish. We will be confronted with many obstacles as well as selfish motives and misunderstanding. But through the cooperative efforts of the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped and the United Mine Workers of America and other groups who are vitally interested in the problems of the physically handicapped, we shall accomplish our objective.

Although I have told you something of the welfare and retirement fund of the United Mine Workers of America, I would like to state further that the fund was first established by a contract between the Federal Government and the union. This was because the coal operators in contract negotiations of 1945 and 1946 absolutely refused to accept the basic principle that industry owes an obligation to its employees. After prolonged negotiations, the members of the United Mine Workers of America took the only step open to union men who face a stone wall of resistance. The coal miners laid down their tools and left the pits. The coal operators continued their resistance to our humane proposals. The Government then intervened and the union sat down at the bargaining table with the Government and the matter was settled insofar as the basic principle was concerned.

We had just begun to fight. We had succeeded in formulating the basic principle but the problem of implementing the principle had yet to be solved. The following year in 1947 the welfare fund was still being hamstrung by technicalities, with opposition of the operators and the legal mumbo-jumbo of their corps of high-priced lawyers, the union again bargained with the operators on the matter of a welfare fund. Let me say that it was not an easy fight. We persevered and were victorious. Finally in the 1947 National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement, we succeeded in getting the coal operators to accept the basic principle of the welfare fund. They agreed to pay into the fund a sum of 10 cents on each ton of bituminous coal mined. The agreement with the Government had provided for only 5 cents a ton which was insufficient to satisfy the financial obligations coincident to the alleviation of the distress and suffering of the coal miners. But 5 cents was better than nothing.

In 1948 the mine workers again triumphed and the operators agreed to pay a sum of 20 cents a ton into the welfare fund. At the present time a 10 months' battle that started in May 1949 and ended March 1950, we are for the first time since the welfare fund was established in 1946, in a relatively stabilized position. We receive 30 cents a ton for each ton of coal mined, and we now engage in the tremendous task of caring for the aged, the sick, the disabled, and the injured of America's basic industry.

Thus, just as it will be a problem to inaugurate the program of compensation and rehabilitation, it was also a problem to obtain our welfare fund. First the principle has to be established and secondly, the means of financing the program must be devised.

Under the new wage agreement the United Mine Workers have resumed payments of pension to aged coal miners. We have resumed our medical, health, and hospitalization program to care for the disabled victims of this most hazardous of all industries.

Briefly, this is the administrative set-up of our program: The welfare fund is under the supervision of a three-man board of trustees consisting of Mr. Lewis, chairman and representative of the union, Mr. Charles Owen, who represents the coal operators, and Miss Josephine Roche, director of the fund and the third trustee.

Under Miss Roche's direction the various services of the fund, such as pension service and the medical, health, and hospitalization service are once again working on the human problems of the coal industry.

The medical, health, and hospitalization service has 10 area medical offices situated in strategic cities in the more than 25 coal-mining States in America. The chief medical officer and the man in charge of these 10 offices is Dr. Warren Draper, former Deputy Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, and a major general in World War II in charge of the public-health branch at Allied headquarters in Europe.

Each of these ten area medical offices of the welfare fund is under the direction of a doctor especially trained in public health work. It is his duty to see that the medical, health, and hospitalization work of the welfare fund functions smoothly and effectively in his geographic area.

The fund does not employ its own doctors nor does it have its own hospitals. On these matters the area medical officer works in cooperation with local doctors, medical societies and hospitals.

The local unions of the United Mine Workers of America serve as the local representatives or agents of the welfare fund. That is to say, the locals have their own welfare officers who are employed full time in the mines. These local union welfare officers handle the routine work of accepting and processing applications for aid from the welfare fund. This assures an expeditious manner of assuring proper care for disabled and injured brothers. Incidentally, because the members of the local unions perform this work on a voluntary basis, the fund has been able to keep its administrative costs at a minimum. The money is used for what it was intended—to care for the sick and the aged and injured of the coal industry.

The fund makes arrangements with hospitals throughout the United States to care for the specialized needs of such victims of the industry as the paraplegics, and those suffering from arthritis and silicosis.

I might point out right here that the medical program for silicotic coal miners in the anthracite, or hard coal fields of eastern Pennsylvania, has, for the first time, given the medical profession the opportunity and the money to carry on adequte research for treatment and cure of the hard coal miners' crippling disease—anthracosilicosis or miner's asthma. The anthracite health and welfare fund, a companion fund to the bituminous coal miners' welfare and retirement fund, has allocated well over a half million dollars for this work.

Twenty-five percent of the anthracite coal miners of this country are victims of this disease. No cure has yet been discovered, but we have a treatment that enables these men to continue working at productive jobs, instead of slowly choking to death from the effects of the silica rock with which they must come in contact each day of their working lives.

Even in the light of the development of these terrific advances in medical treatment which were fostered by the United Mine Workers of America, there is considerable progress to be made. From 1930—just 20 years ago—to 1947, 23,295 men lost their lives in coal-mine accidents. And the appalling total of 1,145,786 men were injured. The odds that a coal miner will survive his occupation are horrifying, for the record clearly reveals that every man who works in a coal mine will be statistically killed or injured every 6 years.

Just a month or two ago the Federal Bureau of Mines reported that only 23 of the Nation's coal mines were found free last year of violations of the Federal Mine Safety Code—23 mines out of 7,000 coal mines operating in America.

The fight for mine safety is a never-ending battle that the union must wage. We have repeatedly advocated the passage of Federal legislation which would give the Federal inspectors enforcement powers, that is, legislation that would make coal operators liable for conditions in their mines. The United Mine Workers has not succeeded completely in the passage of Federal legislation. However, we will continue to concentrate on this fight and, even when we succeed, in the passage of legislation, we will continue to fight for its enforcement.

Meanwhile, through cooperation with such groups as the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, the United Mine Workers of America will continue its struggle for the assurance of adequate care for not only the disabled in its own ranks but all disabled and physically handicapped persons.

I think it's time that we reminded the Congress of its own position on this matter.

Let me quote to you the official position of the Seventy-eighth Congress in the Senate and House committee reports which preceded enactment of the Barden-La Follette amendments to the Vocational Rehabilitation Act of 1920.

This is what the Congress said and it certainly fits right in with our position:

"From the long-range point of view there is no question but that the problem of disability is a problem which can be met only by large expenditures of public money. The very fact that a person who is normally a breadwinner is disabled often raises a relief problem as to him and his dependents.

"From the viewpoint of both Federal and State treasuries, and of the disabled persons themselves, experience has demonstrated that the best as well as the most economical approach for meeting the situation is an appropriate program of vocational rehabilitation.

"Where a disabled person may be made fit for employment, through rehabilitation, and become a tax producer rather than a tax consumer, it would seem poor economy to deny him these necessary services. This is the dollars-and-cents justification of the program."

So let's make our next goal the achievement of a coordinated compensation and rehabilitation program for all physically handicapped Americans.

Expansion of Overseas Educational Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, about a week ago, in response to a radio broadcast I had made concerning the Voice of America, I received a letter from Mr. Carl K. Dellmuth, of Harrisburg, Pa. This letter, Mr. President, not only expresses wholehearted approval and support for a louder Voice of America, but also outlines in considerable detail methods by which more effective use can be made of the program. Mr. Dellmuth has traveled extensively in Europe and his thoughts about this very vital program come from actual experience with peoples of other nations.

After reading the letter I believed that it should be inserted into the Appendix of the RECORD, and I asked Mr. Dellmuth's permission to do so. This permission has been granted, and I now ask unanimous consent that this very fine letter be printed in the Appendix of today's RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA BANKERS ASSOCIATION,
Harrisburg, Pa., August 22, 1950.

Senator FRANCIS J. MYERS,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MYERS: May I take this opportunity of supporting your recent utterances on the need for expanding our overseas educational program through the Voice of America. Nothing in my judgment could be a more timely project at this moment of unbelievable international misunderstanding. In fact we should have measured the problem more accurately years ago.

Last summer I returned home after a year of overseas travel with my family during which period we lived and visited in parts of 17 countries on five continents. As a consequence we harbor certain definite feelings on this subject, a few of which I would like to record for what they may be worth to those of you who are guiding the destiny of this gigantic project.

1. Do you agree that the label educational program carries a more palatable connotation than propaganda or psychological warfare?

2. The anti-Communist approach, however plausible, seems defensive in character. Let us not forget the pro-American angle to our story. Thus like a good football team a good offense becomes our best defense. We must sell America with an even greater force than we expose the weakness of communism.

3. Aim the educational efforts at the man on the street. So far we have touched scarcely more than the top brass.

4. Don't forget to further interpret America to our nominal allies. In the present struggle of ideologies those nations who choose to follow our leadership must first comprehend the American way of life. Without this understanding and respect their support will be superficial and restrained rather than sincere and enthusiastic.

5. In a material way we are the richest of all nations. Wealth seldom breeds respect. It often leads to jealousy. Merely to say or to imply that we are rich is to overlook the more engaging fact of how we have acquired our riches.

6. Let us try to correct the prevalent overseas impression that most Americans are gangsters, Hollywood artists, or millionaires. Project the American story from "Crossroads USA" rather than from Times Square.

7. Our story must be told with a sincere undercurrent of humility. It should be aimed at winning friends in a simple and interesting way.

8. Among foreigners the impression is all too widespread that Americans are braggarts who consider their way the only way. Try to draw parallels between the American way and the traditions of those nations whose support we are cultivating. For example, we are very like the Greeks because we each pay a high premium on individualism. Australians and Americans get on together because of the similarity of our early histories and because our senses of humor are practically identical, etc.

9. Prepare for a sustained educational program. To date we have made only sporadic and poorly conceived attempts at improving our relations with overseas neighbors. This time the program must be long range and sustained if it is to be lasting in its effect.

10. In one sense we will get little support without sympathetic understanding. Cultivate, therefore, a certain amount of sympathy. Let the other fellow hear about some of our problems. He will like us the better for it.

11. Let us get down to brass tacks and develop a sound public relations policy for our United States Government offices abroad. Likewise we sorely need qualified public relations personnel in each of the foreign countries.

12. Consider a plan for briefing the thousands of Americans who are traveling abroad. The indiscretion of a single tourist may neutralize the constructive efforts of a hundred others.

At a time when we are spending so much of our energy and wealth to defend the American way of life it seems entirely logical that we should consider investing a fraction more to interpret America to those who allegedly are our friends but who in reality wonder what we really are. Good luck in your endeavors.

Sincerely,

CARL K. DELLMUTH.

A Practical Approach to Local Long-Range Planning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, an important address dealing with the subject of local long range community planning, delivered by Mr. Bertram M. Gross before the Virginia Citizens Planning Association, Natural Bridge, Va., August 5, 1950.

At a time when so much public attention is necessarily centered upon national and international events, it is important that we should not overlook the needs of planning programs at the local community level. The address of Mr. Gross contains some valuable suggestions on this subject.

I am advised by the Public Printer that this material will make 2⅓ pages in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at a cost of $191.34.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

A PRACTICAL APPROACH TO LOCAL LONG-RANGE PLANNING

(By Bertram M. Gross, member of the Arlington County Planning Commission and chairman of the commission's committee on the 6-year plan; member of the Northern Virginia Regional Planning Commission and chairman of the commission's committee on long-term planning; executive secretary of the President's Council of Economic Advisers)

Many things have happened since those free and easy days a few months ago when a group of far-sighted Virginia citizens first came together to organize this association and lay plans for this meeting.

Since then the Republic of Korea has been invaded, American troops, planes, and ships have gone into battle, and steps have been taken on the home front to expand productive capacity and defense production, cut down on less essential activities, and prevent a run-away inflation.

The eyes of America are now focused upon the battle front across the seas and upon the leaders in the Nation's Capital.

In one town and county after another where citizens have joined together to plan the future of their local communities the question is being asked, "Shall we continue as usual at a time when, because of military necessity, so much must be decided through Federal planning in Washington? Is there still any place for local planning?"

As one man's answer, I humbly submit that we must not continue our planning activities as usual. I suggest that under the new and emerging circumstances the role of local planning is tenfold what it was 6 months ago. We must now put more effort, more time, more initiative, and more courage into local planning activities than ever before.

A few weeks ago I was over at the Institute of Public Affairs at Charlottesville and there I heard a hard-headed University of Virginia professor suggest that we could not win the war against communism in Asia by military operations alone; that we could lose the cold war unless we learned how to operate at the level of village life in China, India, the Malayan Peninsula, and the other underdeveloped regions of the world and give the villagers and peasants a vision of a better way of life.

Now if it is true that we can gain strength through winning friends in the villages of Asia, it is also true that we can strengthen our economy, our political institutions, and our moral fiber by sound planning in the townships, counties, and cities of America.

Local planning is no longer a hothouse flower remote from the realities of the world around us. It is no longer a process by which a handful of architects or engineers sit in an ivory tower drawing fancy maps that no one pays much attention to and few can understand.

Local planning is a way of getting some of the things we need as a foundation for business enterprise and as an underpinning for the American home and family life. It is a way of recognizing that we can never get everything we want as fast as we want it, of deciding between the more urgent and the less urgent, and of doing these things without allowing the limitations of today to blind us to the emerging needs of the future.

Local planning holds forth the last best hope for reviving the Jeffersonian spirit of local initiative. Through it we can strengthen local self-government, render undue concentration of power in State government unnecessary, and facilitate the more efficient functioning of State government in its proper sphere.

Through it we can avoid excessive reliance on Washington, thereby developing conditions under which necessary Federal activities can be more efficiently and more economically performed.

Above all, local planning is a way of giving the plain people of the country a chance to participate in matters affecting their destiny. Through it, homeowners and tenants, merchants and professional people, manual workers and white-collar workers can widen their horizons and make a valued contribution to the America of the future.

America is too vast a country to be run, if anyone should ever so desire, by some centralized bureaucracy. Many of our great economic problems are so vast that when viewed nationally they almost defy diagnosis. When they are viewed locally as well, it becomes possible to think both of diagnosis and therapy.

But they can be viewed locally in a constructive fashion only by long-term local planning. A perfect example of this is to be found in the area of civil defense. We learned during World War II that the functions of civil defense could be handled properly only through local action. I believe we are learning now that local civil-defense activities can be properly developed only if based upon a strong underpinning of local long-term planning.

With these things in mind, therefore, I should like to talk briefly about how long-term planning has come into being in one Virginia community, list eight points that will serve to describe this process in detail, and say a few words about the virtue of making mistakes and having disagreements.

HOW THE ARLINGTON 6-YEAR PLAN CAME INTO BEING

Some people still think of Arlington as little more than a place where the Unknown Soldier is buried or where a few suburban dwellings have grown up on the far side of the Pentagon.

Actually, Arlington is one of the major urban communities in the South. With its present population of 135,000, it is the third largest in Virginia—second only to Richmond and Norfolk. It has a larger population than such well-known cities as Albany, Austin, Chattanooga, or Savannah. While it is still called a county, if you insert it in a list of cities graded in order of population size you will find that it is the fifteenth largest in the entire South.

This growth has come with astonishing rapidity. In 1930 the population was only 26,000. In 1940 it was only 57,000. While much of this growth resulted from the concentration of war-time activities around Washington, those who predicted that the end of the war would mean a downturn in population were soon proved sadly mistaken. In the 5 years since the end of World War II the population increment has been more than 35,000.

This rapid increase in population created growing shortages of essential public facilities and services. Problems of community growth arose so fast that by the time one problem was clearly identified still another problem developed to complicate the picture.

Many of Arlington's civic leaders came to feel that one of the best ways to make progress was to concentrate on the most pressing of all problems, the shortage of adequate school facilities. Accordingly, the provisions of better schools very properly became a focal point of attention. An energetic school movement developed under the statesmanlike leadership of the Citizens Committee for School Improvement and with the full backing of Arlington's large array of neighborhood associations, women's organizations and other important groups. Arlington has now develped a school plan which has proved itself in experience and has received Nation-wide acclaim.

As progress was made on the school front, however, it became increasingly apparent that a school plan could be not good enough unless it were geared to a community plan. It became increasingly apparent that there were many other crucial aspects of community life that also needed attention in their own right. Interest began to grow in the idea of developing an over-all plan.

The leadership in this new movement has been so widespread that it becomes impossible to locate it at any one point. Members of the school board and the Citizens Committee for School Improvement were among the first to underscore the need for over-all planning. The Civic Federation, which serves as a central coordinating body for neighborhood groups, played a vital part. The Junior Chamber of Commerce demonstrated a remarkable degree of vision and initiative on the question. The members of the Planning Commission were an inseparable part of the picture. And on all sides it was felt that over-all planning should be done with full participation by citizens themselves and that it should be handled in a manner that brought into face-to-face relationships representatives of all the diverse groups in the community.

This sentiment for over-all planning was crystallized in March of this year by Arlington's governing body, the County Board. At that time the chairman of the County Board proposed, and by unanimous vote of the board adopted, an historic resolution on long-range planning.

The heart of this county board resolution reads as follows:

1. It is the policy of the Arlington County board to initiate a survey of Arlington's needs over the next 6 years.

2. It is the further policy of the Arlington County Board to promote the widest possible participation by neighborhood and business organizations and other civic groups both in the appraisal of long-term needs and the development of practical plans to meet such needs.

3. The county manager is hereby directed to obtain from the heads of the appropriate departments of the Arlington County government and the Arlington County school board preliminary estimates of essential public facilities and services needed over the next 6 years and to submit such preliminary estimates in unrevised form to the county board no later than July 1, 1950 so that the county board may then have such estimates carefully reviewed, consolidated, and adjusted by the county planning commission and may take step to promote active participation in the planning process by neighborhood and business organizations and other civic groups.

THE KEY POINTS

It is not possible at this time to give a definitive description of long-term planning in Arlington. The planning process is still in its early stages. As it progresses, it will certainly change.

Moreover, various participants in this process will naturally see it from various viewpoints. What is crucial to one person may seem incidental to another.

It is therefore with some trepidation, based upon the realization that many eagle-eyed Arlingtonians will probably find that I have missed some points and misstated others that I offer the following eight points.

1. The plan is broad in coverage

First of all, the plan deals with the need for capital improvements—such as parks, water and sewage facilities, schools, libraries, fire-fighting equipment, bus facilities, etc.

But it also deals with the need for essential public services—such as school instruction, health and welfare services, police protection, etc.

It is not limited to county government operations alone. It deals with all essential public facilities and services—whether provided by the county, the State, Federal agencies or regional agencies.

As work on the plan progresses it will sooner or later include facilities and services that can or should be provided under private auspices, such as more industrial enterprises in Arlington, redevelopment of blighted areas, private health and welfare services, private schools, etc.

2. The planning process is closely related to the work of official county agencies

In some communities, I have been told, planners are off in a little room somewhere, out of touch with the great wealth of experience and practical know-how of the officials and employees in the various departments and divisions.

We hope to avoid this. We have rejected the idea that planning is planning and operations are operations and that never the twain shall meet. In Arlington they are meeting right at the very beginning.

In fact, one of the basic first steps in the development of Arlington planning had been the preparation of preliminary estimates of needs by the departments of the Arlington County government and the Arlington County School Board. These estimates have been compiled and released in a public document entitled "Six-Year Improvement Plan—Preliminary Departmental Proposals."

It should be understood that these preliminary estimates are not official in any sense. They have not been accepted by the planning commission, the citizens' advisory committee, or by the county board. They have not even been adjusted by the county manager. The job of review, consolidation, and adjustment is now being undertaken by the county planning commission. The great value of the departmental proposals is that they give a concrete starting point from which to work, or, as some have put it, a target at which to shoot.

3. The primary emphasis is upon studying local needs

We make a sharp distinction between needs and specific action programs aimed to meet needs in full or in part.

We have no intention to jump prematurely into specific action programs.

It is our aim to develop a full analysis of local needs based upon—

(a) A uniform underlying estimate of population growth;

(b) The needs of the population based on recognized standards established by professional organizations in all cases where such professional standards exist and adjusted to the local situation;

(c) Conformance with all legal standards enacted by the county or the State to protect the health and safety of the population.

(d) Adjustments to meet those situations where the needs of Arlingtonians can best be met by facilities or services in neighboring areas and where the needs of people in neighboring areas can best be met in Arlington;

(e) Catching up on the backlog of needs now existing in the county as well as making provision for the expected population growth; and

(f) An indication, in any cases where it may be judged that optimum needs cannot be met over a 6-year period, of how many more years may be required.

In some fields it is impossible to find recognized standards established by professional organizations. An illustration of this is found in the case of sewers. On this point the planning commission now has a special staff expert trying to fill the gap by developing new methods of measuring the need for sewers. Out of this effort may yet evolve a set of nationally accepted criteria that can be used by other communities as well.

4. The orientation is a long-term one

It takes time to do important things. It takes a long-term look to give the perspective needed to appraise the relative importance of various projects and the interrelations between them.

We have called our plan a 6-year plan. By this we mean that when we present a program to the county board in the spring of 1951 we expect that it will deal with specific action to be taken during the 6-year period from July 1, 1951, to July 1, 1957 (fiscal years 1952 to 1958).

In a sense, however, it is much more than a 6-year plan. In many cases both estimates of needs and specific action programs will necessarily go beyond a 6-year period.

5. It is a moving, flexible plan

At the end of the first year the plan will not then become a 5-year plan. It will not in 2 years become a 4-year plan.

Toward the end of the first year, rather, the plan will be reviewed, will certainly be revised, and will then be extended for the next 6 years. In other words, it will be a moving 6-year plan. And I feel safe in predicting that it will always be more specific in detail with respect to the first 3 years and more general with respect to the last 3 years.

We believe this is more realistic than trying to establish a rigid blueprint to be followed point by point over an entire 6-year period. New conditions and new problems that cannot be readily foreseen are always bound to develop.

One such contingency relates to the shortage of building materials that would inevitably result if, because of the international situation, a substantial part of our country's resources should be devoted to armaments. If this should occur, it is obvious that any part of the 6-year plan relating to construction activities would necessarily have to be modified.

If such a contingency develops, the essence of local long-term planning might well become: (1) cutting down on all but the most essential construction activities; (2) going in for large-scale land purchases for future parks, playgrounds, schools, and other public facilities; and (3) using any excess local revenues to invest in Government bonds and build up a fund for use in construction activities when building supplies again become more available.

6. The local plan is being related to a broader planning structure

Our local planning is inseparably connected with the future of the northern Virginia region, the metropolitan area of the Nation's Capital and the State of Virginia.

Insofar as the region is concerned, we have a regional planning commission composed of three representatives of the counties of Arlington, Fairfax, and Prince William, the cities of Alexandria and Falls Church and the town of Manassas. This commission has recently set up a long-term planning committee which will promote long-term plans in each of the political subdivisions in the area and will serve as a clearinghouse among them. The regional long-term planning work will also be inseparably tied up with civil-defense activities, which we hope will also be organized on a regional basis. At least half of all the many things that must be done to have a good civil-defense program will advance the general cause of community planning. At the same time more than half of what we do to plan for more adequate facilities in the field of transportation, utilities, fire protection, and health will be needed to provide a foundation for adequate civil defense.

Insofar as the metropolitan area of Washington is concerned, legislation is now pending in Congress to strengthen and broaden the work of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission. Under this legislation, already passed by the Senate, the Commission would itself initiate a 6-year public works program for the District of Columbia. It is expected that this legislation will also provide for representation from the northern Virginia area on the revamped Commission.

Insofar as the State is concerned, the advisory council on the Virginia economy has a large group of research committees at work on aspects of State-wide planning. Unfortunately, not one resident of the northern Virginia area is yet a member of this important advisory council and very few are on the research committees. I believe this matter is now under study in Richmond and that steps may soon be taken to provide a closer working relationship.

7. A citizens' advisory committee has been brought in on the ground floor

"In a multitude of counselors there is safety," reads the old Biblical proverb. "Where no counsel is the people fall" (Prov. XI, 14).

We believe that a good plan cannot be developed and transformed into reality without the advice and assistance of a multitude of counsellors.

One of the first steps of the planning commission has been to set up a citizens' advisory committee to help obtain citizen participation in the planning process. This committee consists of community leaders chosen from all the various sectors of the community and representing all shades of opinion. It includes businessmen, home owners, and Government workers, conservatives and liberals, old-timers and newcomers. Its purpose is to advise the planning commission with respect to county planning activities and on methods of enlisting the widest possible citizen participation in planning.

The first assignment of the advisory committee has been to assist the planning commission in evaluating the long-term needs of the county, in developing programs for meeting these needs, and in reporting public reaction as the plans are developed.

Other civic groups—particularly neighborhood, women's, business, and professional organizations—also have a place in the development of the 6-year plan. At the appropriate time they will all be asked for their views. The civic federation has already presented to the planning commission a comprehensive memorandum suggesting the major points of emphasis in the 6-year plan. One neighborhood association has already voted to develop on its own, for submission to the commission, a comprehensive neighborhood plan. It is my hope that all these groups will play an increasingly large part in the process.

8. It is an operation goldfish bowl

The people of a community have a legitimate right to be kept regularly informed about planning activities.

And by "people" I don't mean merely the leaders of organizations—or even the rank-and-file members of organizations. I mean the people of the community whether or not they belong to organized groups. I mean the individuals whose participation in community activities may be strictly limited to the use of public facilities and services and the payment of direct and indirect taxes.

In communities with a low degree of group organization the provision of information to individuals is fundamental. But it cannot be overlooked in communities which, like Arlington, can boast of an extremely high degree of organized group activities.

Accordingly, we are doing our best to keep people informed. The preliminary departmental estimates, for example, have been made publicly available. The Planning Commission, with the help of its advisory committee, is now putting the finishing touches on a first report to the people of Arlington. This report will try to deal in simple language with the following three questions:

1. What is the 6-year plan?
2. What is the role of the Arlington County Planning Commission?
3. How will citizens of Arlington participate in the development of the plan?

Additional public reports will presumably be made from time to time

Consideration is also being given to the holding of public forums on various aspects of the plan. These could be of tremendous educational value.

Finally, while the Commission does not conceive its function as one of engaging in propaganda, it will cooperate with the press and the radio in their work of keeping the public informed.

MISTAKES AND DISAGREEMENTS

Let no one say that we in Arlington can be found guilty of either perfection or unanimity.

I'm sure we have already made some mistakes. I only wish we could spot them all.

We hope to rectify these mistakes as we go along and to profit by them. We take it for granted that our list of mistakes will grow but that by self-examination and self-criticism we can discover them before it is too late, avoid mutual recriminations and keep our eyes always on doing better in the future.

We have also had minor disagreements on methods of initial procedure. We will probably have more interesting disagreements in the future. But we take it for granted that intelligent people will have differing ideas. We approach the problem of disagreement by always looking first at the area of agreement and trying to make firm progress within this area. We then focus upon points of diversity and disagreement without allowing that diversity to floor us.

After all, diversity is the essence of democracy. It becomes a threat only when conflict becomes too sharp or when any one group becomes too powerful and tries to impose its own conception of the common weal upon everyone else. The strength of democracy lies in our ability to work together with people who will not agree with everything we want and who will not fight to the last drop of blood in their veins for everything they want. It lies in our ability to make mutual adjustments and compromises between conflicting conceptions of the public welfare.

The importance of local long-term planning—and in this perhaps lies its greatest contribution to the democratic way of life—is that it provides a vantage point for looking beyond the petty bickerings of the present and obtaining a broader perspective. We regard it as a method of fashioning adjustments that are not merely patchwork, log-rolling bargains between a few interest groups but rather represent a balanced effort to meet the true interests of the community as a whole. We value it as a process whereby through cooperative learning and mutual adjustment we can bring people together in building the future.

Antisubversive Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Hold On, Senators," from the Thursday, August 24, issue of the Raleigh Register, Beckley, W. Va.; also an editorial entitled "Caution Needed," from the Thursday, August 31, issue of the New York Times.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Beckley (W. Va.) Raleigh Register of August 24, 1950]

HOLD ON, SENATORS

With administration leaders in the Senate finally agreeing to consider Communist "control" bills, thinking Americans have focused attention on this knotty problem.

Whether controls will reach the extreme of outlawing Communists is not known, but the matter nonetheless deserves the attention of Americans everywhere, for it hits at the bedrock of our democratic principles.

It is hoped that when Congress finally tackles the question mature consideration and not emotional judgment will govern the action of Senators and Representatives.

The freedom of assembly, speech, and press, guaranteed by the Constitution, do not mean merely freedom for those with whom we agree. On the other hand, these freedoms do not guarantee freedom to commit or promote sabotage, sedition, or the overthrow of the government by violence.

The dissenters and the unorthodox are granted the right to disagree with established principles, and, if they desire, to advocate changes in the political and economic structure through the ballot.

If we try to outlaw the Communists, we attempt by statute to forbid the harboring of ideas, and no law can do this If we try to control the Communists, we will send them and their dangerous ideas underground where they can work unseen toward the eventual overthrow of democracy.

By attempting to legislate against the Communist Party, we leave the impression with all the world that democracy as a way of life is not strong enough to withstand onslaughts.

The founding fathers realized that political ideas inimical to our form of government would in time be conceived and would endanger our governmental structure, but they believed that democracy would stand supreme if given the opportunity to compete openly in the vast court of world opinion.

It would be the wisest course, The Register believes, for control legislation against communism to be deferred. The laws of the land are sufficient to cope with extremists in the Communist Party. Let us not allow the Reds to provoke us into ill-conceived political action as they have constricting military action.

[From the New York Times of August 31, 1950]

CAUTION NEEDED

Now that the House has passed its own antisubversive bill (H. R. 9490), the Senate has for its consideration this week no less than four distinct measures dealing with this highly controversial subject. Maneuverings of both Democrats and Republicans to snare the credit for whatever legislation of this type is enacted may obscure—but cannot lessen—the urgent necessity of examining such proposals with the greatest care.

We have already expressed our opinion regarding the three major Senate bills on anti-subversive activities: the Mundt-Ferguson bill (S. 2311), the McCarran omnibus bill (S. 4037), and the administration bill (S. 4061). We have explained why we think the first two, going far beyond the proper and laudable aim of making the Communists harmless, represent a potentially serious threat to American civil liberties. The bill which the House passed on Tuesday is a modified version of the Mundt-Ferguson measure; but it still contains such drastic registration provisions, it leaves such great power in the hands of an administrative board and it is couched in such broad language that we feel that it, too, is more far-reaching than necessary or advisable. By and large, the law as it now stands appears adequate to protect us against the Communist menace, so far as any law as such can protect us. In fact, between the upper millstone of present legislation and the nether millstone of the American voters' common sense, communism is not getting very far in the United States. But improvement in existing law can certainly be made, and this the administration bill, generally speaking, would do.

It is natural in these times that there should be a demand for anti-Communist legislation; but it is imperative that in our haste to pass such legislation we do not endanger the freedom of thought and speech that is a vital part of the American tradition and is, in fact, essential for the proper functioning of democratic government.

Federal, State, and Local Governmental Spending in 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ZALES N. ECTON

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement entitled "Federal, State, and Local Governmental Spending in 1951 Expected To Be More Than One-Third of National Income," published in the News Bulletin of August 29, 1950.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Governmental spending at Federal, State, and local levels combined during 1951 are expected to be more than one-third of the national income.

For the fiscal year 1951, ending next June 30, the proposed Federal spending will total $59,482,000,000. State spending which ran up to $11,782,000,000 in 1949, is expected to run about $11,600,000,000 in 1951. Local governmental spending will probably run around $9,868,000,000.

THE NATIONAL INCOME IN 1950

The President's Council of Economic Advisers estimates the National income for the first half of 1950 as follows:

	Annual rate
First quarter	$217,200,000,000
Second quarter	223,600,000,000
Our estimate full year	229,100,000,000

On the basis of our own studies, we conclude that total spending for all governmental purposes (including foreign aid, military assistance, and relief during the fiscal year 1951 for the Federal Government, and the calendar year 1951 for State and local governments will be as follows:

Federal governmental spending, fiscal 1951	$59,482,000,000
State governmental spending, calendar 1951	11,600,000,000
Local governmental spending, calendar 1951	9,868,000,000
Total	80,950,000,000

Figures on local government expenditures are estimated from the progressive increase in spending since 1945 considering also the increased cost of labor and materials entering into construction of highways, sewers, school facilities, waterworks, and other necessary local improvements.

If governmental spending proceeds according to our estimates approximately 35 percent of the national income in 1951 will be spent by governmental agencies. Since it appears impossible at this time to levy taxes equal to 35 percent of the total national income, it appears that government at all levels will generally engage in deficit financing, thus further inflating the economy, and depreciating the purchasing power of the dollar.

Twin-Hull Flying Ship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES E. POTTER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, many of our most competent engineers are convinced that the designs for a twin-hull flying ship is not only feasible from an engineering standpoint but would be invaluable to our national defense, particularly in antisubmarine warfare.

The Disabled American Veterans have undertaken to sponsor a movement for the building of such a ship. I appealed to the Committee on Armed Services to hold hearings to explore the feasibility of such a ship.

Following is a resolution passed at the national convention of the Disabled American Veterans and also a letter to Secretary of Defense Johnson citing their interest in this project. The resolution and letter follow:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., August 18, 1950.—In the interest of saving the lives and limbs of America's defenders, the Disabled American Veterans, at its twenty-ninth annual convention here, today unanimously adopted a resolution strongly recommending that the National Military Establishment immediately construct "one or more seaworthy twin-hull ships capable of flight," according to patents and designs recently proffered to the National Military Establishment by the Disabled American Veterans Service Foundation, the incorporated trusteeship for the DAV. The resolution reads as follows:

"Whereas the Disabled American Veterans is composed of America's war-wounded and disabled veterans who have learned, through personal experience, the shocking loss of human lives and limbs caused by America's inadequate preparedness in the past; and

"Whereas the treachery, intrigue, and aggression of Communist countries have made it obvious that world peace can be established only by full military preparedness: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Disabled American Veterans, in national convention assembled in San Francisco, Calif., this 18th day of August 1950, That we do hereby officially endorse the proffer, by the Disabled American Veterans Service Foundation, to the National Military Establishment, of the right, without royalty obligation, to use all of the pertinent patents and designs for the construction, for national defense purposes, of one or more seaworthy twin-hull ships capable of flight for the safe and speedy delivery of troops and munitions anywhere in the world; and be it further

"Resolved, That the President of the United States, the United States Congress, and the National Military Establishment be urged speedily to arrange for the construction of such fighting flying ships with multiple military capabilities to conserve the lives of America's youths, in defense of our American way of life."

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS
SERVICE FOUNDATION,
Washington, D. C., July 27, 1950.

Hon. LOUIS A. JOHNSON,
Secretary of Defense, National Military Establishment, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: A multiple-purpose, seaworthy, flying ship, which could speedily (within a few hours) deliver troops and munitions needed for any military emergency, is available for construction by the National Military Establishment.

If our Government had had a few of these vessels when the Communists began their invasion of South Korea, emergency troops, munitions, and matériel probably could have been delivered in time to stop the enemy north of Seoul.

Possessing full rights and authority relating to this seaworthy flying craft, with its diversified capabilities, the Disabled American Veterans Service Foundation hereby proffers, to the National Military Establishment, the right to use all of the pertinent patents and designs for the construction of one or more such twin-hull flying ships, without any royalty obligation.

This seaworthy flying craft is capable of serving Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps in combat missions of land, sea, and air. No other vehicle, vessel, or aircraft has this combination of abilities. It concerns, therefore, all of the branches of the National Military Establishment. Very fittingly, this offer should be considered by a top-level unifying committee of the National Military Establishment for integration and coordination under its unification program.

DESCRIPTION

This ocean surface vessel, with flight capabilities (see illustrations), is designed on the proved twin-hull catamaran principle of stability.

Its wing, with a gull-like upward sweep at each end, is so mounted in relation to the twin-hulls that it cannot be engulfed by waves in any ocean. There are 3 decks. The third deck—the largest—is located within the wing and extends between and on both sides of each hull.

In the smallest size recommended, this twin-hull flying ship has a 300-foot wing span. Its flying weight is 150 gross tons; its water-borne capacity is 200 gross tons. Three of its seven power units are located on the wing between the two hulls, with two more mounted on the wing on the outboard side of each hull.

MILITARY EQUIPMENT

This twin-hull flying ship could be equipped with—

1. Four cannon of a larger caliber and longer range than any usable by other aircraft;
2. Twelve or more anti-aircraft guns;
3. Guided missiles launching machine;
4. Two or more torpedo discharging tubes;
5. Facilities for launching and retrieving jet planes;
6. Bomb racks;
7. Depth charge racks;
8. Radar and sonar;
9. Dual flying controls, located about 60 feet apart;
10. Two retractable, elevated observation tops, permitting lookout to discover enemy while the twin-hull flying ship remains concealed below the horizon.

DIVERSIFIED CAPABILITIES

The twin-hull flying ship could:

1. Track down by sonar, bracket and sink submarines. (The flying ship, with its horizontal sonar rudder, has the ability to accurately locate a submarine and simultaneously drop two depth charges, 200 feet apart, and escape damage from the explosion. The latest Russian submarines are known to be extremely maneuverable under water; this combined with their relatively higher speed and greater strength to resist depth charges makes it necessary for the Navy to use new methods, such as the flying ship affords, to locate and destroy submarines.)
2. Deliver troops, with artillery, munitions and matériel, speedily and safely, to any place in the world (Seventy percent of the earth's surface is water. Even on the land there are more alighting places for this twin-hull ship—lakes, rivers and shores—than there are bomber alighting fields.)
3. Drop bombs with accuracy, anywhere in the world, whether on land or water. (This is the only flying craft which could carry bombs as heavy as the hydrogen bomb.)
4. Provide better launching accuracy for guided missiles and a steadier gun platform than any other ocean vessel, because of its catamaran stability in rough ocean waves. (It rolls and pitches less than half as much as other types of ocean craft. Refueling at sea is comparatively easy and safe.)
5. Avoid battleship-range and air bombs, by virtue of its extreme maneuverability.
6. Bomb "overocean" objectives better than any other known craft, because of its ability to conserve flying gas for combat purposes.
7. Choose its own time and place for battle: rendezvous on the ocean for surprise attack
8. Travel on the ocean's surface at least twice as fast as any other vessel, in any condition of wind and sea, and up to 100 miles an hour under favorable conditions; in the air it can travel up to 340 miles an hour.
9. Travel 3,000 miles on the ocean's surface, while conserving its entire load of flying gas, namely, fuel for 3,700 miles of flight; no other flying craft can make any distance without expending flying gas.
10. Launch and retrieve jet planes safely at higher velocity than by any other method.
11. Launch torpedoes.
12. Effectively attack forts, factories and other military objectives of any first-class power. (It is the only ocean surface craft capable of doing this.)
13. Carry and fire larger caliber guns than any other seaworthy craft which can remain afloat in the face of torpedoing and bombing. (The twin-hull flying ship is not vulnerable to torpedoing because of its shallow draft—5 feet when loaded for flight, and 6 feet when loaded for both ocean surface and air navigation—and it cannot be bombed effectively due to its high maneuverability on the ocean surface.)
14. Ride safely under the worst conditions of wind and waves on the ocean. (Ocean waves of 600 feet length and 50 feet height between crest and trough can be successfully negotiated only by the twin-hull flying ship. Other types of flying craft do not have the necessary catamaran support and buoyancy to be seaworthy).
15. Take-off and fly whenever safety and speed dictate.
16. Conceal its position or distance from other surface or sub-surface craft, because it has no water propeller to propagate sound.
17. Protect itself from pursuit planes by firing a barrage of greater range than that of pursuit planes.
18. Replace all other craft as a United Nations patrol for world peace.
19. Perform practically all Coast Guard functions, both in war and in peace.

One of these flying ships, in the 300-foot span, 150-ton size now projected, would cost approximately the same as a B-36 bomber, and probably not more than a million dollars in line production. Construction time would be 9 months for the prototype model, assuming engineering completed and materials assembled at shipyard. In production, one flying ship could be taken off the line every week.

The flying ship, as now projected, is the smallest size recommended for immediate construction. Larger sizes can follow at an early date. It is so constructed that it can be converted readily from military to peacetime use

Some of the world's leading authorities on sea craft and air craft have stated that the twin-hull flying ship is long overdue and is now the surest hope for military domination of both sea and air.

Speaking of the submarine menace in World War II, Mr. Winston Churchill and General Eisenhower declared that the Battle of the Atlantic constituted the allies' greatest problem.

Losses of allied ships and cargoes due to submarine attack in World War II were so huge that the losses of a single day would more than pay for the entire cost of the development and testing of the twin-hull flying ship.

Addressing Parliament, Prime Minister Churchill said: "One heavily escorted convoy of 14 cargo vessels, attempting to take supplies to Malta, arrived there with only three of the supply ships still afloat. Of those one was sunk at the dock."

We ask that this matter be given early attention so that our board of trustees can include your response in its report to the thirtieth annual convention of the Disabled American Veterans, to be held in San Francisco during the week of August 13, 1950.

Chicago Joins in the Centennial Celebration of the Birth of a Great American, Samuel Gompers, on Labor Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, January 27, 1950, marked the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Samuel Gompers, the founder and first president of the American Federation of Labor. On this Labor Day in 1950 all Chicago will celebrate Gompers Centennial Labor Day. It will be one of the greatest civic events in the city's history. Soldier's Field will be the scene of a gigantic assemblage of labor and labor's friends to do honor to this peerless leader.

Mr. William L. McFetridge, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, has this to say about the celebration:

I urge every member of the Chicago Federation of Labor to attend this great Labor Day celebration honoring Samuel Gompers. It will be a most impressive sight to see organized labor and the friends of organized labor assembled to pay tribute to the founder of the American Federation of Labor. It will be a family day, a day of entertainment and good will—a great personal tribute to the wisdom of Samuel Gompers.

Mr. William A. Lee, president of the Chicago Federation of Labor, issued the following statement:

We feel that the Samuel Gompers centennial celebration will do a great deal to keep the memory of Gompers forever fresh in our minds. We must never forget that Samuel Gompers was not only the founder of the American Federation of Labor, but a great crusader for good in this country. On Labor Day we pay tribute to him not only as a great member of organized labor but as a great American.

Mr. William Cleary, secretary of the Chicago Federation of Labor, stated:

We are staging our Labor Day celebration honoring Samuel Gompers in a way that we believe Gompers would like. It will be for the family, for the children, for organized labor and its friends. I am sure Mr. Gompers would be very pleased to have these families together on Labor Day to honor his centennial.

And Mr. Stephen Bailey, vice president of the Chicago Federation of Labor, had this to say:

The Chicago Federation of Labor serves in many ways as a civic body in this city. For that reason, we urge Chicagoans to attend our Labor Day celebration honoring Samuel Gompers. The work that Gompers did is reflected in the day-to-day living of every American. We all owe him a great debt of gratitude. The Samuel Gompers Centennial Celebration with its entertainment, circus acts, auto races will be the concrete tribute of organized labor to a great American.

The steering committee for the Gompers celebration consists of the following:

Morris Bialis, manager, Chicago Joint Board, International Ladies Garment Workers' Union; Frank Brown, president, Teamsters Joint Council, 25; Thomas Burke, president, Building Service Employees Local, 25; Byron Dalton, business manager, Plasterers Union Local, 5; William C. Kowalski, Musicians Union Local, 10; William L. McFetridge, president, Building Service Employees International Union, and Patrick F. Sullivan, president, Building Trades Council; Charles Youngblood, business representative, Painters Union Local 147; Michael F. Delaney, Pipe Fitters Local, 597; Thomas J. Haggerty, secretary-treasurer, Milk Wagon Drivers Local, 753; R. N. Hickson, secretary, Printing Pressmen Local, 3; George L. Knott, president, Laundry Drivers Union Local, 712; William A. Lee, president, Chicago Federation of Labor; Daniel J. McNamara, secretary, Street Carmen Division, 241; Stephen M. Bailey, business manager, Plumbers Union Local, 130; William F. Cleary, secretary, Chicago Federation of Labor; and Maurice Lynch, financial secretary, Chicago Federation of Labor.

It is my great privilege to join with these outstanding leaders of labor in Chicago in urging members of the A. F. of L. to bring their families to Soldiers Field on this eventful occasion for the hours of enjoyment planned for all, and in this pleasant atmosphere pay humble tribute to the man who devoted his lifetime to the upbuilding and strengthening of labor's dynamic role in the progress and development of our great land—Sam Gompers. He gave his all for the welfare of the men who toils. He is deserving of the undying gratitude of those enrolled today in the legion of toilers.

Mr. Speaker, it was my great privilege to have known Mr. Gompers intimately and to have worked with him in many of his accomplishments for the improvement of labor conditions in this country.

On January 29, 1950, all American workers and industrialists alike did honor and paid their respects to Samuel Gompers on the occasion of the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of this distinguished American whose works and efforts gave substance and life to the destiny of a great and powerful America. This centennial observance is being brought to a real climax in the thoughtful and appreciative city of Chicago on this Labor Day, September 4.

I had the happy privilege of knowing intimately and well Sam Gompers, who, during his lifetime, in an era of grim foreboding and discouragement for the success of the labor movement and the welfare of the worker and the toiler, had to arm himself with patience, breadth of understanding, vigor, and patriotic leadership in order to realize his goal of betterment of conditions for the working class.

Here, in the life and works of Samuel Gompers, is an outstanding example of one who becomes a distinguished American, rising from humble beginnings to high and exalted position in American industrial, political, and social life.

Here, in the career of Samuel Gompers, born in London of Dutch-Jewish stock, is found a striking example of what millions of immigrants before and after him have accomplished, namely, infusing into American life the energy and spirit of industry, honesty, and thrift which have made America the most formidable Nation in power and prestige in the world.

I like to dwell on this point because there exists too strongly in many quarters and sections of our country a tense feeling and prejudice against our newcomers, immigrants who, like Gompers—little schooled, dissatisfied with conditions in their homeland, seeing no future there for themselves or their offspring—sought liberty and freedom in our country, and at the same time advance the interests of their adopted country. Like Gompers, they worked 6 days a week, from 12 to 14 hours daily, at their trade or employment, plodded their weary way home, and in recent years read their paper or listened to their favorite programs, and except for one night out either on Saturday or Sunday, retiring to their rest to be prepared for the next day and next week's battles, extending into the years. Thus did they build up a backlog of simple but firm, honest endeavor and accomplishment, which went into the sinews and lifeblood of the Nation which gave them succor and aid. And if these contributions were not enough, they and their children further acted to repay the debt of asylum given them, when in large, yes, overwhelming, numbers, they rushed to the aid of the Nation in time of two devastating wars and wrote distinguished feats of valor and sacrifice in illustrious pages of history, for Americans of future years to emulate and revere.

My friend Sam Gompers came from a so-called minority group. As a true American, he would not and did not permit wholesale or mass mistreatment of the human race. He fought with all his might the totalitarian way of life exemplified by Kaiser Wilhelm, who sought to make slaves and serfs of free men and women. Gompers labored in the vineyard of human rights and freedom. He fought to protect the minorities regardless of race, religion, or class.

In America we find many minorities so-called, which makes up the greatest melting pot of all races, creeds, and colors on the face of the globe. America is great because the virtues of patriotism, liberty, and justice abide with resolute heart among her people. There are, however, though fortunately small in number but nevertheless vocally strong, those who sound notes of hate and discord against these minority groups, attempting to set minorities against each other.

This hatemongering which begets prejudice, bigotry, and discrimination must be met and overcome by means of education and by law.

Samuel Gompers did just that. He built up a sound and enduring trade unionism, first as a hard-working official in his Cigarmakers International Union, composed of all sorts and conditions of men. Later he organized the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, which, together with the printers, the iron and steel workers, the granite cutters and other lesser craft unions, united about 1881 to sow the seed which later brought forth the American Federation of Labor.

I am aware of the organization called the Knights of Labor which, although it claimed at one time over 700,000 members, moved like a meteor along the sky and fell just as quickly to earth leaving practically no concrete or beneficial results from its existence.

Neither time nor space permit me to set forth in detail the complete record of the activities of Samuel Gompers. To do so would fill volumes. It is sufficient to point out a few which demonstrate that he was a pioneer in a field which called for sound, constructive, and forward-looking leadership. The labor movement in the eighties was in a critical period. The Knights of Labor had failed because of inefficient leadership.

Slowly but soundly, the great organizer, leading exponent of craft unionism, Gompers welded together an organization with his small group of trade unionists as the nucleus and then moved forward regardless of the great obstacles confronting him on all sides which big business set up. He succeeded in keeping his organization intact, whether in time of adversity or good fortune. Gradually he became the spokesman for labor and oftentimes the spokesman for the large army of unorganized labor.

SOUND PHILOSOPHY

I believe it can be correctly stated that as president of the American Federation of Labor Mr. Gompers had no special or particular philosophy as to the aims of the labor movement. In the years before World War I his program called for better wages, shorter hours, healthier, and safer working conditions.

These aims, he felt, could be furthered by pursuing or following business-union procedures and working within the framework of the existing order which he always upheld, supported and, protected. For a time he took the position that labor did not aspire to share with the employer or take over control of the industry.

EXPANSION OF LABOR UNION AIMS

After the war, however, Mr. Gompers was forced to adopt a different or expanded position, namely, that viewing wages and hours as its concern and collective bargaining as its sole aim, was not the only program of the American Federation of Labor; that it included also the bidding for a progressive share in the proceeds of industry and a voice in industrial management. The union, he urged, would become responsible for the workers in industry. Along with this new statement of principles, he held strongly to the laissez faire doctrine of individualism—voluntarism, he called it.

He was strongly insistent that industry organize itself to govern itself, to impose tasks and rules and bring order into its own house. Thus it came about that in 1923 the American Federation of Labor recorded itself against the antitrust laws.

I remember in my friendly and close association with this sublime spirit whom we now honor, many instances of greatness. One, however, has always stood forth in my mind, namely, the deep and profound patriotism of my friend. The period was that of the First World War. America and Americans were debating the issues of participation by our country in the great war then being waged abroad. The country and our people were in the throes of a great debate. Indecision and vacillation were riding the crest when firm action and resolution should have been in command. The workers, like other groups, were uncertain as to whether our participation was necessary or justified. Many of the union locals opposed our entry into the war.

GOMPERS LEADS THE A. F. OF L. TO A GREAT TRIUMPH

It was at this psychological moment that Samuel Gompers as president of that great labor organization, the American Federation of Labor, took hold. Here again the exceptional qualities of leadership asserted themselves. He readily realized the dangers of isolationism, its dangers not only to his own group but most important of all its danger to his adopted and beloved country. To work he went. No man ever waged a more relentless and soul-stirring fight against Kaiser Wilhelm and his type of totalitarianism than did Sam Gompers. Although ill, almost 70 years old, he traveled from one end of the country to the other, addressing meeting after meeting and exhorting the union members, and the unorganized workers, to action. Then, biding his time, he prepared the course of the American Federation of Labor and at its convention in November, 1917, at Buffalo, N. Y., he invited President Wilson to address the delegates. As Mr. Wilson entered the hall, every delegate stood up and gave support and approval to the President's position, "to make the world safe for democracy." This was one of the greatest triumphs in the life of Gompers and the American Federation of Labor. The force and influence of this great body of American workers did much to dissipate and scatter the power and influence of the pacifists and isolationists. It had the effect of clearing the atmosphere of doubt and indecision for those deluded but sincere Americans, as well as casting aside the specious and untenable arguments of the Germanophiles and traitors. Gompers had more than established himself as a labor statesman.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S CONFIDENCE IN GOMPERS

Wilson showed his confidence in Samuel Gompers in October 1915 when he named him one of the five members on the Advisory Commission to the Council of National Defense. His was the job to make ready the forces of labor for the battle ahead. His colleagues on the board were Daniel Willard, Julius Rosenwald, Bernard M. Baruch, Dr. Hollis Godfrey, and Dr. Franklin Martin. How well he did his part is best demonstrated by the great part labor played in producing the implements and material of war in 1917–18, just as in 1941–45 the laboring groups did the same spectacular job a second time.

President Wilson again called on him when he appointed Mr. Gompers on the Commission of International Labor Legislation in 1919. This Commission, composed of two representatives from each of the five Great Powers at the Peace Conference, were to act on matters affecting labor and work within the League of Nations for common action on conditions of employment. Although not fully satisfied with the work of the Draft Convention, he accepted it, as did the American Federation of Labor.

OPPOSITION TO COMMUNISM AND SOCIALISM

His opposition to communism and socialism manifested itself in strong, unmistakable language. He warned that—

> Communism can only be successful if it succeeds in tying itself to the masses by directing its appeals in language of jingoistic sentiment, by aggravating and exploiting every manifestation or display of discord or discontent.

Not, for example, in our day, the Communist parades and pickets for civil rights, better housing, and so forth. He knew that communism profits from the political mistakes of political parties, since these errors permit the Communists to proclaim themselves as the sole and only defenders of the national welfare and the country's traditions. Gompers kept the Communists in the labor movement on the defensive and never permitted them to take the initiative.

COMMUNISM, A THREAT TO UNION AUTONOMY

Sam Gompers fought communism because it constituted a distinct threat to union autonomy. To him, it meant absorption of the union by the totalitarian state and thus becoming a mere cog within the framework and machinery of politics.

He knew and recognized early in life as a union leader that when Communists win control of a union, not only do they change the personnel but also the objectives and functions of the union. In addition they form and organize opposition to the parent body. It becomes a tool, an ally of the Communist regime and loses its character as a trade-union.

He saw New York as a maelstrom of revolutionary groups and many different national extractions. He saw in these formative years, the actions of the extremists and the anarchists and soon came to the conclusion, how little organized labor would gain if it joined or cooperated with these groups.

Hence, he was attacked by the leaders of Bolshevism, Lenin and Trotsky, who called him an enemy of the proletariat. Communists accused him of being a bourgeois and labor faker. Lenin spoke in glowing terms of Daniel De Leon often referred to as the pope of the Socialist Party. De Leon was an arch enemy of Gompers in the labor movement.

It was at this time that Communists had infiltrated into a few trade-unions such as the needle trades in the State of New York and New England, into textile, miners, and steelworkers unions. There developed consequently an aggressive left-wing movement in the American Federation of Labor which constantly attacked the conservative program of Gompers, continually demanding the immediate recognition of Soviet Russia.

OPPOSITION TO SOCIALISM

Mr. Gompers had studied the principles of socialism in his youth. He soon learned to oppose it. Socialism to him meant the overthrow of free enterprise and the existing order to be replaced by socialism. Then, too, the Socialists were pacifists and opposed the war. He was viciously attacked by them because he stood for and promoted private enterprise which was and is today anathema to Socialists whose program is that of nationalization of industry. Led by Gompers, the American labor movement accepted the concept of private property as a necessary agency for securing opportunity for individual independence and resourcefulness.

FEUDAL BARONS OF WEALTH DENY RECOGNITION TO LABOR

Mr. Speaker, the enemies of labor and trade-unions with whom Samuel Gompers had to contend in the early days of their development and growth were powerful indeed. One look at the imposing list of those who opposed and fought incessantly and with every unfair weapon at their command, serves only in increasing my admiration and regard for the man we honor:

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who had acquired his wealth, as did some of the others I name, at the expense of low wages paid the workers. He refused to recognize the union miners of Colorado.

Andrew Carnegie, who with Henry Frick in 1892 opposed better conditions for labor and fought the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers in the Homestead strike with Pinkertons and help from unconscionable quarters, thereby almost crushing the cause of labor.

George Pullman, of the Pullman Palace Car Co., at Pullman, Ill., who advocated wage reduction and whose action resulted in the Pullman strike, producing hard and heavy burdens on the laboring man and his family.

Jay Gould, an industrial tycoon of his day, a ruthless individualist, who, drunk with financial and economic power, believed that progress meant accumulation of great private fortunes at the expense of the worker paid starvation wages.

James Fisk, who used his resources to beat down labor, ably seconded and abetted by another arch foe of labor, Judge Elbert H. Gary, of the United States Steel Corp., whose sense of economic justice set a new low even in those early days of high-handed action against labor-union unionism.

John P. Morgan, along with Carnegie, Rockefeller, and E. J. Harriman, were among those who, at the beginning of the twentieth century, built up and developed powerful systems of high finance, great monopolies in trade and railroad industries—all by the sweat of labor, but denying the laborer just compensation.

Take the case of miners forced always to strike for a living wage to keep out of peonage. Never given the opportunity to work the number of days of other industries, the miners were forced to put up with seasonable fluctuation in production.

Forced to trade for their food supplies in the company stores owned by the coal barons because of lack of funds, unable to obtain or afford decent living conditions or housing facilities for their families, the miners lived in squalid surroundings near the mines. Always in debt to the coal barons who held them in servitude, with no safety appliances and working hundreds of feet below the ground under perilous conditions, the plight of these workers has always been a desperate one.

However, Mr. Speaker, they found a champion in Gompers, encouraged by men such as William Green, who fought successfully to improve these disgraceful conditions in slave wages and galley-slave working situations imposed by the autocrats of the coal industry. Truly does history repeat itself.

Strange to say, these men have their exact counterparts today—ruthless men in their self-same positions in the trusts, monopolies, holding companies, who vote themselves large pensions upon retirement notwithstanding the high salaries they receive as an official of the corporation for many years. Yet these self-same men deny pensions and security to those who made possible their millions, who as they are about to complete their span of life, seek in a manner of attempted appeasement to their complaining conscience, to distribute small sums proportionately to their wealth, to worth-while purposes such as endowments for educational institutions, libraries, medical and economic research.

But I say to them—too little and too late for they have robbed the worker and his family of the just and equitable share of the fruits of his honest and productive labor. Well did the apostle of a new era, another of my admired friends, William Jennings Bryan, phrase it in his Cross of Gold speech which I had the high privilege of hearing at the Democratic National Convention in 1896 at Chicago:

> You shall not press down upon the head of labor this crown of thorns,
> You shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold.

GOMPERS WAGES GIGANTIC FIGHT FOR LABOR'S LEGAL RIGHTS

The Sherman Act passed in 1890. Labor unions' activities were not included in the act. But the United States Supreme Court in the Danbury Hatters case (308 U. S. 774) declared the act did apply to labor unions. Then came the Clayton Act of 1914, for which I had the honor of voting, signed by President Wilson, declaring that "the labor of a human being was not a commodity or article of commerce." This act was called by Gompers the Magna Carta of labor, and made the lawful existence of labor organizations which feared that the Government might start dissolution suits against labor unions such as those successfully prosecuted by the Government in 1911 against the Standard Oil Co. and Tobacco Trusts.

Another provision of the Clayton Act prohibited the granting of injunctions by Federal courts against certain specific labor activities such as peaceful picketing. But the interests keep up their opposition to the Clayton Act and the United States Supreme Court in the Duplex Printing Co. case (254 U. S. 443) stated that the Clayton Act did not give any blanket immunity to labor. In this and other decisions the Supreme Court read into the work unreasonable restraint of trade and commerce, the so-called rule of reason into the Sherman Act passed by the Supreme Court in 1911.

Another act, the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932, which I also supported, made it an absolute prohibition for any Federal court to issue an injunction in almost any case involving a labor controversy. Labor held that this act which was interpreted by Justice Frankfurter in the Hutcheson case (312 U. S. 219) in 1941 makes labor injunctions forbidden.

Today we find efforts made by the enemies of labor to overrule these protections and safeguards properly given to labor on the ground, they say, and without authority and reason, that labor unions are seeking to monopolize the supply of labor either on a large or limited scale in restraint of trade. Those opponents of labor falsely charge and urge today that labor controls of production and the fixed prices by union action in commodities or services essential to the public welfare require that labor unions come under the restraint of trade provisions of the Sherman Act. In Gompers' day, he met up with William Howard Taft whom he fought step by step as an injunction judge, and later as a Presidential candidate; as President, and later as Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, Gompers opposed him. Taft contended that labor sought class legislation of the most vicious sort. Gompers replied that all legislation is class legislation and that organization of labor having their origin in human need should be exempted from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. President Wilson accepted this viewpoint of labor notwithstanding the fact that Gompers had opposed him in 1912 as against my friend Champ Clark, Speaker of the House in 1910, whom Gompers called "a more intrepid friend of labor never occupied that position."

POLITICAL ACTION FORCED UPON LABOR

From 1906 to 1912 Gompers took up political action through necessity of self-preservation of the labor movement. He had always believed that the courts under the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890 had gone far beyond the use of their equitable jurisdiction and had rendered strikes ineffectual by unfair restrictions on picketing, free press.

These injunctive measures destroyed the rights of the union members because the workingmen when deprived of their most effectual means of protection—namely, the right to refuse to work unless justly rewarded for their labor—are placed under a serious handicap. Thus, faced with injunctions obtained by employers based on flimsy evidence, untrue and false testimony, Gompers and his organization had no other alternative and determined to "reward our friends and punish our enemies. Elect those who support anti-injunction bills in legislative halls." He made it clear, however, that this action did not mean the formation of a labor party. Gompers always fought those who advocated a labor party. In fact he feared it.

After World War I we find Mr. Gompers changing and modifying his views on political action. He was forced to the conclusion that economic action and nonpartisan political activity could not obtain the benefits union labor was now seeking. For labor now insisted on a share in the control of industry. A great struggle was raging between labor and capital. I saw that struggle in progress here in the House. The United States Steel Corp. and all big business making use of the injunction also either controlled or had great influence in the Republican Party. A few members of the Democratic Party were at times too much influenced by these predatory business groups. Something had to be done. Hence, much against his former views, Gompers took labor out into the political arena. The National Association of Manufacturers was already there. Big business had been there for many years.

The opposition was firmly entrenched in politics. It had men like Penrose, Root in the Senate and others in the House who placed every obstacle in the path of labor's progress. Here is an illustration of this. If you will pardon the personal allusion, Mr. Speaker, I remember well that in the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, I introduced the first bill in the House—H. R. 21962—which embodied the principles of workmen's compensation. The Republican majority, influenced by the large railroad interests, refused to consider same. They said it was unconstitutional and too costly, that it would seriously impair the financial structure of the railroad industry. History records otherwise.

For 10 years we had endeavored to pass the Employer's Liability Act abolishing the barbaric doctrines of assumed risk, contributory negligence, and the doctrine of fellow servant. No sooner had we passed this act than the railroad interests began to agitate for repeal. And on March 1, 1913, in the closing hours of the session the Republican-controlled House railroaded through the House with only 40 minutes' debate and over 100 amendments to be acted upon, a measure—S. 5382—which practically repealed the small benefits in the then extant law. This legislation favored the great railroads and corporations of the country, was a railroad measure to the *n*th degree and against the laboring men of the Nation.

On this eventful occasion, my thoughts and memories revert to those memorable days in my early career as a Member of Congress, when labor was fighting for its very life and for a rightful place in our social, economic, and political life. Its champion was Gompers, and a braver, more spirited and able fighter and leader never lived. His opposition came from both within and without. He traded blow for blow and he fought his way to the top amid a morass of confused thinking with no compass to chart the course, and dissension to quell in his own ranks.

The enemies of labor saw in him a distinct threat to their stronghold and control of the worker—control to time, wages, and the general welfare of their workers whom they kept in serfdom. He raised their status to that of free men. He protected the rights of the union, forced the employer to collective bargaining and bettered the working conditions of the laboring men and women. Samuel Gompers, Mr. Speaker, represented a dynamic force in American life and left a record of rectitude, sincerity, and altruism which brought about a labor movement in America which is stronger, more inclusive, and more united and compact than in any other nation in the world.

Today the American Federation of Labor reflects the aims, hopes, and aspirations of Samuel Gompers for the welfare of the worker and the Nation of which that worthy organization is an integral and necessary part.

Although departed from our midst almost a quarter of a century ago, the spirit of Samuel Gompers lives in that great organization whose objects he furthered and in whose behalf he dedicated and consecrated his entire life.

One of his admirers aptly summed up his place in American history:

> America was his world. * * * Every spot and every country outside of his American horizon was merely subsidiary and suburban. As a matter of fact, Samuel Gompers was the American American, although born in Whitechapel of his time. What he lacked in greatness of soul or brain, he made up in loyalty of untarnished rectitude.

Mr. Speaker, the whole world respects and reveres the memory of my close friend, Samuel Gompers and the exalted Americanism of a great American whose last words were so typical of a patriot:

> God bless our American institutions. May they grow better day by day.

Danger to United States in Silencing Defense Experts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ZALES N. ECTON

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, an article entitled "Danger to United States Seen in Silencing Experts on Defense Problems," written by the well-known writer David Lawrence, and published in the Washington Evening Star on August 30, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DANGER TO UNITED STATES SEEN IN SILENCING EXPERTS ON DEFENSE PROBLEMS—MACARTHUR DECLARATION ON FORMOSA IS MILITARY THEORY AT ITS BEST

(By David Lawrence)

Conceding that this week was an inopportune occasion for the discussion of the strategic importance of Formosa, the fact remains that an unhealthy attitude is developing in the National Capital toward the revelation of truth to the American people by military men concerning problems of defense.

The United States Armed Forces are today in Korea and blood is being spilled because the defense of an outpost in the Far East was not thoroughly discussed in advance and the opinion of our highest military men solicited on the subject.

Why was the defense of Korea, for instance, considered of no interest to the people of the United States last January? Who made the decision to suppress the facts about Korea's strategic importance? Since it was not the military men, how can the American people learn what their views really were? It does not seem plausible that American military opinion would regard the possession of Korea by a hostile power as a matter of indifference to us, especially when the Japan-Okinawa-Philippines line is supposed to be our prime defense. For if Korea were to become a base for Soviet air power and submarines, the future of Japan as a possible ally of the United States would become perilous. Korea geographically is a knife projected against a peaceful Japan.

TOO MUCH "HUSH-HUSH"

The argument will be made that to discuss anything of this sort is to invade "foreign policy." There was a time—in the days of isolationism—when American frontiers were on our own Pacific and Atlantic coasts. Today, however, America's frontiers are on the Elbe River in Europe and in Korea as well as Formosa. To insist that everything going on abroad can be commented on unofficially only by one department is to carry the hush-hush idea too far.

The outline of American defense strategy which General MacArthur has given is exactly the outline which the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff would express if they were permitted to speak their minds as to defense problems outside the continental United States. There were one or two sentences in the MacArthur statement which might better have been omitted by the general, as they referred to the views of opponents of the policy he was advocating. Outside of these brief phrases, the declaration can stand as an expression of American military theory at its best.

The danger to America in suppressing expert discussion of defense problems is growing. Back in 1940, when Admiral Taussig was testifying before a Senate committee, he advocated that the United States enter into naval arrangements immediately with other nations, including the Netherlands Government, for the protection of our far-eastern interests. He was reprimanded by the late President Roosevelt, but the advice he gave, if accepted, would have saved many thousands of American lives and might have thwarted Japan's naval sortie to the south in 1941 and 1942.

EXPERTS INTIMIDATED

Only last October Admiral Louis Denfeld, Chief of Naval Operations, in answer to the questions of the House Armed Services Committee, expressed himself frankly and conscientiously on what defense weapons and strategy should be used. Had his advice been taken, America would today be better able to cope with the Korean war. But he was publicly reprimanded and removed from office. Immediately all expert opinion was intimidated and today it's an open secret that congressional committees cannot get completely independent views from high military chiefs.

One wonders how far toward the totalitarianism of communism and fascism Americans have drifted in their zeal for suppression of truth, especially when it is sought from experts in their particular fields. If the State Department alone can discuss defense of areas in different parts of the world where our forces are stationed, then the value of a Defense Department as an instrument of military advice may be questioned. If there are, as reported, major differences of opinion today between the State Department and the Defense Department, it must be because each is not permitted freedom of expression. There is no reason why the Defense Department shouldn't say what it thinks is a necessary defense program from the standpoint of national safety, and there is no reason why the State Department should not, if it wishes, argue against the wisdom of employing American forces in defense of those same areas—looking at it from a diplomatic standpoint.

The American people could then get all the facts and all the expert advice. But apparently there are some Americans who believe that everybody hereabouts should accept goose-stepping discipline and that even the press should refrain from printing news giving the statements of important persons if such statements do not conform to State Department policy.

Inexcusable Blunder Made by Justice Burton, of the Supreme Court of the United States

REMARKS

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, one of the most inexcusable blunders ever committed by an official of this Government was that committed by Justice Burton, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in his insult to the people of Mississippi a few days ago, when, without rhyme or reason, he issued a stay of execution in the case of Willie McGee, a Negro, who has been convicted three times of one of the most horrible, brutal, and beastly crimes ever committed by a human being.

We all realize the dangers of the Frankfurter cabal, and the damages its far-reaching tentacles have done, and are still doing. When I read this order issued by Justice Burton a few days ago, at the behest of a bunch of Communists, it made me wonder how far the influence of this cabal had gone in controlling the courts of the land.

Thomas Jefferson once said that if this Government was ever destroyed, it would be destroyed by the courts.

Now here are the facts in the Willie McGee case. Willie McGee was convicted of raping a white woman on November 2, 1945—almost 5 years ago. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court of Mississippi on the ground that public sentiment against that vicious outrage was so high that McGee could not get a fair trial in the county in which he committed the crime. The supreme court reversed the case and granted a change of venue. He was tried again before an impartial jury in another county, convicted, and sentenced to death. An appeal was taken to the supreme court of Mississippi again on the ground that there were no Negroes on the jury. The case was reversed, Negroes were placed on the jury, and the defendant was again unanimously convicted.

His case was again appealed to the Supreme Court of Mississippi and affirmed by that tribunal.

A petition for a stay of execution was then filed with the Supreme Court of the United States by a couple of New York lawyers, named Samuel Rosenwein and Arthur G. Silverman, who represent a Communist-front organization known as the Civil Rights Congress. The Supreme Court denied the petition for a stay of execution.

They then filed with the Supreme Court of the United States a petition for a writ of certiorari to have the case reviewed by that tribunal. That petition was denied, and the writ of certiorari refused.

Then after the Supreme Court had adjourned, a Communist lawyer from New York, named Bella S. Abzug, representing the so-called Civil Rights Congress—which was branded by the Attorney General of the United States as "subversive and Communist" and by the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives as being "dedicated to the defense of individual Communists and the Communist Party," this Bella S. Abzug, attorney for this Communist organization, filed with Justice Burton a petition asking for a stay of execution and a writ of certiorari, rehashing the same lying contention the Communists have been using throughout this long drawn-out proceeding.

Justice Burton simply went out of his way to issue this stay of execution at the request of this Communist-front organization—thereby doing the law abiding Negroes, as well as the white people, of Mississippi infinite harm.

These Communists are whining because this is a Negro that was convicted of raping a white woman. If he had been a white man and had been convicted of such a crime, he would have been executed long ago.

These Reds do not give a tinker's damn about the Negroes. They are just trying to stir up strife wherever they can.

Thomas Jefferson may have been right when he said that if this Government was ever destroyed it would be destroyed by the courts.

Moscow Peace Petition

OF

HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD relative to the Moscow peace petition, I include the following:

THE MOSCOW PEACE PETITION

A striking cartoon appearing recently in a morning paper—Washington Post, July 14—depicted a Soviet-type tank grinding over the body of a South Korean. A grinning officer leaned from the tank, dangling a scroll before his agonized victim. "By the way," he says, "have you signed our petition to outlaw new weapons?"

That cartoon is only a slight exaggeration of the truth. And the petition is no joke. It is part of an unparalleled Moscow propaganda offensive.

Over half the people of Korea are said to have signed that petition before the Red puppet forces unleashed their unprovoked attack on the Republic of Korea. That should satisfy anybody's mind as to how much peace there really is in the petition.

The same petition is being circulated all over the world, and America is no exception. There's a large-scale campaign going on here too. It's not by any means confined to Reds or fellow travelers. It is aimed at average, decent people in your town and mine.

That petition is made in Moscow. It has no other purpose on earth than to stir up confusion in the ranks of democracy, and to hide the infamous march of Red legions behind a smoke screen of peaceful protestations. It is an integral part of the Communist tactic of preaching peace and practicing war.

While most of us have been told about the true nature of the petition, or can see through it without too much trouble, a lot of Americans will be taken in by it unless they are warned.

I think that this peace petition ought to be publicized in every possible way, to assure that more innocent people will not be duped into aiding and abetting the Communist effort to conquer the world. We should let the American people know that every signature on that petition is a knife in the back of an American soldier in Korea.

I think moreover that the United States should take a stronger and more dynamic course in publicizing the ideals and the way of life which we are championing. It is worse than tragic to let the Communists steal and distort to their own ends such words as peace, liberty and democracy. It is a grave error to let the impression grow among oppressed peoples that the Soviet Union is the real proponent of peace, and more specifically, of international controls for atomic energy.

A brief look at the Soviet peace petition and the over-all propaganda program of which it is a part will indicate the serious nature of the offensive, and will point to ways of combating it.

Designed to weaken the free peoples' will to resist conquest by force or by subversion, the Moscow peace offensive works in these main ways:

It excites European fears that the rearmament program of the western powers will result in a lowering of living standards only now recovering from the war, that food and clothing will become increasingly hard to get, and that taxes will go sky-high. This attack of course is meant to reduce support for the joint defense effort in western Europe.

It stirs the universal fear of war, and particularly seeks to convince Europeans that western rearmament will provoke a war which will destroy Europe.

It preys upon the universal desire of people to end the nerve-wracking international tension.

Now let us consider the Moscow petition. The original copy was fabricated in Stockholm last March at the Red-dominated Congress of Partisans of Peace. It has become broadly known as the "Stockholm Petition," despite the bitter and disgusted objections of the Swedes. I think that out of courtesy to the Swedes and a simple desire for accuracy, Americans should clearly label this petition as the "Moscow Petition" from now on.

The petition calls for three things.

First, the unconditional abolition of atomic weapons;

Second, the institution of strict international controls;

Third, establishing that any government which first uses the atomic weapon against another shall be considered guilty of war crimes against humanity.

Translated into simple English, that petition reads: "Disruption, duplicity, and double-dealing." While it should be no surprise that the Communists engage in such practices, this simply worded petition has a surface innocence which belies its real meaning. Let us look a little closer.

Now everybody who reads the papers knows that the United States has been trying for 5 years to promote an effective international system of atomic control. We offered to give up all our tremendous advantage in the atomic field if nations would work out a fool-proof set-up of controls and inspection. We even developed a pilot plan. The UN took it over, improved it, and worked out an international plan which was approved by most of the nations of the world.

Among all the nations of the world, only the Soviet Union and four of its satellites vetoed against the plan.

Why did they reject the UN plan? We can guess. The UN plan would have made it impossible to build atom bombs in secret. It would have taken the ownership of atomic plants and materials out of the hands of individual nations, and so would have limited each nation's development of atomic energy. Finally, it would have allowed international teams free access to any country at any time. An international searchlight would have been thrown into all the dark corners of the Soviet regime.

So much for the demand of the Moscow petition for international control of atomic energy. Men in nations where information is uncensored, and those in slave states who are able to listen to the Voice of America or the UN radio will know who is the real opponent of international control of the atom. Communism is the opponent.

Now, what about the demand of the petition for the unconditional abolition of atomic weapons?

This is the standard Soviet counterproposal to the UN plan for atomic control. The line is that the Soviet Union cannot afford to become enmeshed in a world control system, undergo inspection, and so on, until the United States has given up its stockpile of bombs. The Soviets suggest, therefore, that all bombs be destroyed, the thoroughness of the job to be checked by the UN, and that after that has been done will be the proper time to negotiate an international plan. They are very vague about controls or inspection. They believe that control and policing of the atom should in the main be the responsibility of each nation—the Communist honor system, in other words.

The proposal for the total abolition of weapons as a condition to setting up a control system seems fairly obvious as to purpose. It is a demand impossible of fulfillment, since the free world cannot deprive itself of its major weapon without real reciprocity. It follows that the Soviet rulers do not now want a real control system. They block it by their proposal, and at the same time try to put the United States in the unflattering light of an aggressive and war-mongering nation.

The suggestion of the petition that the first nation to use an atomic weapon be considered a war criminal against humanity also has obvious implications.

From the Red standpoint the main fact about atomic energy today is that the United States has a lot more of it than the Soviet Union does. Our stockpiles of atomic weapons are probably the only thing preventing the launching of a flood of Red death around the world.

The Soviets have always hoped to neutralize this one military advantage of the democratic world. They have tried to do it by their counterproposals in the UN. They are trying to do it now with their propaganda campaign. If they could, for example, extract a statement that the United States will never drop the first bomb, they would win a great strategic victory. With the great deterrent effect of American atomic power neutralized, the Soviets or their satellites could mount conventional military attacks at will—Korea again all over the world. There would be almost nothing to stop them. Meanwhile, they would be doing their best to catch up with us in the development of atomic weapons.

Summing it up, here is what the Soviets probably hope to accomplish through this peace petition of theirs:

As mentioned, they would like to neutralize the advantage of the bomb by making its use indefensible in the view of world opinion.

They want to associate the idea of aggression with the atomic weapon, and to disassociate it from the real acts of aggression being carried on by the Communists.

They may want to build up a basis for claiming popular support for their atomic policy proposals to the UN.

They want to channelize non-Communist peace sentiment into the Partisans of Peace movement.

By these means they seek to contribute to over-all disruption—to turn democratic peoples against their own governments and policies; to encourage mutual distrust among free governments and peoples; and to trick non-Communists into abetting their efforts to sabotage western security measures through slow-ups, strikes and the like.

Now we have very good authority for the sabotage aspect of the Red petition. I cite an article from the Soviet newspaper Pravda by the Communist writer Leonid Sobelev. The article makes it clear that the phony peace appeal has purposes other than simply to outlaw the atom bomb.

Concerning the real implications of signing the petition, Mr. Sobelev had this to say:

> I vote against war—and this is not merely a matter of words. It means that I shall do my utmost to prevent war. I shall stop the trains; I shall refuse to unload the ships carrying war materials; I shall not supply fuel for the planes; I shall seize the arms of the mercenaries; I shall not allow my son or my husband to go to war; I shall deprive the ministers of food, drink, telephones, transport, and coal. Let those who are dragging us into the war do the fighting themselves.

That petition is a call to treason. The interpretation placed on the petition by the Kremlin, and being made known to Communists in other countries, is that it is a call for the creation of fifth columns in all free countries to sabotage both their economies and their defense preparations.

Further evidence as to the Moscow interpretation of the peace petition appears in a New York Times story of July 21. Needless to say, American Communists are not talking in public about the Kremlin interpretation of the phony peace petition. It would be very healthy if all Americans could read Mr. Sobelev's words.

The Moscow "petitions of peace" campaign is big and well ordered. Its goal is to gather three to four hundred million signatures. That is a lot of signatures, even figuring in the subjugated people who sign what they are told to sign. It adds up to a major and very effective propaganda stroke.

The campaign is about completed in North Korea and in eastern Europe, with over 60,000,000 signatures claimed. The Soviet Union claims over 90,000,000 names in its campaign at home. A campaign in Viet Nam and China has just got under way. In western Europe over 15,000,000 signatures are claimed. The most active campaigns are in France, 5,000,000 gathered to date, and Italy. These nations, as is well known, are particularly concerned with postwar problems and troubled by tough Communist minorities. Interestingly, Yugoslavia has been excluded from the "partisans of peace" group and is not taking part in the campaign. The Latin-American, African, and non-Communist Asian programs are just under way.

The Communist goal in the United States is 5,000,000 signatures. Estimated Communists and fellow travelers in the United States number about 500,000. That means that the Communists and their conscious friends hope to rope in about four and a half million unsuspecting Americans of unquestionable loyalty.

Although the Daily Worker and other Communist publications are promoting the propaganda drive, the Soviet Union is trying to camouflage its direction and the exclusively communistic nature of the campaign. However, the Communists here in the United States seem to be forced to work pretty much in the open with the aid of transparent Communist-front organizations.

Among these are the Peace Information Bureau in New York, the American Slav Congress, the National Labor Peace Conference connected with the international Partisans of Peace group, and the United States Youth Sponsoring Committee, World Peace Appeal, in New York. These groups have been most active in soliciting signatures around Philadelphia, New York City, and the west coast, though they have circulated petitions right here in Washington.

The United States campaign will conclude with a National Peace Congress in September at New York under the aegis of the American Slav Congress. Then a number of events are being lined up to dignify the later stages of the global campaign. A special jury will meet in August to study the nominations for three international awards for artistic works considered most effective in promoting world peace. The whole show will be rounded off by a gala World Peace Congress in the late fall, at which the Red propaganda effort will probably achieve new heights of activity.

With this information in hand, it is difficult not to see the possible gravity of the propaganda drive. In Berlin, where the citizens have perhaps a more intimate understanding of the meaning of communism than most of us here, the Communists distributing these petitions do so at the risk of life and limb. Here in America we should be looking for effective ways to counteract the Communist appeal.

Both a positive and a negative approach to the challenge are needed.

On the negative side, we must find ways of limiting directly the effectiveness of the campaign by exposing its real nature and purposes, and by giving it broad and unfavorable publicity.

We must brand it as a product of Moscow.

There is much we can do. For example, the big, well-organized Red signature drive in the United States obviously must cost a lot of money. Just where is that money coming from? That is a question which an alert Congress might be asking at this time. It might not be a bad idea to find out just who is sustaining this Communist drive at home at the same time that other Americans are sustaining with their lives an anti-Communist drive in Korea.

While the negative, debunking job is necessary, it should not be the main job. Why in the world must we and the other western democracies always be on the defensive in the battle of ideas and words with the Communists? Certainly, we are at a temporary disadvantage in having to fight cleanly and honestly against an unprincipled opponent. That does not mean that we have to fight with pillows, and with our eyes closed. The truth and the right are on the side of the democracies, and they must be used effectively.

We must fight hard and heads up, beating the Communists to the jump. We must push them on the defensive in this conflict of words—of truth against lies.

We cannot expect to succeed in beating the Communists at their own game if we refuse to invest time, money, and effort in our instruments for informing the world about our beliefs and activities. We cannot fight them effectively if we remain constantly on the defensive, able only to counterpunch against absurd, yet telling, accusations.

We must fight the big lie with the big truth.

Paying for the War in Korea

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following open letter published in the Pierce County (Nebr.) Leader for July 27, 1950:

AN OPEN LETTER TO PRESIDENT HARRY TRUMAN, SENATOR HUGH BUTLER, AND CONGRESSMAN KARL STEFAN AT WASHINGTON, D. C.

HONORABLE GENTLEMEN: A week ago Wednesday the majority of the families in this county gathered around their radios to hear the words of the President as he told of the seriousness of the communistic threat to the world and of the actions of the United States to meet this threat in Korea.

Now, a full week has gone by and folks have all had a chance to think over carefully the seriousness of that talk.

The general opinion of the residents in this county is wholehearted support of the "policing" decision in Korea. This decision is not a "flag-waving decision," but the result of careful consideration of the threat to the American way of life.

The people here in this county realize that this new war, or "policing," as you may want to call it, is going to bring tears and lifelong sorrows to many who will feel the loss of loved ones.

It is thoroughly understood that the Korean situation is not just a skirmish but a dreadful battle that will last 6 to 9 months or perhaps a year.

The people of Pierce County are ready and willing to do their part. The job that falls upon this county is furnishing manpower in forming an army and navy to serve our country. Probably the second largest contribution by the county will be the raising of foodstuffs. For this job the county is well equipped and fully experienced.

Perhaps some of our folks will enter defense plants, move their families to larger communities, and aid in the building of tanks, airplanes, and other implements of war.

There is one other part that the citizens of Pierce County will be called upon to do to win this war—that is, to help pay our share of the financial burden.

The President, in his radio talk, mentioned the tremendous cost of armament and preparedness. Perhaps we may grumble somewhat, but if by digging deeper into our pockets we can better equip our soldiers and perhaps speed up the day of final victory, we will be proud to furnish our dollars.

Veterans of World Wars I and II have carefully explained the needs of good clothing and good food and good armament to build a good army. Do not spare any expense in making our Armed Forces the best equipped in this world today.

There is one small request we would like to make of our President, Mr. Truman, and of Mr. BUTLER and Mr. STEFAN. You three gentlemen are the voice in Washington for Pierce County, and with the power of that voice will you see that the dollars sent from Pierce County are spent wisely? Furnish our Armed Forces with everything they need or can use, but for the duration of this warlike unrest, let's curtail drastically or eliminate entirely all the many Federal projects that take so many tax dollars today.

We are expecting a heavy tax burden that is going to hurt, but this pain will amount to little or nothing if we know these dollars will shorten the war and save lives of the men and boys in our Armed Forces.

A new post-office building or two, or perhaps a new Federal building, can easily be postponed until after this war. We agree slum clearances are fine things, but put these plans in the bottom drawer of your desks until peace once more is here.

Perhaps a new river dike or a new bridge needs Federal assistance—just let it wait until the war is over. We know we will have to postpone many of our personal plans during this emergency, and as our representatives in Washington we sincerely ask that you make the same plans to postpone Federal projects that can wait.

When this Nation is at war politics is an issue that should be forgotten. Hammer the lid tight on that well-known pork barrel and direct our dollars to where they will do the most good.

Through excellent equipment may the lives of many American men be spared. With the efforts of Pierce County citizens and with our financial assistance may this war be a short one. With your help in Washington to see our dollars well directed may the day of peace and the ceasing of bloodshed be hastened.

BILL COX.

Hon. William J. Green, Jr., of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, it affords me a great deal of pleasure to say a few kind words about my good friend and colleague, and to place before the House the words of praise for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Honorable WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR., of the Fifth District, written by my friend, Elihu D. Stone, of the American Zionist Council, because of my deep personal interest in Zionism and the Republic of Israel.

That Mr. GREEN is a warm personal friend, as well as a colleague, adds further to my pleasure. Mr. Speaker, we all know that in the gentleman's service in the House of Representatives he has shown himself worthy of the honor bestowed by his constituents. He has proved himself alert, well informed, devoted to humanitarian legislation of merit, and dedicated to the noblest aims of representative government, while never stultifying his record or his personality by being ostentatious—in other words, he is able, energetic, decisive, but never a "stuffed shirt." He is a man among men, a man who has strong convictions and who has the courage to stand up for them.

I am very happy to include in the RECORD, under leave, as part of my remarks, the letter addressed to the gentleman by Mr. Stone on June 20, to which I have already referred:

AMERICAN ZIONIST COUNCIL,
WASHINGTON BUREAU.

Hon. WILLIAM J. GREEN, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN GREEN: The joint declaration by the Government of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France, relative to the Near East, which was made public by the President on May 25, is a significant document which may lead to the establishment of peaceful relationship between Israel and its Arab neighbors if honestly carried out.

Your kind and effective cooperation in urging our State Department to take action for the purpose of promoting peace and tranquillity in the Near East is deeply appreciated.

The said declaration as I analyze it contains the following points:

1. For the first time in modern history the Big Three—the United States, England, and France—agreed on concerted and coordinated action in that sensitive region of the world—the Near East. It is a wholesome substitute for the pursuit of the hitherto policy of unilateral action resulting very often in conflicting action. It imposes collective responsibility.

2. The calling for a pledge on the Arab countries and Israel to refrain from any and every aggressive or warlike action against one another as a condition precedent to the future delivery of arms should serve to discourage the Arab warmongers.

3. The pledge by the Big Three to place Israel in a condition of equality and parity with the Arab States with reference to delivery of arms, and the establishment of a balance of arms ' tween them, if honestly carried out, should serve as an encouragement toward establishment of permanent peace between the Arab States and Israel.

4. The unequivocal declaration by the Big Three of their opposition to the development of an arms race between the Arab States and Israel implies a policy of vigilant watchfulness obligating the Big Three to stop the shipment of arms whenever the threat of such an arms race manifests itself.

5. The Big Three pledged themselves to take immediate and joint action whenever and wherever a threat to peace in that section of the world may appear. They agreed to take such joint action within and outside the United Nations. The term "outside" is most decisive. It implies speedy and prompt action by the Big Three to prevent a threat of aggression from being converted into actual aggression.

Like any other similar document this declaration will not execute itself. It is as strong as the reliability of its authors and no more.

We assume and we must assume that the Big Three—the United States, England, and France—acted and will continue to act in good faith.

However, in the light of past sad experiences and disappointments, we must rely upon the vigilance of the friends of Israel like your good self to see to it that the Department of State carries out honestly the terms of the said Big Three declaration.

As you well know, the past record of the Near East Division of our Department of State is one of unfriendliness to Israel. The "Bevin" line dominated Your noble services to the cause of Israel will always be remembered. The Jewish people are a grateful people; they never forget their friends.

You, dear Congressman, have proven yourself to be a true and tested friend.

With kindest regards and best wishes.

Sincerely,

ELIHIU D. STONE.

Lee Pressman Is Hard Pressed

OF

HON. EDWARD T. MILLER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCRIVNER] called attention this morning to the fact that the American people are entitled to know how it came about that Mr. Lee Pressman and other avowed one-time Communists, obtained high positions in the Federal service. I think the American people suspect the answer.

Be that as it may, the Sun, of Baltimore, in an editorial contained in its edition of yesterday, sets forth some of the results that have followed the activities of men of this stamp while in the employ of our Federal Government.

THOSE EARLY NEW DEAL AGRARIANS WHO LEARNED FARMING FROM K. MARX

Ever since the New Dealers first arrived in Washington there has been a partiality among them for the asphalt-concrete type of farm expert. Men who did their farming in penthouse window boxes, and their farm thinking in Park Avenue cocktail parties were numerous in all the early New Deal farm offices. Among them, Mr. Lee Pressman now tells us, was a high concentration of farmers whose agricultural lore consisted largely of what they had picked up from Karl Marx.

To men of this stripe, the Abts, the Kramers, the Witts, and the Pressmans, the American farmer was a peasant in thrall to finance capital. His salvation lay in putting him in thrall as soon as possible to the sidewalk-and-asphalt farmers who were working up farm plans at the Washington cocktail parties. In small brick houses in Georgetown and in the air-cooled offices of the Agriculture and other Departments, these Marxoid agrarians mapped out little-pig massacres, plow-under deals, support-price programs, all with an eye cocked as much on harvesting votes as on harvesting comestibles.

It has taken just under 20 years for Mr. Pressman to work out from under these delusions (taking him at his word that he really has done so at last). Let us remember that Mr. Wallace, under whose secretaryship of agriculture these Marxoid infestations first began, has himself only just announced that he now sees through Stalin's tricks. In all Mr. Wallace's public life there has never been a whisper of graft in the sense of political corruption. But the efforts in Mr. Wallace's tenure to graft red communism onto the sturdy plant of American agriculture will rank as one of the big farm busts of all time.

The Need Is for Effective Security Loans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REVA BECK BOSONE

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mrs. BOSONE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer of August 31, 1950:

THE NEED IS FOR EFFECTIVE SECURITY LAWS

The United States Government, and specifically the branch principally concerned, the FBI, should have at its command every legislative tool that is needed to cope with the Communists and other subversives.

To that end the President and Congress should join in securing new and amended laws that would plug up existing loopholes in our security set-up.

But emphatically not wanted are laws that would handicap instead of help; laws that would be ineffective; laws that would prove unconstitutional; laws that would impose police state measures contrary to democratic principles.

There is grave danger that in its haste to establish new curbs on espionage Congress may overstep the bounds both of practicality and constitutionality.

President Truman did not help the situation when he submitted to Congress a program to combat subversive activity that obviously fell short of the need. As a result the House quickly framed a much more stringent set of laws which have now been passed by an overwhelming majority and sent to the Senate.

The over-all objective of this bill is good, but the means of attaining it are open to question.

The bill pins its hope of controlling subversive activity mainly upon a new requirement for the registration of all members of the Communist Party and of so-called Communist-front organizations.

Being required to register may impose some inconvenience upon card-carrying members of the Communist Party, but it cannot make them any less Communists or restrict their activities on behalf of Communist aims.

And it leaves untouched the large number of persons who are not members of the party but who follow its line and do its bidding as part of its underground forces and as Communist sympathizers.

It is said on behalf of the proposed regulation that it would help identify Communists and thus make them more easily subject to surveillance. But those who would register are already known as Communists. They are members of the out-in-the-open group already, and whether they register or not, they are easily recognized as Communists.

The proposed bill will not affect the great bulk of the pro-Communist force in this country, who deny they are party members, who mask their activities and affiliations and who would continue to work just as zealously against this Nation after the new measure is passed.

In addition, the law would require Communists to register as agents of what it terms an outright international conspiracy to overthrow democracy throughout the world. This provision bears all the earmarks of self-incrimination and on that basis is likely to label the bill as unconstitutional when and if it gets before the courts.

Back of the proposed measure is an old fallacy concerning Communists—that identifying them and removing them from membership in the party will make them any less Communists.

Some of the provisions of the House-approved bill are sound, including those that would establish stiffer punishments for Government employees who seek to give Government information to foreign agents, and extend the time in which espionage prosecution may be started.

But reliance on Communist registration as a curb on anti-American activity is a mistake.

The Senate should look into this subject more closely than the House has done. It should call before it representatives of the Department of Justice and particularly J. Edgar Hoover, head of the FBI, and ask them to present the problem of subversives and to say what is needed to cope with it.

Handling Communists and pro-Communists and their threat to national security is an FBI responsibility. Whatever that agency wants in new legislation and new authority should be granted immediately. But it is folly to pass laws that are ineffective, unworkable, and unconstitutional.

Adjournment of Congress

OF

HON. FOSTER FURCOLO

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to urge the membership against even considering recess or adjournment at this time. There are many questions that must first be considered. I shall not list them all because I think it should suffice to mention only two—the consideration of an excess-profits tax and full military preparedness, among others. We should stay in session.

Formosa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George Rothwell Brown, from the Washington Times-Herald for August 30, 1950:

POLITICAL PARADE

(By George Rothwell Brown)

General MacArthur, now wearing the gag of the civilian bureaucracy in Washington, has nonetheless, by a happy accident, been able to reveal to the American people the peril inherent in further adherence to Truman-Acheson defeatism in Formosa.

Like a good soldier the great general who is directing the war in Korea obeyed his Commander in Chief.

He withdrew his message of solemn warning of national danger addressed to the Veterans of Foreign Wars in Chicago.

The accident which prevented this danger signal from being suppressed and kept from public knowledge was the fact that this message, prematurely printed in a national magazine, was in the mails on a Sunday, when it was too late to stop its distribution.

On such narrow chances do the fates of kingdoms sometimes depend. Man proposes, and God disposes.

On January 2 of this year former President Hoover and Senator TAFT demanded that the United States protect Formosa, by force if necessary. They still could speak out the truth.

But our high command has been silenced, intimidated and reduced in rank for daring to differ with State Department policy.

MacArthur's rift in the curtain of secrecy came at an opportune time.

From now on it will be impossible to deceive the American people as to the true American policy in Asia. They now know that their lives and their safety depend upon backing MacArthur's opinion to the hilt.

Since this apparently is not the administration's intent it devolves upon Congress as a vital responsibility to see to it that MacArthur's views must be carried out.

General MacArthur's message to the veterans is a message to everybody, East and West.

But there is a sentence in his concluding remarks about the necessity of preventing Formosa from falling into enemy hands which is a matter of life and death to the Pacific coast and the Mountain States, where sentiment for MacArthur, already soaring, will be swept to new heights of esteem and confidence. He said:

"It (to lose Formosa) would shift any future battle area 5,000 miles eastward to the coasts of our American continent, our own home coast."

The easterner, whether civilian or serving in Congress, is apt to think of national security from Communist attack in terms of certain big cities, New York, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit, and Washington.

It is not until the traveler from the eastern seaboard reaches our west coast that he realizes fully how near the war in Korea really is, what little stands between that exposed and vulnerable part of our country, and hostile planes and fleets of submarines.

In driving home this thought with all the prestige of our greatest living military genius behind it, MacArthur has rendered one of the most signal services of his brilliant career.

He has made it clear to the dullest mind that if the fatal Acheson-Lattimore policy, involving the writing off of Formosa and its surrender to communism were adhered to, the next stage of world war III would be fought on the coasts of Alaska, Washington, Oregon, and California.

Our task then wold be, not a police action to drive a few bandits back up to the Korean peninsula—which we have not yet been able to do—but to repel an invasion of our own mainland.

In this western region, so much more acutely aware of the proximity of the war which the Kremlin is waging against us than is the eastern section, eight States will elect nine United States Senators in November and a great number of Representatives in Congress.

MacArthur may be gagged. But any attempt to discipline him would be the signal for the defeat of every Democratic candidate from Senator down to town constable in every one of these States, to say nothing of the rest of the country.

The Washington bureaucracy may bare its fangs at Douglas MacArthur, but it will not dare to bite.

MacArthur and Formosa

OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Walter Lippmann, from the Washington Post of August 30, 1950:

TODAY AND TOMORROW—MACARTHUR AND FORMOSA

(By Walter Lippmann)

With the Seventh Fleet under orders from the President to prevent any attack on Formosa, just what is it that has aroused General MacArthur? What has caused him to decide that it is "in the public interest" that he should at this time make a public issue of Formosa between himself and the President of the United States? That is an unusual thing for a general to do. In fact, it is very unusual indeed.

General MacArthur, quite plainly, is not satisfied with the President's decision of June 27 to prevent "the occupation of Formosa by Communist forces" and to let "the determination of the future status of Formosa * * * await the restoration of security in the Pacific, a peaceful settlement with Japan, or consideration by the United Nations."

General MacArthur wants to do more than to prevent the occupation of Formosa by Communist forces. He wants to have the future of Formosa determined now, and to have it determined by this country unilaterally, and to have it determined in a way which calls for a reversal of the pledges given by the President of the United States to the United Nations.

On June 27 the Security Council received a formal statement from the President which said:

"In order that there may be no doubt in any quarter about our intentions regarding Formosa, I wish to state that the United States has no territorial ambitions whatever concerning that island, nor do we seek for ourselves any special position or privilege on Formosa.

"The present military neutralization of Formosa is without prejudice to political questions affecting that island. Our desire is that Formosa not become embroiled in hostilities disturbing to the peace of the Pacific and that all questions affecting Formosa be settled by peaceful means as envisaged in the Charter of the United Nations."

This pledge of our intentions was repeated and amplified on August 25 in a letter by Mr. Austin to the Secretary General of the United Nations.

General MacArthur's statement is directed against the President's promise that we have no territorial ambitions whatever concerning Formosa and that we do not "seek for ourselves any special position or privilege on Formosa." General MacArthur wants a very special position on Formosa. He wants nothing less in fact than the permanent use of Formosa as an American air base. Formosa is an essential link, he argues in language designed to make us beloved by all mankind, in an "island chain" from which "we can dominate with air power every Asiatic port from Vladivostok to Singapore." General MacArthur is demanding that we establish a military protectorate over Formosa and that the island should be incorporated into a permanent American strategic system embracing the entire Pacific Ocean "to the shore of Asia."

This, then, is the issue which General MacArthur has chosen to raise between himself and the President, that we demand Formosa for ourselves—repudiating and reversing the Cairo declaration and our formal statement of purposes made when the United Nations voted the resolutions under which we are acting, in Korea. General MacArthur does not say what we should do when the Security Council reminds us of our pledges.

General MacArthur's strategic argument itself, even when it is stripped—as he strips it—of all moral and political considerations, is not clear to me. The General says, first, that in our hands we can from Formosa and the island chain dominate with air power every Asiatic port from Vladivostock to Singapore. Obviously he must have meant to say that we can "dominate" every Asiatic port if we dominate the air between the island chain and the Asiatic ports. But suppose we do not have complete air supremacy at all times and everywhere. That could be. What then? Then Formosa might be dominated from the mainland and Formosa might be knocked out and Okinawa might be knocked out and Japan might be knocked out if that is also to be part of the island chain.

If American planes can fly from Formosa and Okinawa to Asiatic ports, then Asiatic planes can fly from Asiatic fields to Formosa and Okinawa. In our hands these advanced islands would be a strategic asset if we had certain control of the air. They would be a strategic liability if the local air defenses could be knocked out.

All that part of General MacArthur's argument which is devoted to showing the advantages of our holding these advanced bases rests on the assumption that there will be no powerful air force on the mainland of Asia. That is surely true. Formosa can be defended from the mainland if there is no strong air force on the mainland. Thus the Seventh Fleet can probably prevent the seizure of Formosa as long as the Chinese Communists do not have a strong air force. If they had one and were willing to use it, the position of the Seventh Fleet would be exceedingly uncomfortable.

Yet when General MacArthur turns to the disadvantages of letting Formosa fall to the Communists, he reverses his assumption and shows what they could do from Formosa if they had a powerful air force based on Formosa. What puzzles me in his argument is why we should suppose that they would have no air force if we held Formosa, but that they would have a big air force if they held Formosa. Surely, if they had the air force to knock out friendly installations in the Philippines from Formosa, then they have the air force to knock out friendly installations on Formosa.

Is not Formosa much nearer to China than the Philippines are to Formosa? Why, then, does the General think we can defend Formosa more securely than we can defend the Philippines?

Speech of Hon. Rush D. Holt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

SPEECH OF SENATOR RUSH D HOLT BEFORE THE WEST VIRGINIA STATE REPUBLICAN COMMITTEE, CHARLESTON, AUGUST 12, 1950

I believe in the two party system and party responsibility. I recognize the necessity of party organization to discharge that responsibility. I propose to work with the State and national organizations of the Republican Party—as just one member of a patriotic team—in stopping the determined effort of the Washington bureaucrats to take America further down the road to socialism and ruin.

While I am a firm believer in these principles, I want to make it clear that I do not believe any man should surrender his personal convictions to the extent that he blindly and sheepishly follows any party leadership, especially when he is convinced that the policies of such leadership threaten the destruction of our country and the freedom of the individual citizen. If I had been willing to surrender these convictions I would not be here today. Instead I would be wearing the meaningless label of the Democratic Party marching down the destructive road of national socialism and blundering incompetence.

Taunts as to party change will not deter me from my obligation. With the best judgment I know, and after searching my soul, I changed my registration. I apologize to no one for doing what my conscience told me to be right.

Never in our history has there been such a challenge in government as there is today with so little ability in Washington to solve it.

America was not built by men who stood at the free lunch counter. She grew and prospered because our fathers and mothers were willing to work and had faith. They recognized that progress comes when thrift, labor and initiative are respected and rewarded.

Political promises are a dime a dozen in Washington, but we have reached a crisis where America must have more than promises. The boys in Korea were sent over there with a promise—and that's all. They found that promises would not meet the Communist tanks. American people are promised that in the next century we are going to see everyone happy and wealthy. This is a noble objective but few of us see the logic of giving up what we have today for the glibly made promise of the future.

We know the record of the promisers. We know that confusion and jealousy seep from every agency, board, department, bureau, and commission. We know that the bureaucratic method of doing a job the hard way in the wrong direction has not delivered. We have watched the placing of men who have been failures in private ventures telling successful men how to run their businesses. We have seen business stifled with red tape and regulation. We know that we are overtaxed, overregulated, and overgoverned. We know their promises mean little or nothing.

They overwork the word "security" and fail to tell the people that they want their liberties as a price of security. If one is interested only in security and does not care the price he pays for it, he should enter a penitentiary where he has free food, free rent, free medicine, free clothes, security at a maximum, but at what a price.

We favor security but we know that our free enterprise system has brought more security to more people in less time than any economic system devised by man. We know our progress has not been at the expense of our liberty but that with it came greater liberty. This we must keep.

The plans of the schemers were divulged when they started to put over socialized medicine. They grasped for the right to control the doctor. We cannot fail this challenge and we must stand up for the men of medicine, who have given us brilliant medical achievements, who have prolonged our lives, who have made our living healthier and happier, and not allow these to be supplanted by political medicine men. We will join with the physicians as they work toward more and better medical care. We do not intend to have every illness a happy hunting ground for a government snooper nor do we intend to keep our physicians from practicing medicine while they fill out forms for Oscar Ewing in his grandiose political scheme.

The cost of living has doubled and in many cases trebled. Hidden in that cost of living is the high cost of government, resultant from an overstuffed payroll. To reduce the cost of living, we should reduce the cost of government.

We will not make regulated puppets and criminals out of our farmers under the Brannan plan.

The planners through their reciprocal-trade agreement program have thrown our West Virginia miners out of their jobs, idled our glass factories, caused unemployment in the pottery industry. Even when they were advised of the damage done, they made nice speeches about interest in these men but did nothing to correct the situation. They knew that such "winking" was of no value but they felt it would deceive those injured. Let us be protectionists, not alone for the jobs of our workingmen, but for their freedom.

Our domestic confusion is bad enough but when it is coupled with stupidity and the appeasing of communism in our foreign affairs, it is time for a change.

We must have a national administration more interested in GI Joe than in being friendly to "good Old Joe." The Korean tragedy where our boys are being killed and wounded is just another incident in pitiful handling of our interests. We recall Yalta, Potsdam, and Tehran. We cannot fail to remember that our Asiatic policy was influenced by Owen Lattimore. We cannot overlook the desertion of Poland, Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia and many other lands. We cannot forget the sell-out of China to the Reds. Men who do those things do not deserve our confidence.

While communism marches in the open in Europe and Asia, it slyly and effectively infiltrates to weaken us here. We see a congressional committee search for ways to defend the Communist infiltration rather than expose it. We must quit coddling communism and Communist fellow travelers.

All clear thinking citizens must join in the cause of saving America, here and abroad. These issues are beyond parties. They call for the best in all of us.

The Republican Party is the minority party in West Virginia. Its success will depend upon the independent vote. Our hope of success rests upon proving to the people that we will be sound and progressive. The Republican Party must not shy from that word progressive because it has been misused by crackpots and political shysters.

We will favor a decent assistance program, freed from the control of ward heelers. We will favor social security in its full meaning not as a scheme to get votes. We will accept our responsibilities for social and economic gains as honorable men and women not as cheap politicians. Our progressivism will give the most for the day without destroying the seed corn for the future. The people want us to be, and we will be, forward looking—based upon the sound precepts and lessons of the past.

Let us not hedge. Let us not dodge. Let us not be cowardly. Let us stand up and be counted for America against these revolutionaries who want not a new order but a return to the discarded bureaucratic mess of old Rome.

Many Democrats have not crossed the Rubicon, but they are ready to do so. This is their country, and they love it. They cannot long remain with those who have destroyed their once great party by making it an instrument of corrupt political machines, of power-crazed bureaucrats, of pinks and reds, of inept political hacks. Their party has been kidnaped. They do not like the security of our country being held up until the administration tries to get Mon Walgren, the champion pool player, from behind the eight ball. They cannot stand the perfumed smell of Johnny Maragon. They cannot escape the chill of the "deep freeze" of the bemedaled Harry Vaughn. The best way for real Democrats to regain their party is to repudiate those who have misused it.

I have two wonderful children. They deserve the opportunities and liberties I have been given. These bright-eyed youngsters cannot defend themselves. We cannot mortgage their future and the future of all children by deficit financing and reckless spending. I owe it to them as a parent and as an American to enlist in the cause of saving this country. To do less is cowardly.

We must win for America. We must not pussyfoot nor conduct a me-too campaign. We cannot outpromise the promisers. We cannot outdeal the experienced dealers in Washington. We have the greatest cause in the world, the preservation of the greatest country in the world. Let's stand with thousands of independents and save our country from communism, corruption, and confusion.

Our founding fathers had confidence in America and faith in God. As they closed the Declaration of Independence they wrote: "And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." May God guide us in our solemn duty and to the solution of our affairs. I pledge myself to such a cause.

Who Is Propagandizing Whom (From the United Nations Forum)?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks I am inserting in the RECORD, under unanimous consent, a portion of a broadcast by Henry J. Taylor, a noted economist, author and journalist, sponsored by General Motors, in which he has answered certain questions propounded to him.

ANNOUNCER. Mr. Taylor, where do we stand now in the UN?

Mr. TAYLOR. Very badly, I think. It does seem, too, that we ought to do something about it.

Once more we are looking at our surface victories, instead of our deeper defeats. Certainly, there is a limit to the number of mistakes we can afford.

I went out to the Security Council meeting last week.

You should sit there and see Malik, as president of the Security Council, flicking specks off his soft gray sleeve, doodling with his pencil at the Council table under the klieg lights, and tying up the whle UN all the while—as did Molotov, as did Vishinsky. You should see them strut to their slick limousines, moving with their swarms of bulging Russian MVD guards—and filling our country with spies all the while.

Then you would wonder how insulted and outwitted we have to be—and for how long—before we come to our senses.

We are told that all this voting performance has been a big victory for us. But I don't see it.

MALIK'S AUDIENCE

Speaking from the UN platform to the world—in all languages and in blazing words—Russia calls the United States the foreign aggressor against the natives in Korea. She repeats it meeting after meeting, hour after hour.

Yet not once have we had nerve enough even to name the Soviet Union as involved. Nor have we ever called Russia the real aggressor, although everyone in the UN knows that is true.

But, remember, Malik was not talking to us or for us. He was, and is, talking for natives of Asia, where the majority of the people in this world somehow dwell—and for many people in Europe as well.

The night after the North Korean attack, when the degree of resistance by South Koreans was the question, I attempted to point this out: "All over the world we will have to learn that we can put a gun on the shoulder of a Korean, a Chinese, a Philippine, or what have you. But the gun will not be used effectively to resist communism unless the man with the American gun on his shoulder understands why the gun is there, and believes that it is better for him to die than to be under Communist control."

While Stalin fights us in the field with stooges tonight, Malik in the UN serves to decrease the effective anti-Communist will to fight in large bodies of people in other vast areas of the world—no matter how many arms we supply them.

All this is of direct military importance, and that's what Stalin has his eye on. Malik is putting mud in the nozzles of guns we gave others in Korea, in Formosa, the Philippines, Burma, Siam, and many places in Europe.

ANOTHER ACT OF AGGRESSION

The Soviet Union was thrown out, expelled as an aggressor from the League of Nations on December 14, 1939, for its shameful attack on little Finland.

If the Korean situation is important enough to be officially recognized by 53 of the UN as an act of aggression, then Russia should be thrown out of the UN too, as an aggressor against Korea. Further, all her satellite stooges should be thrown out with her—and the sooner, the better.

AN INCONGRUOUS SET-UP

Having Russia inside the UN, with her delegate, Malik, the President of the UN Security Council, is like having Earl Browder or Harry Bridges on the Board of Directors of the FBI.

Nothing will be accomplished toward peace or toward effective unity among anti-Communist nations in the UN so long as Russia is in the UN—using it as Russia has always used it, for Russia's own purposes.

The UN is the one best hope we have for international collaboration. But the UN, as a body striving effectively for security in the world, can really function only if it consists of an association of nations whose objectives are truly the same.

When you mix with the pigs you get your hands dirty. Our hands will be dirty, our positions will be inconsistent, our policies will be confused and ineffective, so long as we mix with the Stalin stooges in the UN.

The same thing holds true for the whole UN For Stalinist mem'ership is at war with the declared purposes of the entire organization.

On such questions as the recognition of Communist China, for example, the Soviet can use the UN to tie us up in a knot—or to split us and force us to quarrel with allies—while Stalin sits back and laughs all the while.

They're devils, these people. The UN flag is tainted by the red sickle.

Fifty-three free anti-Communist countries have stood up and been counted as against the aggression in Korea. Let them now stand up and throw out the aggressor.

This would have nothing whatever to do with Russia going to war or not going to war. Stalin will proceed to general war or not, depending entirely on whether he thinks he can win in world battle and bust the United States.

RED MOCKERY

The name Security Council is a mockery. For it offers no security with Russia in it.

Even the name United Nations is a mockery. For they are not united, and cannot be united as it is.

To pull this UN platform from under this propagandizing aggressor, throw him out, is the one last hope for effective unity and stability among those left in—the anti-Communist nations truly interested in cooperation and peace. For together they stand and divided they fall.

We have nothing to lose and everything to gain by lifting the UN to a truly moral level for the anti-Communist unity of the world.

Lincoln Never Said That

OF

HON. STEPHEN M. YOUNG

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article from Harper's magazine of May 1950, regarding certain quotations which are attributed to Lincoln. The author, Albert A. Woldman, is director of industrial relations of the State of Ohio and a noted authority on Abraham Lincoln.

LINCOLN NEVER SAID THAT

(By Albert A. Woldman)

(As author of Lawyer Lincoln, Albert Woldman is frequently called on to answer questions about Lincoln. He has a scholar's zeal for getting at the truth.)

Abraham Lincoln, who gave the world the Gettysburg and inaugural addresses, the Bixby letter, and many other, equally familiar masterpieces of rhetoric and wisdom, never had a ghost writer while he was alive. But in the 85 years since his assassination, self-appointed ghost writers by the score have been improving his messages to suit their own purposes, revising or paraphrasing what he did say or even putting new, made-to-order sentiments in his mouth.

So universal has the fame of the prairie philosopher-President become that whenever the protagonist of a controversial issue can support his views with a pointed saying of Lincoln's he considers his case just about clinched. Like the Scriptures, Lincoln's words are quoted to prove or disprove almost every political, economic and social issue of the day. The only difficulty is, a lot of the words aren't Lincoln's.

When, recently, Congresswoman FRANCES P. BOLTON, of Ohio, rose in the House of Representatives to invoke Abraham Lincoln as an opponent of the welfare state, and Look magazine subsequently reprinted as an editorial the Lincoln "quotations" she used, better informed readers sharply called both the Congresswoman and Look to task and the story found its way into the pages of Time. Lincoln never said:

"You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift.

"You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong.

"You cannot help the wage earner by pulling down the wage payer.

"You cannot further the brotherhood of man by encouraging class hatred.

"You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich.

"You cannot establish sound security on borrowed money.

"You cannot keep out of trouble by spending more than you earn.

"You cannot build character and courage by taking away man's initiative and independence.

"You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves."

There was no reason for Lincoln to say any of these things in his time, and, as Congresswoman BOLTON and Look might have realized, the words do not ring true. They were made to order for present-day consumption.

The history of these quotations is a good example of how new Lincolnisms come into being, are repeated and accepted as authentic. Congresswoman BOLTON inserted them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD after Galen Drake, the radio broacaster, used them in one of his programs last November. Drake got them from the house organ of a New Jersey manufacturing company where the editor had printed them without checking their authenticity.

Had any one of these three checked carefully, they would have found that the Reverend Mr. William J. H. Boetcker, a clergyman now residing in Erie, Pa., and not Abraham Lincoln, was the author of the lines. In 1916, more than a half century after Lincoln's death, Boetcker, who had given up his pulpit to lecture on industrial relations, published a booklet entitled Inside Maxims which contained these gold nuggets:

We cannot strengthen the weak
By weakening the strong.
We cannot help the poor
By kicking the rich.

In a subsequent pamphlet (1st edition 1917, 2d edition 1945) Boetcker wrote The Industrial Decalogue: Ten Don'ts. Among the don'ts were the maxims:

"You cannot help men prudently by doing for them what they should and could do for themselves.

"You cannot keep out of trouble by spending more than your income nor can you establish sound security on borrowed money.

"You cannot further the brotherhood of man by spreading class hatred and preach the gospel of management's hatred against labor."

In still a third pamphlet, published in 1938, Boetcker added such sentiments as:

"We cannot help small men by keeping big men down.

"We cannot help the wage earner by holding the wage payer down."

A few years ago the Committee for Constitutional Government, with headquarters in New York City, distributed by the hundred thousands a leaflet captioned "Lincoln on Limitations." One side of the leaflet carried an authentic Lincoln statement; on the reverse side were Boetcker's 10 points. A footnote credited the 10 points to the inspiration of William J. H. Boetcker. However, the publication of Lincoln's and Boetcker's words together caused someone—erroneously or through wishful thinking—to attribute Boetcker's maxims to Lincoln. Once started, the fake Lincolnisms joined the great flood of other, equally spurious quotations.

Speaking at an American Federation of Labor dinner in honor of the late Samuel Gompers, Vice President ALBEN BARKLEY not long ago remarked that Gompers clearly believed with all his heart in Abraham Lincoln's dictum that "All that serves labor serves the Nation."

The Vice President was quoting the first sentence of an often repeated Lincoln declaration on labor which contains these un-Lincoln-like lines:

"All that harms labor is treason to America. No line can be drawn between these two. If any man tells you he loves America, yet hates labor, he is a liar. If any man tells you he trusts America, yet fears labor, he is a fool. There is no America without labor, and to fleece the one is to rob the other."

This alleged Lincoln statement was featured in full in the February 1943 issue of a labor journal which published the words on its cover, below a picture of the Great Emancipator. But Lincoln never said that, either. He never used the words "liar" and "fool" in referring to people who disagreed with him. No better proof of the phoniness of this quotation can be offered than Lincoln's actual words about labor on two separate occasions.

In a speech at New Haven on March 6, 1860, alluding to the strike of the shoe-factory workers of Lynn, Mass., Lincoln said:

"I am glad to see that a system of labor prevails in New England under which laborers can strike when they want to, where they are not obliged to work under all circumstances, and are not tied down and obliged to labor whether you pay them or not. I like the system which lets a man quit when he wants to, and wish it might prevail everywhere."

In a message to Congress in 1861, he expressed his views on the relationships between employers and employees in these words:

"Labor is prior to and independent of capital. Capital is only the fruit of labor, and could never have existed if labor had not first existed. Labor is the superior of capital, and deserves much the higher consideration. Capital has its rights, which are as worthy of protection as any other rights. Nor it is denied that there is and probably always will be a relation between labor and capital producing mutual benefits."

A widely circulated, completely fabricated Lincoln "quotation" is a vicious anti-Catholic diatribe which bigots like to repeat for propaganda purposes. During a recent resurgence of religious hatred it was printed on a pamphlet embellished with a pen-and-ink sketch of the Civil War President and entitled "Lincoln's Warning":

"I do not pretend to be a prophet. But though not a prophet, I see a very dark cloud on our horizon. That dark cloud is coming from Rome. It is filled with tears of blood. It will rise and increase till its flanks will be torn by a flash of lightning, followed by a fearful peal of thunder. Then a cyclone such as the world has never seen will pass over the country, spreading ruin and desolation from north to south. After it is over, there will be long days of peace and prosperity; for Popery with its Jesuits and merciless Inquisition will have been forever swept away from our country. Neither I nor you, but our children, will see these things."

This passage was originally copied from a book by Charles Chiniquy, a recusant Catholic priest, expelled from the church. Lincoln as a lawyer once defended Chiniquy against a slander charge. From this chance acquaintanceship Chiniquy years later—at the height of Lincoln's fame—boasted of intimate friendship with him and wrote a fantastic account of how Lincoln confided to him in the most unreserved fashion his views on religion. Brazenly Chiniquy wrote that on a visit to the White House, the President had said to him, "You are almost the only one with whom I speak freely on the subject." The Lincoln quotation expressing fear of the Catholic Church is a similar figment of Chiniquy's imagination.

Back in June 1844, Lincoln wrote a resolution protesting the bigotry of the Know-Nothing movement, in which he declared:

"The guarantee of the right of conscience as found in the Constitution is most sacred and inviolable and one that belongs no less to the Catholic than to the Protestant. * * *. All attempts to abridge or interfere with those rights directly or indirectly, have our decided disapprobation and shall have our most effective opposition."

And on another occasion he said, "Let us remember that all American citizens are brothers in a common country and should dwell together in the bonds of fraternal feeling."

Perhaps the most often cited of all the spurious Lincoln quotations—repeated again and again whenever the issue of monopolistic corporations is discussed—is the statement that Lincoln is supposed to have made as the Civil War was coming to an end:

"I see in the near future a crisis approaching that unnerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. As a result of the war corporations have been enthroned and an era of corruption in high places will follow and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working on the prejudices of the people until the wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before, even in the midst of war. God grant that my suspicion may prove groundless."

This supposed expression of Lincoln's fear over the impending crisis first came to light nearly a third of a century after his death, in a book entitled, "A Gold Conspiracy," written by Stephen Nicollette in 1896. People who held the same views as those stated in the quotation readily accepted it as authentic, and it found its way into numerous speeches and publications. In December 1931 Congressman Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania, delivered a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives in which he referred to President Lincoln's statement about the crisis created by "the money power of the country." And this speech was duly recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Tuesday, December 15, 1931. There is no evidence whatsoever that Lincoln wrote or spoke the quoted words.

While Lincoln was still a young man he joined the Washington Temperance Society and became a leading exponent of total abstinence. In lectures he spoke feelingly about the twin evils of slavery and drink and dreamed of the day "when there shall be neither a slave nor a drunkard on the earth."

When the notification committee came to his home in Springfield to inform him officially of his nomination to the Presidency, Lincoln served his visitors glasses of cold water. He explained later, "Having kept house 16 years, and having never held the 'cup' to the lips of my friend, then, my judgment was that I should not, in my new position, change my habit in this respect."

Despite this known attitude of Lincoln's toward liquor, the liquor interests have claimed him as their friend and Prohibition's foe. They recall that Lincoln was a partner with William Berry in a saloon enterprise in New Salem in 1833, and that Lincoln himself sold liquor. On the walls of many bars throughout the United States hang enlarged, photostatic copies of "The Abraham Lincoln Saloon License."

Again and again during wet-dry campaigns—on a National, State, or local level—Lincoln has been named as an opponent of Prohibition.

According to a freely repeated quotation, Lincoln said:

"Prohibition will work great injury to the cause of temperance. It is a species of intemperance itself for it goes beyond the bounds of reason in that it attempts to control man's appetite by legislation in making crimes out of things which are not crimes. A prohibitory law strikes a blow at the very principles on which our Government was founded. I have always been found laboring to protect the weaker classes from the stronger and I can never give my consent to such a law as you propose to enact. Until my tongue be silenced in death I will continue to fight for the rights of man."

Lincoln never said that. It is a statement which was concocted by a leader of the anti-Prohibition forces of Atlanta, Georgia, to influence Negro voters to vote wet during a local option campaign in 1887.

Some months ago, at a meeting of the Republican Governors of the United States, the question of States' rights arose. One speaker declared emphatically that Abraham Lincoln had expressed his views on the subject in these words:

"The Nation must control whatever concerns the Nation. The States or any minor political community must control whatever exclusively concerns them. The individual shall control whatever exclusively concerns him. That is real popular sovereignty."

Lincoln never said that. What he did say was:

"The legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done, but cannot do so well for themselves in their separate and individual capacities. In all that the people can individually do as well for themselves, government ought not to interfere."

Frequently speakers or writers who presumably know better will cite, for propaganda purposes, only a portion of a statement by Lincoln to support their views, when the entire quotation may convey an entirely different meaning. For example, Eugene Dennis, general secretary of the Communist Party—1 of the 11 Communists recently convicted—endeavored to rebut the charge that the Communist Party is part of a fifth column by declaring: "We subscribe fully to Lincoln's declaration that, 'The strongest bond of human sympathy, outside of the family relation, should be one uniting all working people, of all nations and tongues and kindreds'."

This quotation is from Lincoln's reply to a committee from the Workingmen's Association of New York on March 21, 1864. But the Communist leader failed to point out that the very next sentences of Lincoln's statement contained this admonition:

"Nor should this lead to a war upon property, or the owners of property. Property is the fruit of labor; property is desirable; is a positive good in the world. That some should be rich shows that others may become rich, and hence is just encouragement to industry and enterprise. Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him labor diligently and build one for himself, thus, by example, assuring that his own shall be safe from violence when built."

One of the most frequently quoted epigrams traditionally attributed to Lincoln—and one which Time used as a true quotation to conclude its discussion of Look's false ones—is: "You can fool all the people some of the time and some of the people all of the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time."

Did Lincoln actually say this? If he did, there is no documentary proof. He is supposed to have said it in his address before the people of Clinton, Ill., on September 8, 1858, during the famous senatorial campaign of that year. However, the editor of the Bloomington Pantagraph, in his reported account of the speech, failed to cite the clever catch phrase. Nor is it found in any of Lincoln's printed addresses.

Col. Alexander K. McClure, in his Lincoln's Yarns and Stories, writes that President Lincoln in a discussion with a White House caller on the virtue of dealing honestly with the people observed: "It is true that you may fool all the people some of the time; you can even fool some of the people all the time; but you can't fool all of the people all the time."

In 1905—nearly half a century after Lincoln's Clinton speech—the Chicago Tribune and the Brooklyn Eagle made an effort to prove Lincoln's authorship of the statement. Several witnesses, all past 70 years of age, were interviewed. They expressed the belief that Lincoln gave utterance to the sentiment if not the exact words of the quotation. One elderly gentleman said that the statement referred to fooling the people about slavery. And despite the absence of documentary evidence, this epigram will probably continue to be generally accepted as genuine simply because it is so Lincolnesque.

There are many other so-called Lincoln quotations in the same category, such as:

"I don't know who my grandfather was, and I am much more concerned to know what his grandson will be.

"Teach economy, that is one of the first virtues. It begins with saving money.

"I am not bound to win but I am bound be true.

"I believe a man should be proud of the city in which he lives, and that he should so live that his city will be proud that he lives in it.

"If ever this free people—if this government itself is ever utterly demoralized, it will come from this incessant human wriggle and struggle for office, which is but a way to live without work.

"I will get ready and study and then the chance will come.

"If I ever get a chance to hit that thing [slavery] I'll hit it hard."

These and numerous other trite sayings—including hundreds of anecdotes—are commonly attributed to Lincoln because they sound Lincolnesque. Actually they are based on mere hearsay.

The list of Lincoln "quotations" grows larger from year to year. Lincoln of all Americans is all things to all men. They will undoubtedly continue to quote—and misquote—him as long as his fame endures.

One Voice On Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, the recent controversy over the President's request that General MacArthur withhold and withdraw a speech intended for the VFW convention has received wide attention by Members of this body as well as criticism by certain newspapers in this country.

There is no doubt in my mind that General MacArthur is a great military strategist and that his recent venture into foreign policy was with honorable intentions, as was no doubt the venture of our Secretary of the Navy, Francis Matthews' recent speech. But, Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States is charged by our Constitution and he alone is empowered to conduct the foreign policy of our Nation.

I, therefore, commend to my colleagues the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal, August 29, 1950, which forcefully points out the implications and repercussions of the failure to recognize this well-established constitutional principle:

ONE VOICE ON FOREIGN POLICY

The foreign policy of the United States can be proclaimed precisely by the President of the United States and those whom he delegates to speak for him—and by no others. That, in effect, is what it says in the Constitution.

The founding fathers realized that any other arrangement would not work. To have more than one voice making the final announcements as to national foreign policy would bring only confusion in that field.

Twice in the last week, important governmental figures have violated this fundamental: The first was the Secretary of the Navy, Francis Matthews, with his reckless advocacy of "preventive war" against Russia. The second was Gen. Douglas A. MacArthur, with his public message to the VFW convention advocating a different policy in regard to Formosa.

President Truman has acted properly, and within his powers, in making it clear to the country and the world that neither Matthews nor General MacArthur was speaking for this Government. In one case, he chided a member of his personal Cabinet. In the other, he acted as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces to compel a military officer to withdraw an offensive statement.

We do not have, it must be understood, a situation in which these men have had no chance to make their views known on the policy-making level. Matthews has sat in the weekly Cabinet sessions. MacArthur has had the opportunity to make his views known through the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

There is, in fact, nothing new about General MacArthur's believing this country should control Formosa. What is new is that he has now challenged the official foreign policy of the Nation in that respect by a public statement. This is an attempt on the part of a military leader to invade a civilian field, to shape foreign policy, and to challenge a stated policy of his Government.

The damage, of course, has now been done. No matter what President Truman or Secretary Acheson say in disavowing the Matthews and MacArthur statements the Communists will gleefully broadcast them to the world as evidences of American warmongering. For months and years to come we will hear it drummed into the ears of the whole world that the American Secretary of Navy proposed starting a war to compel cooperation for peace and that the Nation's leading military figure demanded that we occupy Formosa, and maintain it as an unsinkable aircraft carrier from which we can bomb Russian and Asiatic ports.

Furthermore, another divisive issue is thrown into a political campaign that already threatens the national unity. The Republicans, yearning for victory in November, will flaunt the delicate Formosan issue, and the charge of gagging MacArthur no matter what damage it may do us in the United Nations, in Asia, or in the world propaganda war. Such is the way of politics.

The Republican campaigners will ignore the fact that, whatever have been the Administration mistakes on foreign policy, the GOP record is generally worse. Many of the Republicans now seeking to exploit the issue are those who have opposed steps that might have strengthened us in Asia.

Certainly the Matthews and MacArthur incidents point up sharply the need for the American people to keep their heads in these confusing days. It is no time for hysteria. We are committed to a difficult course in world affairs. It calls for working in the United Nations with the free peoples of the world. It calls for strengthening ourselves and our allies in an all-out attempt to prevent aggression and war. It does not call for aggressive war. It does not call for the seizure of land belonging to other peoples.

It would help greatly in this trying period if there were more clear leadership from Washington. However that may be, we cannot have various and opposing official voices seeming to state our foreign policy.

Automobiles for Legless Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FOSTER FURCOLO
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, I understand that there are over 150 remaining applicants for automobiles for legless veterans.

I also understand there is no money to purchase these automobiles and that there cannot be any appropriation of money until there has been authorizing legislation.

The gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] has a bill to authorize an appropriation, not only for the 150 remaining applicants, but also for an anticipated 500 servicemen and women who will be eligible.

I have discussed this matter with members of the Appropriations Committee and I am satisfied that committee will appropriate money once the legislation has been authorized.

I urge imediate authorization so that the Appropriations Committee may be able to act.

The New Social Security Law Contains Many Republican Suggestions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say that on August 28 the President signed H. R. 6000, the social-security bill. This news is most welcome to me and other Republicans who are truly interested in the improvement of our social-security laws. I had no doubt that if the President had vetoed this bill, as he threatened, the House would have overridden it, but this will now not be necessary, and the increased-benefit checks for the month of September will now be mailed on October 3.

All Republicans can be proud of the part we have played in framing and securing the passage of this law. As finally enacted, the bill is primarily a Republican bill, embodying many of the Republican recommendations for extending and improving our social-security system. Just because the Republicans played such a major part in writing this legislation was certainly no reason for the President to veto it, and I am glad that he finally recognized this fact.

As it passed the House, H. R. 6000 contained many provisions which we Republicans vigorously opposed, and for this reason we introduced our own social-security bill. Although the Republican bill was not adopted by the House, most of the provisions in it were finally incorporated in the new law. Moreover, most of the inequitable and discriminatory provisions to which we objected in the Democratic bill have been eliminated, and as a result there will be a more uniform increase in benefit payments and a broader extension of coverage.

I am particularly proud of the fight I waged on behalf of the Republicans to protect all our teachers, firemen, policemen—State, county, municipal; and many other groups who are already covered under their own retirement and pension systems from having their own systems destroyed. The Democratic majority were bent on jeopardizing these existing retirement systems, but the Republican position prevailed, and as a result teachers, firemen, policemen—State, county, municipal; and other groups already covered under their own retirement and pension systems, are directly excluded from coverage in the new law.

Another provision in the original House bill which the Republican minority vigorously opposed was the Democratic definition of employee. If the Democratic definition had been permitted to remain many small businesses would have been disrupted, thousands of persons would have had no way of determining their social-security-tax liability, endless costly litigation would have resulted, and the whole system would have become one of executive department whim and not congressional law. We Republicans maintained that Congress should not surrender to the executive departments the right of defining who is an employee for social-security purposes, and as a result of our efforts the new law contains a carefully defined definition rather than a vague test which would have brought untold confusion and hardship.

We Republicans also favored a more equitable benefit formula than that contained in the Democratic bill, and the final law is in accordance with our recommendations on this point. Because of the so-called increment factor used in computing the amount of a person's benefit, the Democratic bill would have discriminated against older persons first entering the system, and against workers who do not have continuous employment. It would also have postponed the payment of the full rate of benefits for many years, resulting in a higher tax rate and increasing the cost by $1,000,000,000 a year. This provision has been eliminated in the new law.

One of the basic principles recommended by the Republicans has always been that the insurance system of our social-security law be strengthened and improved so that the public-assistance programs may be diminished and the proper relationship between the two programs be established. We therefore recommended making it easier for persons to become eligible for benefits under the insurance program and our recommendation is contained in the new law as the result of the "new start" provision. As the result of this provision, any person who is now 62 or over will be entitled to receive benefits at age 65 if he has acquired only six quarters of coverage and these quarters of coverage may have been acquired at any time since 1937. Approximately 700,000 persons who are not now eligible for old-age and survivors insurance benefits will now become immediately eligible. Moreover, it will be much easier for a person to qualify for benefits in the future.

We Republicans have consistently recommended that benefit payments be increased and this is provided for in the new law at an average increase of 77 percent.

In addition to these points the new law does the following: (a) Extends coverage to approximately 10,000,000 persons; (b) raises the wage base to $3,600; (c) increases the amount a person may earn without losing his benefits from $15 to $50 a month, and eliminates any limitation when a person becomes 75; and (d) provides wage credits of $160 for each month of military service in World War II.

In the field of public assistance we Republican urged that the Federal Government share in the payments made by the States to needy permanently and totally disabled persons, and this is contained in the new law. In addition the new law carries increased authorization for appropriations to our maternal and child-health programs, the crippled-children programs, and it provides that the Federal Government will contribute to payments made by the States for the relative with whom a dependent child is living.

Inasmuch as I was one of the original authors of the legislation providing for assistance payments to the blind, I am particularly glad that the new law also provides that the blind can earn up to $50 a month without losing their assistance payments.

Mr. Speaker, as one member of the Republican Party I will continue to work for the perfecting of a sound social-security system and the elimination of the inequities which still exist under the present program. We Republicans will not tolerate any attempt to defeat our aims through threats of a Presidential veto.

Nationalist China as Ally of Ours

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, the Reverend Charles O'Connor, Chariton, Iowa, a sagacious student of foreign affairs, in a recent letter to the editor of the Des Moines (Iowa) Register gives his views on Formosa and the far-eastern problem. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include therein Father O'Connor's letter:

NATIONALIST CHINA AS ALLY OF OURS

Secretary Acheson assures that we will not assent to the admission of Red China into the United Nations in order to end hostilities in Korea. Why did not the UN rush to the aid of Chiang Kai-shek as it did to the aid of Syngman Rhee. It is hardly enough to say that Korea is a sort of protégé of the UN. Nationalist China was and is a member of the UN. The Charter says: "To maintain international peace and security * * * all members shall fulfill in good faith the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the present Charter." Not the least of these obligations is "to ensure to all (members) the rights and benefits resulting from membership."

Seating Red China would change the permanent membership of Security Council to two Communists, two others members (England and France) with blood of the Karl Marx type, and ourselves. Dean Acheson knows this. Yet he says that later on he might favor voting the Reds in. Senator MCCARTHY comes to mind uninvited.

AGGRESSOR IN KOREA

Russia is considered the real aggressor in Korea. So she was in China. Will not she require Mao Tze-tung to grant her easy access to the 4,500 miles of China's coast? That would expose Australia, and make it difficult to guard Japan and our oil interests near the Persian gulf. And Alaska, once Russia, is only 40 miles from Siberia, but many miles from the United States.

Formosa belongs to China. If the Communists are taken into the UN they will want both Formosa and the person of Chiang. And will not they charge us with abetting a rebel?

By devious strategy Russia has gained control of Europe as far west as Mid-Berlin. In all the present feverish rearmament no word is said about the rescue of these territories. If giving China over to Russia is not too high a price for peace in Asia, would giving over Eastern Germany and the Balkans be too high a price for peace in Europe? And how can Russia be prevented from integrating both China and Middle Europe into the Soviet Union?

CHIANG CALLED A PATRIOT

Propaganda has been hard at work to blacken Chiang Kai-shek. But in the eyes of the Chinese and of the world he is a proven soldier and patriot. He is said to have nearly a million men at his disposal. With liberal aid from the UN he could harass Russia and, probably, recover China, and relieve pressure upon Europe. Since Chiang was our ally in the late war, perhaps, many American boys would go gladly to his aid. Not many European boys are volunteering to aid us in Korea. Russia makes other peoples work for her? Why not get Nationalist China to work for herself and us too?

(Rev.) CHARLES O'CONNOR,
Chariton, Iowa.

Alaska

OF

HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the text of an excellent speech on Alaska by Col. Niels Poulsen, of Derby, Conn., former military governor of Alaska, which was published in the New Haven (Conn.) Register, of August 27, 1950.

This speech brings out most forcefully the great strategic importance of Alaska and calls to mind the words of the late Gen. Billy Mitchell, the apostle of United States air power, that—

He who holds Alaska, holds the world.

It emphasizes once again the urgent need for immediate Senate action on the Alaskan statehood bill. Colonel Poulsen's speech follows:

ALASKA: ONLY PART OF NORTH AMERICA INVADED IN WORLD WAR II IS 5 MINUTES FROM RUSSIA BY AIR. DERBY'S COL. NIELS POULSEN WARNED 4 MONTHS AGO

Alaska was the only part of the North American Continent to feel the tread of enemy boots in World War II.

On June 3, 1942, the Japanese bombed Dutch Harbor from the air, and soon after occupied the undefended islands of Attu, Kiska, and Agattu. The sole inhabitants in the occupied area were on Attu, and were approximately 45 Aleuts and Mr. and Mrs. C. Foster Jones, both Government school teachers. All of these were either captured or killed. This occurrence got many Americans to thinking for the first time. For the majority, it was realized that Alaska was of military importance to our remote northern frontier.

As war progressed, the Japanese were forced out of the Aleutians. American troops landed on Attu in May of 1943 and after 3 weeks of bitter fighting, the Japs were wiped out. In August, American and Canadian troops landed on Kiska but met with no resistance as the Japs, realizing the hopelessness of their position, evacuated and escaped under cover of fog.

Since then, the continued developments in long-range aviation and the unsettled condition of the postwar world have combined to increase still more our awareness of Alaska's importance.

SHORTEST UNITED STATES ROUTE

Because airplanes now fly several thousand miles nonstop, new and short routes between nations can be traveled. A plane can fly in a straight line over areas where ships never have been able to travel. The shortest air routes between many cities of the United States and important centers in Europe and Asia pass within, or near the Arctic Circle.

The Arctic region, therefore, takes on a new importance in international relations. Both in peace and war, our northern frontier, Alaska, will play a vital part in maintaining the security of the United States.

Its military importance alone deserves our careful study. It would probably be one of the important points from which to begin countermoves against attack on the United States.

We had few military installations in Alaska before 1938, when extensive defense construction was begun. The airfield system was improved, a program of radio and weather service was established and the Navy began constructing sea and air bases at Dutch Harbor, Sitka, and Kodiak Island.

Today many of the wartime installations have been abandoned or put on a stand-by basis. Ground, air, and naval forces in the Territory are presently commanded by an Air Force officer. His chief of staff is a ground officer, and his communications chief is a Navy officer. A three-service petroleum-procurement system has been set up under Navy direction: Army and Navy hospitals have eliminated duplication.

OPERATION FRIGID

To insure the readiness of our northern frontier in case of war, ground, air, and sea forces have conducted many experimental operations to train personnel and to develop clothing, personal equipment, aircraft, vehicles, fuels, lubricants, weapons, and other material that will function in the subzero cold of the Arctic. Out of these experiments has come a vast amount of valuable information that could be obtained in no other way.

Alaska has been recently called our weakest link in defense. A surprise airborne attack could hit Alaska 5 minutes after launching from Russian soil.

General Eisenhower has made recommendations that each major airfield needs adequate defense in the Fairbanks-Anchorage area with a radar screen of modern radio devices and stations.

Only 40 miles of water separates Alaska from Siberia at the Bering Strait. Attu is only 380 miles from Kamchatka. It is common knowledge that Russia regrets having ever sold Alaska to the United States.

It is also certain that Russia knows far more about the Polar-Artic region than any other nation.

RUSSIA'S EARLY INTEREST

In the early 1600's, Russian merchant adventurers already were sailing east from the Murmansk and Archangel areas to the mouths of the Ob and Yenisei Rivers. In 1724, Peter the Great employed Vitus Bering, a Danish sailor, to explore the northern coast. It was then believed by many that Siberia and America were joined at some unknown point. Before he died 17 years later, on the island and in the sea named for him, Bering had proved that the continents are separated.

Development of Siberia was encouraged by the completion in 1905 of the Trans-Siberian Railroad. This reduced the travel time from Moscow to Vladivostok from about 1 year to 3 weeks. Soon, peasants began emigrating to the vast farm lands east of the Urals.

Russian efforts to develop an Arctic seaway were renewed by the Soviet Government following World War I. In 1920 alone 23 expeditions were busy exploring and studying the Arctic. Commercial voyages from Murmansk to the Ob, Yenisei, and Lena Rivers became routine. By 1946, the Russians were operating 72 meteorological stations in Arctic areas. Since 1935, they have used aircraft as reconnaissance patrols to aid sea navigation as well as for exploration of the Polar region.

In 1937, four Soviet explorers were landed in large transport aircraft on an ice floe near the Pole. The party stayed on the drifting ice until February 1938, when they were picked up near Jan Mayren off the east coast of Greenland. Besides gathering information on weather, the movement of ice floes, and the effects of Arctic electronics on radio communication, this party discovered the ocean depth near the Pole to be 14,075 feet.

UNITED STATES NOW INTERESTED

Just the other day there was an item in the newspaper to the effect that the Tenth Rescue Squadron landed on the ice cap about 100 miles north of Barter Island. This was announced as quite an accomplishment and it is an indication that the United States Air Force is taking a serious interest in that region.

Twelve years ago, in June of 1938, a Soviet aircraft manned by three officers of the Red Air Force landed in the State of Washington. It had left Moscow 2 days before. Most people in the United States considered the flight a lucky stunt, unlikely to be repeated. A month later, three other Soviet flyers in another plane landed at San Jacinto, Calif., after a 62-hour flight from Moscow across the North Pole. This was a new distance record, almost 6,300 miles. It stood until 1946, when the United States Navy's Pacusan Dreamboat flew nearly 9,500 miles from Hawaii to Cairo.

Just as Lindbergh, in 1927, proved that the Atlantic could be flown, the Soviet airmen proved that air travel across the top of the world was possible. The meaning of their flight is well expressed on a marker at San Jacinto: "They found the world of transportation of cylinder. They left it a sphere."

Gen. Carl Spaatz once emphasized its importance by saying: "The United States is wide open at the top."

THE POLE AS A STRATEGIC CENTER

The much-discussed polar concept of warfare is based on the reasonable assumption that in a future war aircraft would seek their targets by the most direct routes. A few minutes' study of the globe or polar projection map makes it clear that such routes, between most nations in the Northern Hemisphere, cross the polar or Arctic regions.

Thus it hardly can be overemphasized that scientific advances have removed the last barrier (and its cushion of time and distance) which, until recently, had protected the continental United States throughout its history. The increased range and destructive power of modern bombers, probably more than any other factor, have made the Arctic one of the keys to our security. This region still provides no easy highway for overland attack upon North America. Ground operations against any Arctic areas vital to our security could be contained with minimum organized resistance.

The strategic importance of the Arctic is based primarily upon its status as a possible avenue of air power. It is this alone which shapes the possible future missions of the Army, and of all our forces, in that region.

An air effort against the continental United States, at least in the near future, would be hampered considerably unless the aggressor first obtained stepping stones, such as Spitzbergen, Iceland, Greenland, or localities in the Canadian Archipelago. However, air strategists might well consider such an effort worth while even without additional bases.

Attacks on our isolated weather and radar stations, establishment of similar outposts of their on on this side of the Pole, or even attempts to seize our principal bases, are well within present capabilities of a possible enemy. Recent evidence of Soviet progress in the atomic field is a further reason to consider the strategic meaning of the Arctic and the possibility of its becoming a theater of operations.

Details of plans for the employment of United States forces understandably are kept highly classified. We can assume, however, that these plans include the necessary measures to counter the known capabilities of a potential aggressor, and to project adequate counter offensives of our own.

Alaska is our most northern stepping stone and must be watched.

Outlawing Communist Party

OF
HON. DWIGHT L. ROGERS
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include therein a letter written me by the Daytona Beach Post, No. 50, of the American Legion, Daytona Beach, Fla., together with resolution attached to the letter requesting that action be taken to immediately enact legislation outlawing the Communist Party. The letter and resolution follow:

DAYTONA BEACH, FLA., August 18, 1950.
Hon. DWIGHT L. ROGERS,
The House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE ROGERS: In behalf of Daytona Beach Post, No. 50, and in furthering the national defense program of the American Legion, I am enclosing a resolution adopted by our post at our last regular meeting.

We sincerely hope you may be in a position to urge speedy action on the several Communist-curbing proposals now under consideration by the House and the Senate Un-American Activities Committees.

Very sincerely yours,
DAYTONA BEACH POST, No. 50,
A. A. KINTZ, Adjutant.

RESOLUTION

Whereas the membership of Daytona Beach Post, No. 50, the American Legion, Department of Florida, is most vitally interested in the welfare of the people of these United States; and

Whereas there exists in this great Republic a political conspiracy which ultimately advocates the overthrow of the United States Government—namely, the Communist Party; and

Whereas the Communist Party has been named subversive by the Department of Justice and party members convicted of subversive activities in fair jury trial by our Federal courts; and

Whereas American blood has been shed on the battlefields of Korea to defend the fundamental rights of free people; and

Whereas communism recognizes no national boundaries, but rather has proven beyond question that subjugation of peace-loving people throughout the world is a foremost objective; and

Whereas the time has come when all loyal Americans for mutual self-protection must keep America strong and undivided from within; and

Whereas there is no place for communism in this, the greatest country in the world: Be it therefore

Resolved, That this post in official meeting assembled does most urgently call upon the National Congress to immediately enact legislation outlawing the Communist Party; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to all Congressmen representing the great State of Florida, and a copy be spread upon the minutes of this meeting for permanent record.

It Is Still Necessary To Repeal or Reduce Theater Admissions Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, during the years that I have served in the Congress, I have had many contacts with the theater operators of my district on excise taxes, theater admission tax, and other matters of interest and concern to the motion picture exhibitors.

As this Eighty-first Congress nears adjournment, I desire to make a report to these businessmen—a report patterned after the familiar "Report to the People" by the President. The report deals with some of the legislation of the Eighty-first Congress that is of special interest to the theater operators.

One of the first bills that I introduced in the Eighty-first Congress was H. R. 1361, providing for the termination of the war tax rates on admissions to theaters, fairs, and so forth. The bill was introduced on January 13, 1949, and was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. This is how the bill in part read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) in the case of the tax imposed by section 1700 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (tax on admissions) the rate of tax applicable with respect to any period after June 30, 1949, shall be determined without regard to the war tax rate of 1 cent for each 5 cents or major fraction thereof specified in section 1650 of such code (war tax rates of certain miscellaneous taxes).

(b) In the case of the tax imposed by section 1700 (b) of such code (tax on permanent use or lease of boxes or seats), and of the tax imposed by section 1700 (c) of such code (tax on sales outside box office) the rate of tax applicable with respect to any period after June 30, 1949, shall be determined without regard to the war tax rate of 20 percent specified in section 1650 of such code (war tax rates of certain miscellaneous taxes).

The war situation in Korea has of course had great bearing on revenue and tax measures. However, I am definitely opposed to the theory of changing the Revenue Act of 1950 from a revenue-reduction measure to one of revenue-raising. With the Korean situation in mind, I would recommend changing the admission taxes from 20 percent down to 10 percent with the understanding that they would be completely removed at the earliest feasible moment after the conclusion of the war.

I believe that the continuance of wartime excise taxes in peacetime constitutes a drastic intrusion of Government into the regulation of business. This is not consistent with our free-enterprise system.

The present rates on admissions are having a serious effect on small-theater owners and other amusement operators throughout the country. So far we have not been able to get action or cooperation from the Democratic leadership and this administration relative to my bill and other similar measures which would provide for a reduction or elimination of the special tax on theater admissions.

If I should be again chosen by the people to represent the Ninth District of Minnesota and return to Washington next January, I want the theater owners of my district to feel confident that I will continue to fight the admission tax burden. It is a tax that hits unfairly where it hurts the hardest—the pocketbook of the average American family.

Red Crabs and Slave Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD T. MILLER
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, on April 8, I wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury protesting that during the preceding month 59,000 cases of canned crabmeat—the product of Russian slave labor—had been imported into this country, and that several hundred thousand additional cases were being offered. In the letter it was pointed out that—

> This type of dumping operation is a serious threat to our entire fishing industry and particularly the crab-fishing industry located in New England, Maryland, and the Pacific coast.

Nothing seemed to be accomplished by this protest and I did not even get an answer, although one of my colleagues, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MACKI, who has ably and tenaciously kept after this matter, did finally receive an acknowledgment of our joint communication. He has been advised from time to time that studies are being made by the Labor Department and the Treasury as to whether or not the Russian canned crabmeat is a product of slave labor. Such studies would seem futile indeed, in view of the statements publicly made by the President and Secretary of State. But our bureaucracy does not seem to know obvious facts, well recognized by high officials and the rank and file of American citizens. Nothing has been done about it and the investigation goes on over the months.

Section 1307, title 19—the 1930 Tariff Act—of the code provides:

All goods, wares, articles, and merchandise mined, produced, or manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor or/and forced labor or/and indentured labor under penal sanctions shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is hereby prohibited.

So what are we waiting for?

It was the longshoremen at New York and Boston and a shipping company in Baltimore that have come to the rescue. As pointed out in the following editorial which appeared in yesterday's Sun, of Baltimore, in Maryland we want blue crabs, not the Red ones:

NO RED CRAB MEAT, PLEASE, IN THE HOME OF THE BLUE CRAB

In New York, recently, the stevedores flatly refused to unload a consignment of 80 tons of canned Russian crab meat brought in by a British liner. "Why help Russia make money in this country?" said the stevedores.

The shipping company, after murmuring a little, accepted the decision of the stevedores. So the Red crab meat went back across the Atlantic to the British Government, which had originally acquired the crab meat, not too willingly, in a barter deal with Soviet Russia.

It turns out that some Red crab meat has been coming into Baltimore, too. A shipment arrived several weeks ago. And another shipment of more than 2,000 cases arrived on the American Builder Monday. We hasten to say that it was not unloaded. The shipping company, as a matter of fact, didn't even try to get it unloaded, but classified it for customs purposes, as "inaccessible." It, too, goes back to Britain.

No doubt the shipping company took this tactful course out of deference to the feeling of our local stevedores, which are not different from those of their colleagues in New York. But we like to think that an even more delicate sentiment played a part in the decision.

More crab meat is consumed per capita in Baltimore, probably, than in any other major city of the United States—in crab cakes, crab salads, crab ravigotte, imperial crab, crab soup, crab cocktail, fried crabs, and in many other styles, not forgetting the most important style of all, namely, steamed.

But the crabs we eat are Blue crabs, not Red crabs. The Chesapeake Bay, in fact, is the very home and principal breeding ground of the Blue crab To unload Red crab meat in the port of Baltimore would be enough to make every lover of Blue crabs see red. One trembles at the nature of the uprising that it would probably cause. Many years ago they had a tea party in Boston. Let anyone try to flood Baltimore's crab market with the meat of the Red crab and we predict a crab party that would make the Boston Tea Party seem as innocuous as a church social.

Setting the Record Straight on Surplus Commodities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CECIL F. WHITE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the statement was made on the floor of the House that the membership of this body needs a psychiatrist. The gentleman who made that statement made it in connection with the then pending legislation to dispose of surplus perishable commodities held by the Government which are in danger of spoiling.

It is amazing, sometimes, how short is the memory of man and it appears that this may very well apply to the gentleman who made the statement I have just mentioned. I have checked the vote and the proceedings in the House of Representatives on the day that the so-called Steagall amendment was passed on June 26, 1941. The record shows that the Steagall amendment passed the House of Representatives by a voice vote, and nowhere in the proceedings is there any protest recorded by the usually vociferous and extremely articulate gentleman who made the aforementioned statement. It will be recalled that the Steagall amendment was passed by Congress as an amendment to the basic agricultural law of the Nation in order to create price supports on and increase the production of the particular commodities which we were writing legislation to dispose of, when the gentleman made the statement that the House of Representatives needs a psychiatrist.

The Steagall amendment was passed when we were preparing for World War II, as an emergency act, to encourage the production of food supplies for the armies of our Nation, and our subsequent allies who were at that time engaged in war. At that time, if you will recall, we were referred to as the arsenal of democracy and the Government was making loans to industry to increase production. Naturally enough, since we had to expand the production of these foodstuffs for war purposes, large surpluses accumulated when the war ended and the heavy wartime demand subsided. Any sane person would, of course, expect that we would accumulate these commodities in the postwar readjustment period, as is always the case following a war. And what has been the cost of this postwar agricultural adjustment? The cost has been approximately $500,000,000, about 80 percent of which went for potatoes alone. But what about the cost of readjustment in other lines of industry outside of agriculture? If you will check the record you will find that postwar readjustment for industry in general, outside of agriculture, cost the Federal Government approximately $6,000,000,000, or 12 times the readjustment cost of agriculture. Furthermore, since approximately 80 percent of the cost of agricultural adjustment went to cover losses in potatoes, it is only fair to point out that the party of the gentleman who made the psychiatrist statement opposed efforts in the other body of the Congress to discontinue the potato program. The key vote on this issue was taken in the other body on February 24, 1950, when an amendment to discontinue potato price supports was considered in that body, and the majority party voted 2 to 1 to discontinue the program while the minority party voted 4 to 1 to carry on that wasteful and ridiculous potato program.

These observations are made, ladies and gentlemen of the House, not with any intent to be unkind to the gentleman who made the statement heretofore referred to, or to embarrass him, but in view of the wide publicity his remarks apparently received, I have made this statement to set the record straight.

Lt. Gen. Alvan C. Gillem, the "Soldier's General," Retires

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. CALEB BOGGS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, today in Third Army headquarters, Atlanta, Ga., one of the United States Army's outstanding leaders brings to a close a long and distinguished career of almost 41 years devoted to his country.

This is the day, Mr. Speaker, when Lt. Gen. Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., wartime commander of the Thirteenth Corps and since June 1947 commander of the Third Army, retires because he has reached the statutory age limit.

I would not want this occasion to pass by without some tribute on my part to this influential public servant, for during part of World War II I had the pleasure and privilege of serving under this man, who is widely known as the "soldier's general."

In expressing my esteem for General Gillem, I know that I am also reflecting the opinion of countless thousands who have had the honor of associating with him during his extensive career.

The State of Delaware is proud of the fact that the home station for headquarters, Thirteenth Corps, before the unit went overseas, was Fort DuPont, near Delaware City. Many of the men from my State served with this unit, and we in Delaware like to consider headquarters, Thirteenth Corps and General Gillem as our own. Thus I am proud to pay tribute to Lt. Gen. Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., on this occasion of his retirement from the United States Army.

As a part of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I also want to include an article and an editorial from the publication entitled "Control News." This periodical is published in the interest of the many thousands of troops who comprised the Thirteenth Corps during World War II. The name of this publication, Control News, is derived from the fact that during its operations in Europe the Thirteenth Corps was known by the code designation Control.

The article entitled "Gillem Retires" and the editorial captioned "XIII Salutes Gillem" follow:

GILLEM RETIRES

Forty years and 8 months service devoted to his country—from private to lieutenant general—that is a record probably unequaled in the annals of the United States Army. Having reached the statutory age limit of 62 in August 1950, Alvan Cullem Gillem, Jr., retires from the Army the end of this month having left his mark on history and the lives of countless thousands, both military and civilian, who had the pleasure and privilege of serving or associating with him during his long military career.

Born on August 8, 1888, of a family who for two previous generations had served in the Army, Van Gillem followed in the steps of his forefathers when he entered the Army, enlisting as a private in January 1910. He was not destined to remain long in that grade, however, for his leadership qualities were soon recognized. He advanced rapidly and did the impossible in a year, being commissioned a second lieutenant in February 1911.

It is interesting to note that the soldiers' general was quite an athlete in his own right and some of the generalship qualities exhibited on the field of battle in World War II were aptly presented when in college on the football field. It was the wartime commander of the XIII Corps who played end and later quarterbacked the famous Sewanee team of 1909 to the football championship of the South.

Experiences of almost 41 years service condensed into a few pages, no, such an article cannot do him justice, for Alvan C. Gillem, Jr, has soldiered throughout the world during that time. His life story would read like a novel if space would permit its telling. Philippines, Mexico, Hawaii, Siberia, Africa, Europe, China, those areas are well known to him.

Shortly after gaining his gold bars, he went to the Philippines with the historic Twelfth Infantry, later returning to the Presidio of Monterey, Calif., with his outfit. In June 1914 he left with Blackjack Pershing's brigade for Mexican-border duty. It was while on this duty that a very important and romantic chapter was written in his life for he met Virginia Harrison, of Nogales, Ariz., who, in 1916, became Mrs. Alvan C. Gillem, Jr.

The Sixty-second Infantry at the Presidio of San Francisco gained Capt. Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., in late spring of 1917. With the advent of World War I he was on the high road to command responsibility when he organized and commanded the Twenty-third Machine Gun Battalion. During that war he rose to rank of temporary lieutenant colonel.

Soon followed a tour of duty with the American Expeditionary Forces in Siberia, thence to the Philippines again and Hawaii. In June 1922 he completed his foreign service and (permanent grade) Major Gillem was selected for the Command and General Staff School at Fort Leavenworth. Upon graduation he had another tour on the Mexican border. The Army continued its recognition of his capabilities when he was sent to the Army War College in Washington, D. C., and upon graduation in 1926 he was assigned as G-3 of the Third Corps Area Headquarters in Baltimore, Md. It is significant that Major Gillem, who was to become one of the leaders of the Armored Force during World War II, even at this early date clearly demonstrated his armored ability, for he was a member of the Army board which drew up the original plans for the American Armored Forces.

From 1930 to 1935 he served as professor of military science and tactics at the University of Maryland, remaining on this assignment until 1935, during which period he developed an outstanding ROTC unit. In June 1935 Lieutenant Colonel Gillem became an instructor in tactics at the Infantry School, Fort Benning, Ga. Many of our World War II commanders were thankful that they had a course in tactics under Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., during the 4½ years he was in that position.

January 1940 saw another turning point in this doughboy's career, for at that time the Army's only infantry light tank regiment, the Sixty-sixth, was reactivated at Fort Benning. It was not by chance that Col. Alvan C. Gillem was appointed its commanding officer, for even then he was recognized as one of the outstanding armored force men in the United States. In February 1941 Brigadier General Gillem assumed command of the Second Armored Brigade, a unit of the Second Armored Division, and in April of the same year he activated and assumed command of the Third Armored Division, receiving his "second star" while in command of that unit in July 1941. Members of that division will tell you that it was largely the training received under his guidance that later made the unit famous in Europe as the "spearhead division." In January 1942 Major General Gillem activated and assumed command of the Second Armored Corps.

While the II Armored Corps was participating in the maneuvers in Carolina during early summer, 1942, General Gillem was selected as commander of the new desert training center, Indio, Calif. He moved the corps headquarters to Camp Young, Calif., and planned and directed the first large-scale desert maneuvers held in the history of the United States Army, where most of the troops that later fought in Africa received their training under his direction. It was on his recommendation that the desert training center was subsequently organized as a theater of operations training area. In November 1942, the corps headquarters moved to San Jose, Calif., where it functioned as a separate corps and supervised the training of units on the west coast and prepared alerted units for overseas duty in the Pacific area.

On May 14, 1943, General Gillem was appointed chief of the armored force, succeeding Lt. Gen. Jacob L. Devers, with headquarters at Fort Knox, Ky. Thus Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., became responsible for the Army's armored units just about 3 years after he had assumed command of the Army's tank regiment and just a little over a decade after he had served as a member of the board that established original plans for the Army's armored force.

It was on Thanksgiving Day 1943, that Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., was notified of his assignment to command the XIII Corps, succeeding Maj. Gen. Emil F. Reinhardt, with headquarters at Fort Du Pont, Del. In this assignment he now commanded a corps headquarters on the east coast which served as a separate corps and performed a mission similar to the one he had commanded on the west coast.

General Gillem's ability as an administrator, instructor, planner, and trainer were well recognized and in July 1944 he was given the opportunity to show that he could practice what he preached for that month the corps headquarters moved overseas. The headquarters remained in England until September 1944, processing troops to the Continent, when it went to France.

On November 8, 1044 XIII Corps became operational in Holland and the 180 days of combat history it gathered from then until VE-day is well known to all. General Gillem's brilliance as a tactician was vividly demonstrated; he was as clear and logical in calling plays on the field of battle as he had been playing quarterback in his college days. The crashing of the Siegfried Line in November 1944—the assault across the Roer River on February 23, 1945, and the resultant 10-day spectacular dash to the Rhine—the crossing of the Rhine on March 31—that relentless drive eastward which culminated in the corps' spearhead reaching the Elbe on April 12 near Tangermunde, just 50 miles from Berlin—yes, those are the days that troops of the XIII Corps will never forget. And Operation Kaput, our Battle of Klotze, when we virtually destroyed the entire Nazi crack Von Clausewitz Armored Division, well, that battle has been termed by military experts as a perfect military operation. Yes; those under Gillem knew they were guided by a master tactician.

It was just shortly after VE-day that his mighty fighting force finished its World War II history, for then, began redeployment. It was logical that General Gillem was selected for an important role in the Pacific area, and it was in June '45, while he was waiting at the port of Le Havre with his headquarters, that a well-earned reward arrived—news of that third star falling to his shoulders.

Headquarters XIII Corps was in a west coast staging area when hostilities ceased in Japan, and the corps was inactivated September 25, 1945. Just prior to this time, however, General Gillem relieved General Collins as commanding general of the VII Corps and in so doing he became the only American general of World War II to command three different corps.

He was not to remain in the States, however, for a very long period. In January 1946, General Marshall, while serving as the President's special envoy in China, requested General Gillem as his executive. During General Marshall's absence on a return to the States, General Gillem directed this important mission in China. Later he assumed command of the United States Forces, China Theater, and from October 1946 to April 1947 he served in Peiping as United States Commissioner and also commanding general Peiping Headquarters Group.

In June 1947, General Gillem returned to the States and was appointed commanding general Third Army with headquarters at Fort McPherson, Ga., which command he will relinquish this month. There is an unusual point about his present station, for this is not the first time he has served at Fort McPherson. It is unique that in 1910 Private Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., marched guard post in front of the house where Lt. Gen. Alvan C. Gillem now lives. That is definitely a record unduplicated in the history of the Army. During his service as commanding general of the Third Army, Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., as usual, has performed his duties in a distinguished manner, and the military forces and civilian population of the Southeast will be sorry to see him go.

The name of Gillem will long be remembered in the military history of these United States; his grandfather was a Union general in the War Between the States, his father a colonel of cavalry, and his son Alvan C. Gillem II is a colonel in the Air Force. General and Mrs. Gillem also have another son Richard D., age 16, and a daughter, Mrs. Robert C. Daly.

The following list of medals and decorations he has received are just a slight recognition of the years General Gillem has devoted to his country: United States—Distinguished Service Medal (with Oak Leaf Cluster), Legion of Merit, Bronze Star, Mexican Service, Victory WW-I, National Defense, American Theater, European Theater (three Battle Stars), Asiatic Theater, Victory WW-II, German Occupation WW-II; Foreign—Brazil: Medal for Merit (Commander's Degree); France: Legion of Honor and Croix de Guerre with Palm; Netherlands: Order of Orange Nassau (Grand Officer); Russia: Order of Red Banner, First Class (three times); Belgium: Order of Leopold and Croix de Guerre; China: Grand Cordon, Cloud and Banner. Probably the greatest decoration, however, is the fact that as he leaves the service, he goes knowing that synonymous with Gillem will be the statement "a job well done," a man who has never made an enemy but is blessed with friends wherever he goes who would welcome the opportunity of serving under or associating with Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., again.

Thus on August 31, 1950, a brilliant military career will be brought to a close as Lt. Gen. Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., and his family drive through the gates of Fort McPherson and head west for San Jose, Calif., their new home. However, doffing the Army uniform for a civilian suit does not bring an end to the story of "Van" Gillem. On the contrary, only another chapter is ended and a new one started. All eyes will be focused on the service he will continue to render to his country as a civilian. There are still many pages to be read in the book on the career of Alvan Cullem Gillem, Jr.

XIII CORPS SALUTES GILLEM

TO ALVAN CULLEM GILLEM, JR.:

Those of us who served in the units that comprised the XIII Corps feel that in speaking for ourselves, we also echo the voice of countless thousands, when we extend our warmest greetings to you and yours on the eve of your retirement. We wish for your continued success in your new venture—civilian life. Although you may be retiring from active military life, we know that your stimulating influence will be felt in the civilian community as well as it has been in the military, for Alvan C. Gillem, Jr., is more than a leader of soldiers, he is a leader of men.

To express our feelings about you in a few lines is impossible, not even pages would suffice to let you know of the esteem we hold for you. But we do not have to extoll your merits, your record speaks for itself, and we know this new chapter in your career will be equally outstanding. To have been associated with you in the past was a distinct honor and you may be assured that we will still be behind you in the future.

Tactician, leader, counselor, humanitarian, friend—yes, these and many more characteristics, add up to one—Alvan Cullem Gillem, Jr.

Always yours,

ALL CONTROLLERS.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a letter from the general counsel of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

This is of special interest to all the people in the town of Nahant, Mass.

It reflects the long and successful efforts of the townspeople to secure the return of the Fort Ruckman Military Reservation to the community.

The Fort Ruckman property, no longer needed by the military, will provide Nahant with space to expand. It will enable the town to proceed with a program of public improvements.

This letter is evidence of the wholehearted teamwork that made possible this happy result:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES
IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1950.

HON. THOMAS J. LANE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LANE: I noted that on July 26, 1950, Public Law 623 was signed by the President of the United States; this legislation transferred Fort Ruckman to the town of Nahant, Mass. I know that this successful conclusion to your very meritorious efforts in this regard must be most pleasing to you. I suppose that very few ever think about the amount of work, the many conferences, the staff discussions, checking and rechecking that underlie the passage of an act of this nature.

Having worked closely with you on this project which you found very necessary for your district, I am pleased to be able to commend you on the industry and perseverance that marked your work in seeking this legislation. It cannot be gainsaid that but for your efforts—and at many times it appeared most difficult—Fort Ruckman would not have been transferred to the town of Nahant.

Nahant is to be congratulated, also, on their public awareness in seeking this type of legislation and actively enlisting your aid. In this mutual collaboration we see the legislation which resulted in Public Law 623.

Public Law 623 and the many other worthwhile legislative measures you have sponsored have demonstrated the high caliber of representation in Congress enjoyed by your district.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS A. KENNEDY.

Charles Pinckney, Constitution Maker

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have been giving special study to the lives and contributions of our founding fathers, with particular reference to South Carolina's native sons. I now invite your attention to Charles Pinckney, who probably supplied more original work in making the Constitution than did any other individual.

When Charles Pinckney presented his strangely obscure plan of government to the Constitutional Convention, he did not offer a hastily contrived scheme. This brilliant student of the art and science of politics had long been painfully aware that if his country were not to die in embryo, stronger bonds of union had to be forged. He was one of the first men in America, if not the very first, to realize the general futility of the Articles of Confederation. He was to labor unceasingly to improve or remove this feeble compact.

Born in 1757 in Charlestown (Charleston), S. C., Pinckney from his earliest years enjoyed the advantages of breeding, wealth, and leisure. He made the most of them. While still in his teens he was admitted to the South Carolina Bar. In 1779 he was elected to the South Carolina House of Representatives. Five years later he became a delegate to the Congress of the Confederation, and was reelected in 1785 and 1786. In the Congress, Pinckney at once became a recognized champion of stronger government. When New Jersey, in October of 1785, threatened to desert the Confederation, Congress delegated a committee of three, including the youthful South Carolinian, to plead before the New Jersey Legislature the cause of cohesion.

Significantly, Pickney was chosen spokesman for the emissaries; and on March 13, 1786, he delivered an address, pregnant with evidence of political genius and foreshadowing the general structure of the Constitution, before the northern legislature. He pointed out that—

When these States united, convinced of the inability of each to support a separate system and that their protection and existence depended on their union, policy as well as prudence dictated the necessity of forming one general and efficient government, which, while it protected and secured the whole, left to the several States those rights of internal sovereignty which it was not necessary to delegate and which could be exercised without injury to the Federal authority. If New Jersey conceives herself oppressed under the present confederation, let her through her delegates in Congress, state to them the oppression she complains of, and urge the calling of a general convention of the States for the purpose of increasing the powers of the Federal Government and rendering it more adequate for the ends for which it was instituted; in this constitutional mode of application there can be no doubt of her meeting with all the support and attention she can wish. I have long been of opinion that it is the only true and radical remedy for our public defects, and shall with pleasure assent to and support any measure of that kind which may be introduced while I continue a member of that body.

The patent cogency of these remarks dissipated all disaffection, and thus a South Carolinian precluded a northern rebellion. The Federal compact, for the time at least, remained intact.

Two months later Pinckney again sounded the call for a virile union. He asserted before the Congress that—

It is necessary to inform the States of our condition. Congress must be invested with greater powers, or the Federal Government must fall. It is, therefore, necessary for Congress either to appoint a convention for that purpose, or by requisition to call on the States for such powers as are necessary to enable it to administer the Federal Government.

It is generally conceded that as a delegate to the Continental Congress Pinckney was the most resourceful and courageous member of that group in the struggle to strengthen the Union.

On May 29, shortly after the Constitutional Convention had commenced official operations, and immediately after the introduction of the Virginia Resolutions, Charles Pinckney submitted his own plan of union. It was at once referred to the Committee of the Whole House. On July 24 the young statesman's propositions were discharged from consideration by the Committee of the Whole and referred to the Committee of Detail.

The Pinckney plan was not debated on the floor of the Convention, nor was it discussed in the Committee of the Whole. It was evidently considered, however, by the Committee of Detail: Professors Jameson and McLaughlin in the early 1900's discovered documents supporting the latter view. At no time during the Convention did any member save Pinckney allude to the South Carolinian's plan. It is altogether possible that this strange silence stemmed from a general feeling of resentment that one so young as Pinckney should be presumptuous enough to submit a plan of government in competition with the offerings of the more mature and better-known delegates.

Curiously enough, little interest centered about the Pinckney plan until 1818, when John Quincy Adams, then Secretary of State, discovered, while collecting Convention documents for his edition of the Journal of Convention proceedings, that the Pinckney plan was missing. Adams thereupon requested Pinckney, still alive in South Carolina, to furnish him with a copy of the latter's scheme. Pinckney replied immediately, asserting that he had in his possession four or five rough drafts of his plan, and although he was not certain which was a true copy, he would send the one he believed to be such. When Adams published this draft as representing the original plan, a controversy that has yet to be stilled was born.

Some scholars accepted without question the authenticity of the Adams' draft; a few others immediately entertained grave doubts. James Madison, for one, asserted positively that the draft submitted by Pinckney to Adams was not a copy of the plan presented by the former to the Federal Convention. In the Adams' draft, election to the House of Representatives was to be by vote of the people. Pinckney, however, while a member of the Convention, strongly supported election by the State legislatures. Further, and conclusive, proof that the two drafts were not identical in content may be found in a letter Pinckney wrote to Madison on March 28, 1789, wherein the former inquired:

> Are you not abundantly convinced that the theoretic nonsense of an election of the Members of Congress by the people, in the first instance, is clearly and practically wrong; * * * and that the legislatures are the only proper judges of who ought to be elected?

Further proof that the passage of 30 years has dulled Pinckney's memory lies in the fact that both the alleged plan and the transmittal letter furnished Adams in 1818 were written upon paper watermarked Russel & Co., 1797. The purported draft was apparently a copy of the report of the Committee of Detail submitted on August 6, 1787, albeit somewhat altered and embellished. Then, too, Professors Jameson and McLaughlin, shortly after the turn of the century, found among the James Wilson Papers extracts from, and outline of, the original Pinckney plan. The ideas expressed in these documents were almost totally at variance with the 1818 draft.

Despite the loss of the plan, it has been ascertained, from available authentic documents, that Pinckney's scheme was to form a considerable part of the Constitution, and that he proposed not mere amendments to the Articles of Confederation, but the establishment of a real government and one, at least in some particulars, endowed with powers and authority.

Professor Jameson proved that 19 or 20 of the provisions contained in the Pinckney plan which were not embodied in the Virginia Resolutions as adopted were to be found in the definitive report of the Committee of Detail. "Taken together," he states, "they constitute a noteworthy contribution." Upon McLaughlin's discovery of an authentic outline of the Pinckney plan, the number of provisions in the Constitution directly traceable to Pinckney was increased to 31 or 32. McLaughlin cautioned that—

> It must not be assumed that we know all that Pinckney thus contributed to the fabric of the Constitution. We knew very definitely the nature of his recommendations, we know that some of them found formulation in the Continental Congress, and we know that many of them were finally embedded in the Constitution; but there were doubtless some other propositions that likewise found permanence in the work of the Convention. If mere assertion based on analogy and general probability were worth while, other portions on the Constitution might be pointed to as coming from the ingenious and confident young statesman from South Carolina.

In 1911 Max Farrand, noted constitutional authority, printed a reconstruction of Pinckney's plan, based upon the afore-mentioned documents. Some of the more important provisions of the project are the following:

> The Stile of this government shall be The United States of America, and the legislative, executive and judiciary powers shall be separate and distinct.
> The Legislature shall consist of two distinct Branches—a Senate and a House of Delegates, each of which shall have a Negative on the other, and shall be stiled the U. S. in Congress assembled.
> The House of Delegates to be elected by the State Legislatures, and to consist of one Member for every ——— thousand inhabitants, 3/5 of Blacks included.
> The Members of S. & H. D. shall each have one Vote, and shall be paid out of the common Treasury * * *.
> Each House shall appoint its own Speaker and other Officers, and settle its own Rules of Proceedings; but neither the Senate nor H. D. shall have the power to adjourn for more than ——— Days without the Consent of both * * *.
> It shall be his (the President's) Duty to inform the Legislature (at every session) of the condition of the United States, so far as may respect his Department—to recommend Matters to their Consideration (such as shall appear to him to concern their good government, welfare and prosperity) * * * to attend to the execution of the Laws of the U. S. * * *.
> He shall, by Virtue of his Office, be Commander in chief of the Land Forces of U. S. and Admiral of their Navy.
> He shall have Power to convene the Legislature on extraordinary occasions—to prorogue them, (when they cannot agree as to the time of their adjournment) * * *.
> Each State retains its Rights not expressly delegated * * *.
> The S. & H. D. in C. Assembled shall have the exclusive power of rating and causing public Taxes to be levied * * *.

These provisions, it is readily apparent, constituted one of the "most useful documents" used in the fashioning of America's great charter. Pinckney's contribution, moreover, was not limited to the supplying of such basic pillars of the Constitution. On June 25, 1787, he delivered one of the most memorable speeches of the entire Convention. "With the exception of those by Madison and Wilson, no such powerful, eloquent, and brilliant contribution had been made." Whereas the debates up to this time had been centered on provincial issues, Pinckney injected a ringing note of Americanism. He spoke of "'a new extensive country containing within itself the materials of forming a Government capable of extending to its citizens all the blessings of civil and religious liberty, capable of making them happy at home.'" It was this that comprised "'the great end of a Republican form of Government.'"

Until now, it had been painfully true that—> whenever a delegate had thought it necessary to support an opinion by historical examples, he had referred to the republics and confederacies of earlier times, or to the British Government. Pinckney brought the mind of the convention back to America and emphasized the unique situation of its people. He would not break with the past, yet would found a government adopted to the wants of a new country and a new nation. Nearly all the members of the convention became identified later with the administration of the national government, the plan of which they were now forming, but to them there was no American history in the sense in which these words are now understood. The government they were forming would be an experiment, and the people were yet to prove it administrable. Pinckney's speech was, therefore, the more remarkable because of its American tone. It is usual to speak of Hamilton's speech to the convention as one that raised the minds of its members to a clearer concept of the unique situation of the American people, and to the conclusion that a government should be formed adapted to such a country as ours. Hamilton not only believed that the British Constitution was the best in existence, but he wished it copied as closely as possible in America. Pinckney acknowledged its excellence, but showed with larger wisdom that it was not adapted to the American people. From the time Pinckney spoke, and only a fragment of his speech is preserved, the member must have been persuaded, if any were yet in doubt that the Constitution which they were making must be American in character.

To one biographer of Pinckney it would seem, in summing up his role as an author of America's basic law, "not improbable that he (Pinckney) had a larger share than any other individual in the determination of the form and content of the finished Constitution." Constitutionalist Charles Warren, while not quite so fulsome in his praise, asserted unequivocably that Pinckney was one of the "ten men who stood out as chiefly responsible for the form which the Constitution finally took."

No one has ever questioned Pinckney's talents. Warren considered him a man of "extreme ability." Bethea declared that "it is doubtful whether South Carolina has ever produced a statesman who held so many offices of honor and trust, or one who filled them with more credit and satisfaction to the State." Delegate to the Continental Congress, member of the Constitutional Convention, Governor of his State several times over, United States Senator as well as Representative, Pinckney's record as a public servant is one of the most distinguished in the annals of this Nation. Yet his contributions, especially those rendered in the drafting of the Constitution, have remained generally obscured. Why, we may ask, has not his part as Constitution-maker been trumpeted down the corridors of time? There are a number of likely reasons.

First, Pinckney was one of the very youngest members of the Federal Convention. His elders might well have been so repelled by the brilliance and aggressiveness of the youthful statesman that they deliberately belittled his achievements. Secondly, he thought and worked independently; in fashioning his plan he did not collaborate with his fellow delegates. In the third place, he presented his draft, not in the name of his State (as did Edmund Randolph with the Virginia Resolutions), but as his own exclusive contribution, as it was.

There are yet other possible explanations. The records of the Convention were imperfectly kept; of particular importance is the fact that the disposition of his plan by the Committee of Detail remains a mystery. Moreover, the original draft of the Pinckney plan has never been found. A sixth factor in the general ignorance is found in the bias and jealousy of many so-called authorities. Finally, while South Carolina has been making history, she has let other States write it.

For many years, there was some confusion as to where Charles Pinckney was buried. All doubt has now been removed as to the resting place of this distinguished South Carolinian. Recently, through the generosity of Dr. Thornwell Jacobs, a memorial tablet was unveiled at the tomb of Charles Pinckney in St. Philip's Churchyard, Charleston, S. C.

The Negro Question Without Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered at Amerika Haus, Berlin, Germany, June 29, 1950, by George Schuyler, editor of the Pittsburgh Courier:

THE NEGRO QUESTION WITHOUT PROPAGANDA

In the vicious propaganda campaign of lies and distortions to which ungrateful totalitarian slave states have subjected the United States of America (which saved them from Hitler), the treatment of its Negro citizens has been held up as a horrible illustration of the weakness and failure of democracy.

The prostitute press and radio of the Communist camorra have presented a picture of Negro existence in America so fantastic, so false, so contrary to the facts of his everyday life in the 48 States as to be unrecognizable by anyone familiar with the Nation. This stereotype is so grotesque as to be at once amusing and deplorable. One must question the intelligence and integrity of those who so readily believe it.

Actually, the progressive improvement of interracial relations in the United States is the most flattering of the many examples of the superiority of the free American civilization over the soul-shackling reactionism of totalitarian regimes. It is this capacity for change and adjustment inherent in the system of individual initiative and decentralized authority to which we must attribute the unprecedented economic, social, and educational progress of the Negroes of the United States.

The chattel slave system, or any slave system, is not inherent in capitalism which for growth directly depends upon pleasing the consumer and increasing his purchasing power· whatever its flaws, the history of capitalism is one of constant mass improvement that everyone can see.

During America's 225 years of legalized chattel slavery, 10,000,000 Africans were brought to the plantations of the Western Hemisphere. Because they represented economic value to their masters, every effort was made to preserve their health and productivity as long as possible. This should be contrasted with the slave system of Soviet Russia which from 1930 onward continually has held from fifteen to twenty million victims in servitude under conditions so savage and heartless that millions have died from mistreatment. Having no individual economic value, these unfortunates have been and are being worked to death with calculated ruthlessness. Whereas today the slave system of Soviet Russia has become so essential to its economy that it grows more extensive year by year, the chattel slave system of capitalism has been long since abolished. Soviet Russia after 30 years has twice as many slaves as were brought to all the Americas in 225 years. Even war prisoners have been forced into slavery and so many have died in Soviet labor camps that 1,000,000 Germans and 400,000 Japanese are "missing"; and up to date the Soviet Government, unable to produce them, has been forced into the ridiculous denial that they ever existed! By contrast, the United States has repatriated all of its war prisoners and the prisons of America contain only 141,000 inmates—among them no political prisoners.

From 1861 to 1865 the United States fought a bloody civil war in which 200,000 Negroes joined to settle the issue of chattel slavery. By the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, 5,000,000 Negro slaves were emancipated. By the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, they became full-fledged citizens of the Republic, along with the half-million already free. During the Civil War, there was no uprising of the Negro slaves nor molestation of the white women and children left behind by their men. One can well imagine what conditions would be in Soviet Russia and its satellites if their enslaved millions were suddenly freed.

In 1865 over 90 percent of the Negroes were totally illiterate. Today practically all can read and write except in remote rural areas. In some places, like New York City, the percentage of Negro literates is higher than that of the whites.

In 1865, not over a score of Negroes had graduated from colleges and universities. Today over 7,000 Negroes graduate from colleges and universities each year. The total graduated since 1912 is 80,000. The total which has attended college is 650,000.

All of the private institutions of higher learning for Negroes in the States of the former Confederacy were established by white people who taught in them and financially supported them. Alongside these are the colleges and universities controlled and supported by public taxation. It is inconceivable that this could have happened in the South if the racial hatred which has been represented as characteristic there had obtained in any marked degree.

Today there are 70,000 Negroes in American colleges, or proportionately a greater number than in the United Kingdom which has 82,500 out of a population of 50,000,000.

Fifty years ago it was almost hopefully prophesied that the American Negro would soon become extinct because of disease. In 1950 the life expectancy is 60 years, or only 7 years less than the whites. This amazing health progress would not have been possible had race hatred been as prevalent as reported.

During the 1930's the Federal Government constructed 150,000 dwelling units; and although Negroes were only 10 percent of the population, they got 50,000 of these units.

In 1900 only 17 percent of Negro nonfarm homes were owned. In 1947, the figure was over 34 percent. In 1940, Negroes dwelling in cities (half their population) owned over 500,000 homes. In 1930 these homes had a median value of $6,377.

Over 2,500 Negro-owned dwellings in New York, Chicago, and Washington alone were worth from $10,000 to $15,000; while 850 were valued from $15,000 to $20,000 or over. Such well-being could scarcely obtain in an atmosphere of terror.

Evidence of the eagerness of the American Nation to bring the Negro population up to the national level of enlightenment was the establishment in 1867 of the Freedman's Bureau which soon had 623 schools with 15,248 Negro pupils. By 1900, there were 1,539,507 Negro pupils in public elementary schools—51.4 percent of the total Negro population of school age. By 1920, this enrollment was 2,000,000, and today it is two and one-quarter million.

In 1910 there were 5,000 Negro high-school students; in 1950 there are 300,000, and the annual total of Negro high-school graduates is 40,000. In 1910 there were 42 public high schools in the South and by 1950 this had grown to 2,500.

In 1900, the daily attendance was 33 percent, whereas today it is 80 percent.

A Jewish philanthropist, Julius Rosenwald, established the Julius Rosenwald Fund in 1912. By 1932 this fund had spent a total of $28,500,000 and helped erect 5,000 school buildings in the South. Negroes themselves contributed $4,725,871.

The total value of Negro school property in the South was, in 1940, $79,250. The total value in 1948 was $120,000,000.

In 1900 the total expenditure per pupil was $4.50 for whites and $1.50 for Negroes, in 1948 it was $139.49 for whites and $76 45 for Negroes. In 1904 for each dollar whites received, Negroes got 50 cents. In 1948 for each dollar whites received, Negroes got 71 cents.

While southern Negro teachers generally do not get as much pay as southern white teachers, salaries have been equalized in very many States and communities, thanks to legal action on the part of the Negroes and to the unprejudiced attitude of the courts.

In 1947 13 percent of all Negroes in the United States had completed secondary school while 5 percent or 650,000 had attended college.

Much of the stimulus for the drive to educate the American Negro came from white capitalists like the aforementioned Julius Rosenwald. Following the end of the Civil War there were few Negroes capable of teaching school so northern white missionaries and officers of the victorious Union Army set up schools and did the teaching.

The Slater Fund was established by capitalists and from 1910 to 1930 contributed $250,000 for salaries for teachers in county training schools in the Southern States. This fund was administered by James H. Dillard, a Southern white man.

The Jeannes Fund was established by American capitalists and was also used to pay Negro teachers in Southern rural areas beginning in 1908. It was also aided by a Southern white man, Dr. Jackson Davis of Virginia. This pattern of rural education was later copied for white rural schools and for similar schools in foreign lands. There are now 500 Jeannes teachers in as many counties. Since 1908, a total of 12,407 Jeannes teachers have served in 803 counties. In 1937 these teachers started a fund as an expression of appreciation to Miss Virginia Randolph, the first Jeannes teacher. It now totals $50,000. Here, too, we see evidence of the progressive liberalism of America in the fact that in 1912 the Jeannes Fund paid 92 percent of the Jeannes teachers whereas 95 percent are now paid out of the public treasuries.

Further evidence of the interest of much-maligned whites in aiding these backward people, was the establishment in 1898 of the Conference for Education in the South. Then in 1902 the Rockefellers set up the General Education Board which has expended 40 percent of its money to advance Negro education.

Following that, in 1915 to 1916, came the Phelps-Stokes Fund headed by Thomas Jesse Jones. Many other organizations have been extremely helpful, such as the Southern Sociological Congress, the Southern University Race Commission, the Carnegie Corporation which provides libraries, the YMCA and YWCA, and for the last quarter century the United States Office of Education. Without the help of all these groups, it would not have been possible for us to make the progress that has been made in Negro education.

The stereotype of the poverty-stricken American Negro is also paraded by the totalitarian propagandists as an illustration of the failure of democracy. The facts are so at variance with this fiction as to be laughable. There are, it is true, millions of poor Negroes as there are millions of poor whites, but what is regarded as poverty in the United States is called prosperity by workers elsewhere. Steadily, for the last 50 years, the educational, cultural, and economic gulf between the Negroes and whites has been narrowing. While white Americans generally have greater income than their colored brethren, it is cause for reflection that 12.9 percent of whites and 14 percent of Negroes make from $1,000 to $1,500 a year; that 1.1 percent of the whites and 0.2 percent of the Negroes make from $5,000 to $6,000 a year, while only 0.8 percent of the whites and 0.2 percent of the Negroes make from $6,000 to $10,000 annually. It is not only a tribute to the Negroes that they have in such a short space of time achieved such economic well-being but it also indicates a willingness on the part of the white majority to enable them to do so. Compared to the economic condition of minorities elsewhere in the world, that of the American Negro is enviable. It is worth noting that over 1,000,000 are members of American labor unions, receive identical wages, allowances, work conditions, job security, and paid vacations with their white fellow workers, depending on skill and seniority. Two-thirds of the American Negroes being agricultural and domestic workers, this is a very high percentage of Negro workers in industry. It is lamentably true that a score of prominent labor unions in the United States still exclude Negroes or in several ways discriminate against them. However, it is also true that in the last 3 years six of these unions have adjusted their attitude and admit colored workers to their membership. This is just another example of the growing racial liberalism.

Wherever Negro and white workers belong to the same unions, they meet together, strike together, whether North or South, and this occasions no surprise whatever to those familiar with American life. Many of these unions, predominantly white, have elected Negro officers. This could scarcely happen in an atmosphere of terror and repression. Parenthetically, only in democratic countries are labor unions free. Despite the horrors to which workers in the Soviet Union are subjected no one ever hears of a strike there nor even a public disagreement, which is certainly ominous.

American Negroes own 13 banks, 74 credit unions, and scores of cooperative societies. They own over 50,000 retail business establishments, 20 savings and loan associations, and 204 insurance companies. In 1947 the 52 leading Negro insurance companies had total assets of $94,639,376 and $1,000,000,000 worth of insurances in force in 27 States and the District of Columbia.

In addition to this, American Negroes (mostly in the Southern States where the overwhelming majority resides) own 12,336,794 acres of farm land which represents 19,000 square miles, or an area much larger than the Netherlands. There are 189,215 Negro farm owners; the farms averaging 78.3 acres. Last year some Negro farmers in the South grossed as much as $175,000.

As of today, American Negroes own nearly 800,000 homes and this proportion of home owners approximates that of the American whites. Indeed, American Negroes themselves through their own builders, architects, and financial institutions have erected over 25,000 housing units.

In a free federation such as the United States, with 48 separate and independent sovereignties, communication and travel have been so easy that the population has been extremely mobile. The mobility of the Negroes has equaled that of the whites, and today the Negro population is scattered over the entire country, although 77 percent still live in the 16 Southern States. It is commentary on the reported terrorism prevailing in the South that the proportion of the Negro population living there has undergone no change.

There is no desire to minimize the segregational and discriminatory laws in the Southern States which are indeed a disgrace to American civilization. However, the Negroes have always been free to move where they chose and without asking anyone's permission. Thus between 1930 and 1940 the Negro population increased 15.8 percent in the North, 41.8 percent in the West, and 5.8 percent in the South. The figures on white mobility are similar.

Because of this ability to move from one State to another within the Nation, no Negroes have emigrated from the United States to nearby lands. As a matter of fact, there are more Negroes in the South than ever, although there are less in the rural areas than in the cities, which is also true of the whites.

A commentary on the American system and what the Negroes think of it is the fact that they have borne arms in every war in which the Nation has been engaged. There were nearly 4,000 Negroes serving in the War for Independence, and in World War II over 1,150,000 enrolled. One-fourth of a million served in the Civil War and one-half a million in World War I. There is no evidence that any of these men or women ever deserted to the enemy or were convicted of treason. This is in contrast to the desertion of the whole First Ukrainian Army under General Vlasov, to the Germans, plus the wholesale desertion from numerous other units of the Russian armies. The attitude of the Negroes in this regard is conclusive evidence that they do not regard America as the propagandists would have us to believe.

The changes that have taken place in the structure of the American armed forces is further evidence of the progressive improvement of race relations. Where 20 years ago complete racial segregation prevailed in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, successive orders from above and their implementation resulted in wide-spread mixing of Negro and white personnel in all branches, notably the United States Navy and to a lesser extent the Air Corps. Today, Negroes are serving in all branches of the American Armed Forces and the remaining segregation is being rapidly broken down.

Contrary to the propaganda from totalitarian slave states, American Negroes not only move freely, worship freely, and work freely, but they also speak freely. For example, where there is only one Jewish newspaper in Russia and that one controlled by the government, the Negro minority in the United States operates over 200 newspapers and has boasted a press since 1827. The majority of these newspapers are published in the "terror-stricken" South. They are individually owned; they have a combined weekly circulation of 3,000,000 copies and the value of their printing plants runs into the millions of dollars. It is largely through these newspapers and the organizations which they support and publicize that the Negro population has been welded into a militant force against reactionary racism. Not a single Negro newspaper has been suppressed, North or South, although they have been unsparing in their criticism of the Jim Crow system. Obviously such a press could only exist in an atmosphere of freedom.

Similarly, the Negro church whose 40,000 structures serve as meeting places for the colored people could not have carried on or grown except in a tolerant environment. Serving nearly one-half of the Negro population, the total value of these church properties is around $250,000,000. It spends well over $30,000,000 annually. There are few instances in modern times of Negroes having been prevented from asserting their spiritual rights even in the most backward rural areas. These churches have been in the forefront of all movements for the economic, political, and social benefit of their people, especially in the support of the racially radical programs for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The memberships of certain individual Negro churches are the largest in the United States. Many have thousands of members and budgets ranging from $25,000 to $60,000 a year. Clearly no such extensive organization could exist except in a free country. This is in contrast to the treatment of the church behind the iron curtain.

All fair-minded Americans admit that the disenfranchisement of the Negroes in the South was a crime. For 10 years, the Negro minority in the Southern States, protected by the bayonets of the Union Army, exercised full rights of citizenship including the ballot, but progressively from 1876 onward they were disenfranchised by various legal devices and by force until by 1900 they had almost completely lost the right to vote. It might be added, however, that Negroes have voted since the Civil War in the 33 States outside the South, and in some places they voted even before the Civil War. In many of these States today, Negroes are an increasingly important factor in elections.

But the greatest development which illustrates the ability of a free society to change is evidenced by the increasing number of Negro voters in the South in the last decade. In many Southern States, where 10 years ago a Negro did not dare to approach the polls, they are now voting in the scores of thousands, and soon will be voting in the hundreds of thousands. This remarkable change has been brought about solely through legal action and instances in which force has been used to prevent the exercise of the right to vote have been rare. There is no single State in the South today where some Negroes are not voting, and less than one-half of these States require payment of poll tax as a qualification to exercise the right of suffrage.

Of course, the greatest blots on the American record have been mob murder, usually called lynching and race riots. The record is most grim, and yet inexcusable though these crimes be, it is gratifying to point out that the problem has been practically solved. Whereas in 1900 there were 115 lynchings, in 1949 there were 3; and this was more than in the two previous years. From 1934 to 1949, inclusive, the total number of mob murders was less than in the single year of 1900. Along with this decrease in lynchings, there has been a marked increase in the alertness of police which prevented these crimes. There was a time when so-called officers of the law rarely interfered, but today it is quite different.

This gratifying evidence of increasing law and order in the United States simply indicates that the country which was still largely frontier 50 years ago and had only recently emerged from a long and sanguinary Civil War over the Negro is becoming more settled and tolerant.

In essence the Negro problem (which has been as much white as Negro) has been one of integrating a previously enslaved and ostracized group of divergent color and culture into the national social structure with due respect for, and with the acquiescence of, the white majority and in accordance with the principles of American federalism, local sovereignty, and majority rule. The speed with which this revolution developed was too slow for some and too fast for many more; too fast indeed, for the southern States where the white majority was smallest, and where there were deep-seated fears, tensions, and resentments on both sides arising from slavery and its aftermath. The intrasectional racial adjustment was attended often by physical violence and repression, social ostracism and legal proscription which still obtain, although markedly lessening. The record of these inhumanities, while deplorable and regrettable, is amazing not by virtue of these occurrences but because, in spite of them there has been such unprecedented progress toward social homogeneity and justice in every direction, and within the memory of living man.

Progressively the color bar has been lowered here and there, either voluntarily by general agreement in the localities or through legal action in the courts. Although much maligned by malicious propaganda, these American courts have almost invariably decided in favor of full citizenship rights for Negro citizens in education, housing, transportation, suffrage, and legal defense; but always and necessarily with due respect for the principles of American republicanism as laid down in the Federal Constitution. Overruling lagging justice within the 48 sovereign States, the Supreme Court of the Nation has removed one obstacle after another from the Negro's path.

The cumulative effect of these broad, continued, and statesmanlike efforts has been improvement of racial relations in geometrical progression. Thus the gains in the past 10 years have far surpassed those made in the previous thirties. This explains not only the social, economic, and educational well-being of the colored minority, but the latter's continued and unsurpassed loyalty. American Negroes understand, far better than Soviet propagandists, that in the American system lies the hope of all submerged peoples who have the ability and determination to rise to the full stature of free men.

The United World Federalists Resolution on Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have included in the Appendix of the RECORD a resolution on Korea adopted by the United World Federalists. The Members of the Senate know this to be the largest American organization working exclusively in the field of foreign policy. The position of that organization on Korea, therefore, represents an important segment of American public opinion and should be respected. The resolution was adopted on August 27 by the national executive council of the United World Federalists meeting in New York City. I also ask unanimous consent that the names of the members of the council be incorporated in the Appendix.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ON KOREA PASSED BY NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COUNCIL, UNITED WORLD FEDERALISTS, INC., AUGUST 27, 1950

The National Executive Council of the United World Federalists, Inc., reiterates the organization's firm support of the action of the United Nations in combating Communist aggression in Korea. Military aggression against any nation is a threat to the whole world community.

We believe that there may be an opportunity in the Korean crisis which is equal to the danger. If we grasp this opportunity, Korea may mark the beginning of the end of war.

We believe that the United States must take four steps in response to this challenge:

1. The total military effort of the UN must be sustained until the aggression is repulsed. Military and economic preparedness must proceed as long as the actuality or potentiality of aggression exists anywhere.

2. The United States should at once proclaim that a goal of its foreign policy is to give the UN the real power it needs to prevent any future aggression and to secure and enforce universal disarmament. The ability of the UN to act against aggression in Korea depended on the absence of one nation, the Soviet Union. We cannot reasonably expect the same situation in the event of future aggression. The United States Government should at once seek the cooperation of all other nations in an effort to secure the widest possible agreement for a call of a charter revision conference to give the UN the limited legislature, judicial, and police powers that are required to prevent aggression. Only when the United States has declared that its goal is peace with honor under world government will we have adopted a position of moral and political leadership in keeping with our heritage, our traditions, and our responsibilities.

3. The United States, in its own interest, should pledge to contribute substantial sums to a world fund to be administered by the UN where possible, for the economic development of underdeveloped areas. The people of Asia may be expected to resist more vigorously the force and fraud of communism when it is clear that the UN has a plan for relief of their economic misery.

4. The United States must put into action a bold and imaginative plan for proclaiming its program for peace to the world. The Voice of America must have a message that will stir the hearts and minds of men everywhere. Our plan for giving the UN real power to outlaw war and our pledge to contribute substantially to the world's welfare is that message.

America is presently preoccupied with the immediate task of winning military victory. But we must recognize that reliance on military power alone cannot bring peace and security to this nation and the world.

Proposed Investigation of Federal Judges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not approve the resolution reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary a few days ago authorizing an all-out investigation of all Federal judges. Those against whom charges are made should be investigated, but I fear that the kind of investigation envisioned by the Judiciary Committee resolution would have a detrimental effect on the independence of the Judiciary and upon the justified confidence in which our people hold the members of the Federal bench.

These reasons are well set forth in an editorial appearing in the Evening Star of August 30, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A THREAT TO THE JUDGES

Threats to our freedom—against ourselves and by ourselves—may be much closer than we think.

Last week Judges William Orr and William Healy of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals decreed that Harry Bridges, suspected Communist and convicted perjurer, should be freed on bail pending his appeal.

Senator LANGER, Republican, of North Dakota took the floor in the Senate and said:

"If the facts in the Bridges case are as they have been stated to me, Judges William Orr and William Healy should be impeached and thrown out of office. If, on the other hand, the facts are otherwise, those judges should be retained."

Senator LANGER said he wants to know whether any Federal judges are Communists or Communist sympathizers, or members of subversive organizations, and whether they are still fit because of age or otherwise to perform their duties. Yesterday, hard as it is to believe, the Senate Judiciary Committee endorsed Senator LANGER'S resolution and called for an investigation of the "competence, fitness and legal qualifications" of all Federal judges.

It is important to bear in mind that this is not to be merely an investigation of any complaints, substantial or otherwise, which Senator LANGER may or may not have received against Judges Orr and Healy. If finally authorized, it will be an investigation of all Federal judges, even though they have already been investigated and confirmed by the Senate. And, most ominous of all, it evidently will be an investigation inspired by fear that Communists have infiltrated the Federal judiciary.

We in America had better pause and take stock of where we are going. What is one to think when two highly placed judges become suspect because they vote to admit an accused Communist to bail? Is Chief Judge Learned Hand, highly respected member of the second circuit, to become equally suspect because he favored bail for the 11 Communist leaders convicted in New York? Are these men, and others like them, to be subjected to a Senate investigation for discharging their judicial duties as their consciences may dictate? If so, if the Senate goes along with the action of its Judiciary Committee, there will be ample reason to fear that the independence of the Federal judiciary—a cardinal guaranty of freedom as we know it now—is seriously threatened.

The people of this country should never forget that the Federal courts, in times of emotional stress, are the surest bulwarks of the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution. And anything that impairs or tends to impair the independence of the courts is a direct and immediate threat to the liberties of the people. It is one thing for the Senate to investigate specific charges against individual judges with a view to impeachment. That is the Senate's right and duty. But it is quite a different thing to propose an investigation of all judges because, or at least primarily because, a decision by one court happens to run counter to the popular mood. The Star does not think that the Federal judges will be intimidated by any such move as this. But if they should be, that fact alone will do far more damage to our way of life than anything that conceivably might be done by a thousand Harry Bridges.

First Poland, Now Korea—The Aggressors Change Their Names, Not Their Colors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, just 11 years ago tomorrow, on September 1, 1939, Adolf Hitler unleashed his Nazi hordes in a blitzkrieg against hapless Poland. It was the beginning of a conflict which was eventually to involve almost every important country in the world, was to last for almost six torturing years, and was to cause untold bloodshed and damage throughout the world. Today, only 5 years after VE- and VJ-days, the United Nations, including the United States, are again engaged in a military struggle as a result of ruthless aggression. I refer, of course, to Korea.

There are certain notable common elements that may be observed in the Nazi onslaught against Poland and the Communist aggression against Korea. Perhaps the most striking of these is that in both instances it was the Kremlin which made aggression possible, in the case of Poland, by the surprise signature on August 23, 1939, of the nonaggression pact with the Nazis, and, in the case of Korea, by arming, training, and then ordering the North Koreans to cross the thirty-eighth parallel in an armed invasion of the southern Republic.

Furthermore, the Korean war, like the Polish war, is not just a local conflict of limited significance; like the Polish struggle it is merely one phase of a much vaster attempt to win the entire world. Hitler's ambitions did not stop at Danzig or the Polish Corridor; he wanted whole continents of lebensraum for the German people. Likewise, Stalin's aims are not merely to advance communism to the southern terminus of the Korean peninsula; he wants eventually to win the whole world for his totalitarian ideology. It is for this reason that the western nations were compelled to oppose with military force Hitler's aggression in 1939 and that the United Nations must at the present day use armed police action to thwart Stalin's ambitions.

To carry the comparison further, both Korea and Poland were innocent victims who had neither harmed nor provoked their attackers. Poland was a member of the League of Nations and was attacked by a country which so condemned what the League stood for that it had withdrawn from that organization in 1933. Although the Republic of Korea's admission into the United Nations has been blocked by the veto of the Soviet Union, it should be emphasized that the Southern Korean Republic is, nevertheless, a ward of the United Nations because the latter has sponsored and approved the elections which established the Korean Government.

The U. S. S. R. has manifested its profound contempt for the United Nations, just as Hitler displayed his contempt for the principles of the League, by sending its puppet troops against the very government which the UN has endorsed.

Thus in both of these cases of aggression—Poland in 1939 and Southern Korea in 1950—there are similarities that bear a lesson for us. Aggressors act everywhere pretty much the same—Jacob Malik, for instance, in the UN Security Council makes preposterous charges of South Korean aggression just as Hitler accused Poland of attacking Germany—so that we can recognize them when they begin to show their true colors. After our experience with Hitler, Tojo, and Mussolini we would be blind indeed not to perceive that Stalin is of the same ilk. But the master of the Kremlin is far more dangerous than the Axis leaders ever were, for he possesses a fifth column throughout the world that constantly and traitorously works for the benefit and advantage of the Soviet Union.

Stalin already has enslaved more than a third of the world's population; the freedom-loving United Nations cannot afford permitting the Communist aggressor to expand further. Poland was the point where the democratic nations in 1939 had to cast the die for armed resistance to aggression.

Korea is the point where the United Nations in 1950 must step in with military power to checkmate the Soviet Union. But here, we hope, the comparison will end—for we do not want Korea to be the prologue of world war III—as Poland was the opening curtain for World War II. Nor need it be, provided the United Nations carries the Korean war to a successful issue with courage and dispatch.

The Position of Nehru

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial appearing in the New York Times for August 29 on the position of Prime Minister Nehru with respect to the present international situation be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE POSITION OF NEHRU

The struggle for Asia conceivably could be won or lost in the mind of one man—Jawaharlal Nehru, political and spiritual leader of more than 330,000,000 of the people of India. It is vital that we should try to understand him. Whatever one may think of his opinions—and most of us have been rather unhappy about some of those opinions—no one can deny that is the the most influential non-Communist voice in Asia. He is in a sense the counterweight on the democratic side to Mao Tze-tung on the Communist side. To have Pandit Nehru as an ally in the struggle for Asiatic support is worth many divisions; to have him as an opponent or even a critic could jeopardize the position of western democracy throughout Asia.

He is not a man to be bought with any sort of offer or flattery. His strength and influence are due in part to his anti-imperialist record and his unquestioned integrity. When he takes a stand it is from moral conviction. This does not mean that he will have the same idea of what is moral or right as an American would. Thus he condemns the North Koreans as aggressors but is not willing to follow his condemnation through to what we consider to be the logical conclusions. He is a powerful anti-Communist at home but does not fight communism elsewhere in Asia. He can be philosophical about China, but gets highly emotional and rigid about the problem of Kashmir, which is on his own doorstep.

It took courage to condemn the Korean invasion when to most politically conscious Indians any United States or British intervention for whatever reason is ipso facto aggression. The Prime Minister cannot help sharing the ineradicable suspicion of all Indians of the motives of the white races in Asia. Now that he has to bear the white man's burden himself, so to speak, he might be more understanding.

Perhaps understanding is the principal missing component in our mutual relations. There should be a greater effort to understand on both sides. Americans, for their part, can safely start from the premise that in Jawaharlal Nehru they have a friend whose instincts, training, and position in the world all impel him to take the side of freedom and democracy against the Communists. So long as Pandit Nehru and his present associates rule India there is no fear of that great country going over to the Communist camp. Neither we nor the Indians should fear criticism or differences of opinion. The real dangers lie in misunderstanding and mistrust—two evils that are unnecessary and even inexcusable in present circumstances.

Suspension of Copper Import Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. DAVIES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, the Senate Finance Committee has voted 9 to 4 against further consideration of the continued suspension of the copper import tax. By this action, the gentlemen who oppose the extension of the tax suspension are striking a blow which does definite harm to our foreign relations with copper-producing friends. The damage also extends to our own consumers, who will be forced to pay higher prices for products using copper. And labor is feeling the pinch by being restricted to a shorter workweek because domestic mines cannot supply the demand.

I cite a paragraph of a letter I have received from Mr. R. P. Winberg, vice president of the Revere Copper & Brass Co., Rome, N. Y.:

Failure up to this point to continue the suspension has created an extremely serious situation. The growing shortage of copper has already forced us to curtail operations from a 6- to a 5-day working week in spite of very high demand from the trade. Favorable action on H. R. 5327 carrying the McMahon amendment would contribute materially to clarifying the whole copper picture.

I also submit the following news story from the New York Herald Tribune of August 15, 1950:

REFINED COPPER DELIVERIES OFF TO LOW IN JULY—INDUSTRY STOCKS DOWN FOR ELEVENTH MONTH IN A ROW

Deliveries of refined copper to consumers in the United States dipped sharply to a low for the year in July, production declined and industry stocks of the metal declined for the eleventh consecutive month to a 6-year low, according to the monthly report by the Copper Institute, issued yesterday.

In countries outside of the United States, not including Russia, production, deliveries, and stocks all showed increases during July, according to the report.

Deliveries of refined copper to domestic fabricators dropped to 95,983 tons in July from 126,047 in June. The July daily rate of deliveries was 3,096 tons compared with 4,202 daily in June, 3,703 daily over the first 7 months of 1950, and 2,826 a day for all of 1949.

Primary, or mine production of copper in July amounted to 70,640 tons or 2,472 daily against 78,926 or 2,623 daily in June, a 7-month average of 2,494 and a 1949 average of 2,116 tons. Secondary or scrap production of copper from domestic sources dropped to 8,675 tons in July from 17,792 the month before, making a 7-month total of 77,137 tons.

Refined copper production for July of 96,734 tons compared with 113,961 tons in June and brought the total for the first 7 months of 1950 to 729,081. Refined output for all of 1949 was 1,056,463 tons.

The difference in the June and July figures in the above story can be traced directly to the fact that the 2-cents-per-pound tax on imported copper was resumed on July 1, 1950.

Let those nine Senators who voted against further consideration of the copper-tax suspension bill know that they voted to hurt foreign relations, American consumers, and both workers and management in the copper business, not to mention the most important of all—our defense program.

The Union Shop

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

MASSACHUSETTS FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Boston, Mass., August 30, 1950.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LANE: Pending before you shortly will be a favorable report of the House Education and Labor Committee on House 7789 amending the Railway Labor Act to permit the so-called union shop.

As you well know, the union shop has long been recognized as an accepted practice in labor-management relations. It has acted as a stabilizing factor in creating responsibility on both sides of the collective-bargaining table. In the interests of producing a greater degree of industrial peace, the union shop should be legalized for the Nation's carriers. Under House 7789 it would be permissible and possible for the railroad brotherhoods and the carriers to negotiate for inclusion of a union-shop provision in their collective-bargaining agreement.

There are over 21,000 railroad employees in Massachusetts, many of whom belong to railroad brotherhood unions, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. On their behalf as well as the entire membership of the Massachusetts Federation of Labor, I urgently and sincerely hope that you will vote for the inclusion of the union-shop principle in the Railway Labor Act when this legislation comes before you. I sincerely hope that the discrimination against railroad workers in this respect will be corrected during this present session.

Respectfully yours,

KENNETH J. KELLEY,
Secretary-Treasurer-Legislative Agent.

Writing Off Statehood

OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from today's Washington Post:

WRITING OFF STATEHOOD

Majority Leader LUCAS' desire to complete Senate business by September 9 so that he can go back to Illinois and campaign for reelection is understandable. What is not so understandable is the way in which members of the Democratic policy committee have gone along in the shelving of the Hawaii and Alaska statehood bills. The Democratic platform of 1948 reads: "We urge immediate statehood for Hawaii and Alaska." This is one of the very few uses of "immediate" in that document. To write statehood off now, on the eve of attainment, is to abandon the pledge with a cynicism which the Republicans ought to be quick to note.

As a practical matter, unless the statehood bills are passed now, it means that the whole tedious business must be done over again in another Congress, for the approval of the two bills by the House will not carry over. That would involve more hearings and investigations, of which there has already been a plethora. In view of the repeated emphasis placed on the measures by President Truman, and in view of the fact that a bipartisan majority for both bills seems reasonably assured if they are brought to the floor, a special responsibility devolves upon Senator LUCAS. He is reported to have promised privately that he would do his best to bring them up after the tax bill. One can only conclude, in light of his evident lack of vigor, that his best is not very good. But surely there ought to be enough interest among other Senators who have pledged themselves to these measures of overdue justice and national defense importance to persuade Mr. LUCAS to change his mind.

On the broader question of whether Congress should formally adjourn or merely recess, we think the Senate position in favor of a recess is wise. To be sure, all Members of the House and one-third of the Members of the Senate are anxious to return to the hustings, and it is important that they have some time to do so. Perhaps the distinction between recess and adjournment is academic. But it seems to us that formal adjournment of Congress in this time of crisis would have a bad psychological effect both on voters here and on allies abroad—something the British Parliament has already found. The same thing could be accomplished by a recess which left it up to congressional leaders, rather than the President, to recall legislators to emergency duty.

Military and Economic Mobilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. DAVIES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include certain excerpts from an address I delivered to the second annual alumni banquet of the New York State Institute of Applied Arts and Sciences, at Utica, N. Y., August 12, 1950:

I believe that we should take the lead among the free peoples of the world in mobilizing—not only military mobilization but total mobilization in every respect. We should completely mobilize our Nation as quickly and as efficiently as possible, both militarily and economically. The economic phase is of special importance. For how can we ask the millions of men who fought World War II to leave the place which they are trying to hew out for themselves, take up arms for the second time in a decade and leave their families and loved ones behind to fight for a soldier's pay when it is common knowledge that many fortunes were made here at home during the last war?

"Not only should the wealth be mobilized, but the industrial facilities of our country, which comprise our biggest asset in war, should be drafted too. This should include not only Government controls on industries and wages and agriculture, but a high and strict excess profits tax which will take the profit motive out of wartime production.

"While we are on profit motives, let me say that I am in favor of the most stringent, tough, and airtight law against black marketeers of all kinds. Some of these despicable characters made fortunes during the last war; when we adopt rationing and price control there will be those who will try it again. Therefore, our new ration law should make absolutely certain that any violator, from the corner grocer to the broker in the commodity exchange, shall be slapped with not only a stiff fine, but a long and hard prison term.

We must have price control to protect the consumer and the rationing of certain goods to assure each one of us of our fair share. I see no reason why rationing should mean smaller supplies of most commodities. In the case of many goods, the ration would be no less than the average person buys now. But we must protect our people from the small, stupid minority who create artificial shortages and higher prices by the scare buying of a full years' supply of say, sugar, at one time.

The price scale should be rolled back to the level of June 15. The ration of any item which might be in short supply should be as large as possible, while still maintaining a stockpile for emergency and giving the Armed Forces all they need.

In addition to our own complete mobilization, we should take the lead in mobilizing the entire world outside the Soviet sphere of influence. Every country—Great Britain, France, Italy, the Scandinavian countries, Low Countries should be mobilized industrially, agriculturally, and last but not least, militarily. Without a moment's further hesitation Japan and West Germany should be turned into an armed camp to help us contain the Red menace. There is no reason why the rest of the world should not help to bear the burden of maintaining peace. And there is no reason why Germany and Japan should not supply manpower to ward off the threat of the Reds who themselves have built up a large armed force in East Germany.

It would be a great step forward for the mobilization of the free world if the United States could take the initiative in the arming and training of the troops of our other allies. This is especially true of some of the smaller nations such as Turkey and the Scandinavian nations. Our international friends have, in most cases, many men for use in the armed forces. Such nations are often handicapped by the production problem, however, and therefore their armies are small or poorly equipped, or both.

With our tremendous industrial and financial strength, there is no reason why we cannot serve as the main manufacturing headquarters for the arming of our allies. An important phase of this would be adoption of an international set of standards in measurements and engineering so that the problem of interchangeability of parts could be solved.

Along with this armament program, we should provide large numbers of officers and men who are well versed in all phases of modern warfare. These men, formed into instructor teams and spread liberally throughout the armies of our allies could carry on the teaching of the use of our weapons and, incidentally, serve as powerful force for better understanding between the American people and those of other nations.

All of these moves should be carried out through a strengthened UN to preserve the spirit of international cooperation. * * *

During this period there would be snags and pitfalls. They are inevitable in an international proposition of this kind. But we would have one great asset which we have lacked in recent years. We would be able to make commitments and have the power and the means with which to back them up. This has not been true in several cases in the past. It is especially not true in Korea, where we are committed to the task of driving the Reds out of South Korea, and yet we are obviously not rich enough in men and equipment at this time. There is also another advantage. During the build-up period our foreign policy should be realistic and hard-headed, not sentimental or benevolent. Those nations which would help us in our common struggle would get our full cooperation now and in the future. If any nation showed a marked lack of enthusiasm, she could forget about aid of any sort from the United States at any time, and she should be told so in no uncertain terms.

We must end the war of attrition and make ourselves and the rest of the world so strong that we can make the decision as to the time, place, and conditions of attack, if necessary.

Statehood Bills Could Pass Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed interesting to learn from a poll conducted by AMVETS that if the Alaska and Hawaii statehood bills were called up in the Senate they would be passed by substantial majorities. This is disclosed in a press release from AMVETS national headquarters which has just been issued and which follows:

The statehood bills for Hawaii and Alaska should pass the United States Senate by a substantial majority when they reach the floor of the upper chamber, an AMVETS poll of the Senate shows.

The poll was made during the month of August to determine sentiment for statehood for Hawaii and Alaska in the light of the Far Eastern crisis, which has focused public attention on the strategic importance of the two American territories.

Over 60 Senators replied to the query, according to Harold Russell, national commander of the Nation's largest World War II veterans' organization.

Thirty-four Senators wrote that they were in favor of statehood now for the two Territories. Twenty-four Senators indicated a sympathetic understanding of the legislation. Many are known to be supporters of one or the other of the two statehood bills.

Only six Senators reported they would oppose the statehood bills.

AMVETS is one of a number of national organizations which has endorsed statehood for Alaska and Hawaii and has worked actively for passage of legislation granting statehood.

"We feel," Commander Russell says, "that in the ideological warfare going on today, the granting of statehood to Hawaii and Alaska will be both in the national and international interest."

Senator HERBERT R. O'CONOR, of Maryland, said, along this line, "I have taken occasion to stress the claim for recognition of these Territories and of benefits from a militaristic standpoint to the United States. You have my assurance that I will continue to give support to their claims for statehood."

Senator EDWARD J. THYE, of Minnesota, wrote "I am in favor of statehood for Hawaii and Alaska, not only because I believe these Territories are ready for statehood, but also because I think the citizens in those areas are entitled to the same rights and privileges as are enjoyed by citizens of the present 48 States. In addition, the strategic importance of Hawaii and Alaska makes imperative their full development as sovereign States of the Union."

Support from New England is exemplified by Senator WILLIAM BENTON'S remarks, "Alaska and Hawaii have long been important members of the American family. I shall certainly support legislation to bring about their statehood should it reach the floor of the Senate during this session of Congress.

As a representative of the West, Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS says, "I wish to advise that I am wholeheartedly in favor of granting statehood to both Hawaii and Alaska at the earliest possible dates. I believe that troubled conditions in the Far East have greatly emphasized the need for taking this step immediately."

The AMVETS poll of 34 positive votes in favor of statehood for Alaska and Hawaii covers 26 different States and represents all geographical areas of the Nation.

Letters to GI's in Korea Are Appreciated—Keep It Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times, a few days ago, carried a news article concerning a most commendable service rendered by Mrs. Elsie B. Pearce, of Collingswood, N. J., to our boys at the front in Korea. It exhibited a deep understanding of the loneliness that comes to a GI in a far-off land. It was a happy thought that prompted her to write a letter addressed for a soldier at the front who has not received mail. The news article to which I refer reads as follows:

LETTERLESS GI'S FIND A FRIEND HERE—YOUNG HOUSEWIFE SENDS NOTE TO SOLDIER AT FRONT AND GETS EIGHT IN RETURN

COLLINGSWOOD, N. J., August 28.—Mrs. Elsie B. Pearce, a young Collingswood housewife, is thankful for the impulse that led her to mail a letter 2 weeks ago addressed "for a soldier at the front who has not received mail."

Mrs. Pearce said today that she had received eight letters so far from soldiers on the Korean battle front showing how avid the GI's were for a friendly message from home.

A corporal wrote, "It helps to know that someone cares about our loneliness over here."

Another noncom expressed the hope that more persons "would take the interest in some of these boys that you have, because some of them are so young that they hadn't been away from home before they joined the Army and now they seem lost without news from anybody."

A reply from a spokesman for the men of the Twenty-fourth Infantry Division said her letter had raised their morale 100 percent.

The young housewife had enclosed a photograph of herself in her letter and had written, "This letter is something like putting a note in a bottle and sending it out to sea."

The letter didn't vanish at sea. Her picture and written message found their journey's end on a bulletin board at Army headquarters in Korea. In the letter Mrs Pearce said she would deliver messages for the men and that she wanted them to consider her their friend.

The soldier answered, "I am glad there are people in the world like you."

Mrs Pearce holds to the belief that universal love is a power always available. She lives here at 402 King Avenue with her husband, a veteran of World War II, and her 7-year-old son.

I am hopeful that the publicity that has been given to this understanding and kindly act, performed by Mrs. Pearce, will incline others to do likewise. It is of a kind that deserves the recognition and emulation of all who think in terms of the welfare of our soldiers.

Registration Farce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER B. HUBER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of August 31, 1950:

REGISTRATION FARCE

The Subversive Activities Control and Communist Registration Act adopted by the House of Representatives on Tuesday ignores the real dangers of espionage and sabotage confronting this Nation and aims instead at something shadowy, to wit, subversion. Its stated purpose is "to protect the United States." Yet it affords none of the protections against espionage and sabotage recommended by the President; it makes no provision for the safeguarding of military installations and bases nor even for the supervision of deportable aliens. It is based on the assumption that Communist ideas and Communist propaganda are likely to turn the devotion of Americans from their own traditions, institutions, and values. Proceeding on this assumption, the bill provides for an elaborate arrangement—essentially the same as that previously established by the Mundt-Nixon bill—under which an administrative tribunal would designate organizations as "Communist action" groups and "Communist front" groups; these groups and all their members would be registered with the Government and subjected to a number of disabilities; and any publicity emanating from them would have to be labeled as coming from "a Communist organization."

These are limitations on the freedom of association and freedom of expression which Americans have traditionally enjoyed. If they genuinely served to protect internal security, they might well be warranted. But their contribution to security is precisely nil. As Attorney General J. Howard McGrath put it in a letter to Senator SCOTT W. LUCAS commenting on similar provisions of the McCarran bill, they will be "completely ineffective to accomplish their purpose." Indeed they are extremely likely to frustrate that purpose by driving the whole network of Communist groups underground.

One trouble with trying to compile a handy official roster of all Communist groups and their members is that a satisfactory definition of terms is impossible. The definitions presented in the bill passed by the House are so vague that they might easily be applied to many organizations guilty of nothing more than a loyal opposition to Government policies or to prevailing popular opinion. Moreover, the character of any group, as well as its membership, is liable to constant change. The attempt to require any group to register as Communist would involve interminable administrative hearings and litigation. Mr. McGrath was quite right in pointing out that "when, finally, an organization is required to register, it will in all probability dissolve itself, then reappear with a new name and new officers." The official list would be perpetually out of date—quite apart from the danger that it would inflict serious injuries on innocent groups and individuals.

Insofar as the bill can be credited with keeping registered Communists out of Government positions and defense production plants, it merely duplicates safeguards that are already in force. Communists and Communist sympathizers are currently excluded from Federal employment and from factories handling vital defense contracts by the loyalty program and the security risk system; they are also denied passports; and their organizations no longer enjoy tax exemption benefits. Registration is simply a more complex, clumsy, and inequitable way to achieve the same results.

The United States is not in danger from Communist ideas. Those who fear that the American people will be subverted by the party's propaganda in favor of a despotic alien system are men who have themselves lost faith in the good sense of the people and in the vitality of American institutions. Espionage and sabotage are real dangers, to be dealt with through realistic precautions. Subversion is a neurotic nightmare—as evidenced by the puny and steadily diminishing size of the Communist Party. Internal security can be best achieved by distinguishing between substance and shadows.

The Story of Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, the mess in Korea could have been avoided if there had been wise leadership in our foreign affairs. The story is one of bungling and errors which the American people are not soon likely to forget. The price for governmental errors always comes high, and today our American boys are dying in the mud of Korea because of our weak and vacillating foreign policy in the Far East and our constant appeasement of the Russians.

In the first instance, it must be remembered that the Congress itself has nothing to do with formulating the foreign policy of this country. That is entirely within the province of the President and the State Department.

The route to Korean bloodshed began back in 1933 when our Government recognized Soviet Russia. This was done over the vigorous protest of the American Legion and other veteran and patriotic groups. Then the policy of appeasement began. We gave the Soviets generously of lend-lease materials, getting very little in return. In fact, even today, Russia has a large number of our shipping vessels which up to now she has refused to return. We yielded to Stalin by making the second front in Normandy during the Second World War. Had the attack been made from the Mediterranean through the Balkans as urged by Winston Churchill, Russia would not today be solidly installed in half of Europe. When our victorious armies were marching toward Berlin under Eisenhower and Patton, word came from the White House directing that the Russians should be permitted to enter Berlin first. This was an error that cost millions for the the airlift later and no doubt is one of the main reasons why we are in such an uncomfortable position in Germany today.

The story of what later happened at Cairo, Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam is a tragic one. At these conferences, concessions were made to Stalin which set the Communists up in business in China, Korea, and elsewhere in the Orient. Present at Cairo were Churchill, Roosevelt, and Chiang Kai-shek. With Russia not yet in the war with Japan, Stalin was absent. Here Chiang Kai-shek was promised by Churchill and Roosevelt that if China would keep on fighting in the war against Japan, she would be given Manchuria, control of the Trans-Siberian Railway, and that other Japanese-captured provinces would be restored to the Chinese Republic.

Then came Yalta, where the convicted traitor, Alger Hiss, was one of the chief advisers. Chiang Kai-shek was not present, since China was not in the war against Germany. Churchill and Roosevelt there promised Stalin that if he would get into the war with Japan, Russia would be given, among other concessions, Manchuria, which had already been promised to China at Cairo. Russia was also to have South Sakhalin and the Kurile Islands—both dangerous daggers pointing at Japan. Thus, China was sold down the river and Russia got the vast stores of iron and steel, together with the industries of Manchuria, the very things she needed to wage a war against the United States.

Now things moved fast. After the conquest of Japan and after the Soviets had taken over Manchuria with its fabulous resources in her pocket, we withdrew our troops from China, gave up bases at Shanghai and Tsingtao, left millions of dollars of supplies for the Communists to take over, and brought the Marines back to the United States.

It must not be forgotten that the State Department, through its spokesmen Hiss, Acheson, Lattimore, and others, said that the Chinese situation was just a revolt of Chinese agrarians or farmers who were rising up against the corrupt and wicked Chiang Kai-shek. It was said that those revolting were a different and harmless sort of Communists. Then it was decreed that we should start pussyfooting with the Chinese Communists. President Truman sent General Marshall to China to force Chiang Kai-shek to take Communists into his government. Chiang refused, well knowing this would mean the end of his Nationalist government. Marshall returned to the United States with his mission unfulfilled, and was thereafter made Secretary of State. All military aid to China was stopped, and all of China fell to the Reds.

Shortly after the fall of Japan, it is a mystery just when, it was agreed that Russia should enter North Korea to accept the surrender of the Japanese north of the thirty-eighth parallel. Entering the war only a few days before the Japanese surrender, Russia had contributed practically nothing to the victory. The United States was to take the surrender of the Japanese south of the thirty-eighth parallel, and this arrangement was all confirmed by President Truman at Potsdam.

The Russians settled down in North Korea, built up a nation of stooges and an army, equipping it well. When the United Nations Commission sought to hold an election throughout Korea to determine its independence, the Russians refused to permit such an election in North Korea. Then came the sudden attack on South Korea on June 25, 1950.

The record will show that it was the Republicans in the Congress who stood for a strong Far Eastern policy, but Secretary Acheson told us we should keep hands off until the dust settled in Asia. He also stated categorically that the United States was not interested in the defense of Korea and that only Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines were in the perimeter of our defense set-up. We were told by Democratic spokesmen that South Korea could not be defended if attacked and that it had no military or strategic value. So we withdrew our troops, leaving over $125,000,000 worth of military supplies, such as light jeeps, trucks, light arms, ammunition, clothing, and food. From that time on, Korea was no longer under General MacArthur's Far East command. The State Department and the United Nations took over. If this did not pretty much constitute a hand-engraved invitation to the Communists to take over in South Korea, I would not know how to draw up such an invitation.

In December 1949 the State Department decreed that military aid to Formosa would be useless and that its loss was a foregone conclusion. On January 5, 1950, President Truman said that the United States would not pursue a course which would lead to involvement in China and that we would not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces in Formosa. On January 12, 1950, in a news release President Truman still maintained we would give no aid to Formosa. But on June 27, 1950, President Truman suddenly changed his mind and ordered the Seventh Fleet to defend Formosa while ordering air and naval operations in support of South Korea.

Throughout all this the American people have been given a lot of loose talk about our national defense. We were told that the South Korean forces were strong and that they could repel an invasion from the north. We were told repeatedly by Secretary of Defense Johnson that if they were attacked at 4 o'clock in the morning we would be ready to answer at 5 o'clock. President Truman himself only a few days before the invasion by the North Koreans said we were closer to peace than at any time since the last World War. Now the American people want to know what has been done with the billions of dollars approved for national defense by the Congress since World War II. They are demanding to know how and why we were caught so lamentably unprepared and so unequipped in Korea. After all, we have spent for national defense purposes, in the fiscal years 1946 to 1950, inclusive, the huge sum of $96,400,000,000. Where has the money gone and what have we to show for it? The Administration has sent our boys into Korea without adequate arms and ammunition. Our fleet was put in moth balls and the construction of the world's largest airplane carrier was stopped by Secretary Johnson, and the Marine Corps, the heart of our defense forces, was reduced almost to a minimum. Even President Truman resisted the action of the Congress in insisting on a 70-group Air Force. He said a 48-group Air Force was enough. Recommendations for defense expenditures were whittled while nondefense spending mounted to unprecedented figures. The Navy was weakened, the Air Forces throttled down, and the Army limited, while the illusion of adequate preparedness was fostered in the public mind. Who is responsible for that?

Republican Members of Congress are being criticized for refusing to give economic aid to Korea. It is said we are to blame for the debacle in Korea. Nothing could be more stupid or unfair because a school child would know that it would be supreme folly to vote economic aid for Korea without backing it up with military aid. Under the terms of the bill for economic aid, we would have sent fertilizer, seed, and money for the building of roads, dams, and the construction of hydroelectric plants, and so forth. It would only have been an operation "rat hole," well knowing that the Communists could take over South Korea at will. That was admitted by everyone. We simply would have built up a greater and a richer prize for the Communists to take over. What has actually happened in Korea today confirms our fears at that time. None of the economic aid finally voted in February 1950, ever got there. Although $10,000,000 in military aid was voted for Korea, actually only $200 worth of this aid ever got there. That was some signal wire. It has always been my position that economic aid would be a waste of the taxpayers' money unless we also gave adequate military aid to back up and protect our investments. When the Truman administration wrote off Korea as a liability and said it would not be defended, the sending of economic aid was absolutely indefensible.

The State Department has been running the show. Perhaps the situation is best summed up by the statement of Owen Lattimore, State Department Adviser for the Far East, who said, "The thing to do is let her [Korea] fall but not let it look as though we pushed her." So with South Korea washed out by the State Department and no longer considered of military value and with our Army withdrawn, the Communists for all practical purposes, were invited to move in. Under such circumstances, no sane person can contend that there was any wisdom or logic in spending any more of the American taxpayers' money there unless we could be assured our investments would be protected by our military might.

After all the bungling, errors, miscalculations, and the misrepresentations made to the Congress and the American people, the Administration has completely reversed its foreign policy in the Far East; we have decided to go into Korea, the one spot with its rough terrain, with its foul weather, the most difficult place on earth, to pit our American boys against the ground armies of the Communists who are being aided and abetted by the Russians.

Where do we go from here? No one knows. The mistakes that have been made cannot be reversed. They can only be paid for in the high currency of blood and treasure. We cannot escape the cost but we can demand a plan and a program and a goal with men at the helm who are capable of carrying it out. Unfortunately, those who got us into the Korean mess are still at the helm, and it goes without saying that both the Congress and the people as a whole have lost confidence in them. It will be recalled that Acheson said he would not turn his back on Alger Hiss, and President Truman recently said that Acheson would remain in the Cabinet as long as he was President. So the American people will have to take it and like it.

We have learned the hard way that appeasement does not pay and the American people have been called upon to fight a war they did not want or expect. We are fighting under adverse conditions—a fight that could have been avoided by enlightened diplomacy joined with a national defense based on world realities. Whether this war is the prelude to world war III or not, no one knows. The answer is not here. God alone can and will give us the strength and wisdom to carry on so that some day we may again return to the ways of peace.

Appointment of Small-Business Men to Advisory Committee of National Security Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a telegram addressed to W. Stuart Symington, Chairman of the National Security Board, by George J. Burger, vice president of the National Federation of Independent Business, objecting to the fact that no small-business men were appointed to the advisory committee of the Board.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS,
Washington, D. C., August 9, 1950.

W. STUART SYMINGTON,
Chairman, National Security Board,
Washington, D. C.:

Associated Press reports today: "Symington chooses advisory committee." The story continued: "The 12-member committee chosen after conferences with groups representing industry, labor, agriculture, the public generally will advise Mr. Symington on all phases of civil mobilization and defense." Noted industry appointments: Chairman, committee for economic development; president, United States Chamber of Commerce; president, National Association of Manufacturers—all representatives of big business organizations. Why wasn't spokesman for independent small business considered on the committee? Surely with 3,500,000 independent businesses in our Nation are they to be ignored in any policy-forming group in any governmetal agency? Doesn't Federal law, Seventy-ninth or Eightieth Congress make it mandatory that independent small business be given equal representation? In your appointments on labor and agriculture you gave equal representation to large and small segments. Again we ask, why was independent small business ignored? This association, all independent businessmen is officially on record with you offering our services voluntarily. We expect definite answer to this communication.

GEORGE J. BURGER,
Vice President.

Impounded Military Funds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a table which shows the funds impounded or withheld from the Army, Navy, and Air Force during the past five fiscal years by the President or his agents. It represents a recapitulation of figures furnished to the Appropriations Committee by the three branches during the recent hearings on the supplemental appropriations bill at the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL]:

Appropriated funds impounded or withheld from the Armed Forces by the President, the Bureau of the Budget, or the Secretary of Defense, 1946–50

[5] Impounded by Secretary of Defense and includes $735,754,000 reserved by direction of President and representing funds appropriated by Congress in contemplation of an increase in size of Air Force.

From hearings before House Appropriations Subcommittee on the supplemental appropriations bill for 1951, pp. 47, 120, 235.

GI Insurance

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am today joining with my colleagues, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], in introducing a bill seeking to bring about certain changes in the National Service Life Insurance Act.

Under my bill insurance coverage up to $10,000 would be extended to our servicemen on a gratuitous basis and service-connected disabled veterans would be allowed to purchase Government insurance on discharge from the service.

I believe the present system has worked under great difficulties and I have been reliably informed that it will not be really workable under large-scale mobilization or universal military training if it becomes law. It might be interesting for the House to know that the Hook Commission recommended in the Forrestal Report that National Life Insurance on a gratuitous basis would save tax money if one took into consideration the administrative costs under the present premium payment set-up.

This bill would, therefore, not only be to the benefit of the taxpayer, but also to the serviceman and his family.

I urge the Veterans' Committee to hold hearings and report this measure out this session so that the men and women now entering—or reentering—the military service can be taken care of.

Korea and the Marines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. WILSON OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to bring to the attention of the House of Representatives a very able editorial written by Casey Cohlmia (USMCR) and as published in the Enid Daily Eagle, of Enid, Okla., on August 16, 1950, appears as follows:

KOREA AND THE MARINES

It is extremely unfortunate that the United States had again to engage in actual warfare before the importance, mobility and thorough training of the Marine Corps was recognized and considered vitally essential to the welfare of the national defense.

Echoes of the Second World War had barely died before the Army was fighting to absorb the functions of the marines in ground fighting; the Air Force wanted to take over its aviation; and the Navy balked at protecting its own junior unit for fear such action would bring further wrath upon the emasculated naval service.

There have been strong efforts to reduce or abolish the marines after every major conflict and sometimes between wars. As pointed out by the current issue of U. S. News magazine: "How close the corps came to near extinction in the last attack few people realize. * * * A principal handicap was a censorship imposed by President Truman. Marine officers could not make statements on the subject without submitting them for approval. * * * A budgeting battle followed. The other services, supported by Defense Secretary Louis Johnson, were intent on leaving the marines a very minimum of the defense money. The marines were steadily reduced. But Korea changed it all."

One five-letter word changed the marines from a near-defunct unit to a major factor in the United States fighting forces—Korea. That's how simple it is for Washington to shove into oblivion the intense work, rigid training, untiring efforts of the men and officers who have not only suffered the pangs of conflict on the field of battle but in the political circles of a Pentagon-pressured Congress.

Because of this great and continuous struggle for survival, the marines have been—and will always be—one of the world's most efficient fighting forces. Despite the fact that for most of the 179 years of existence, they have fed upon the crumbs from the tables of the Army and Navy, the United States Marines have learned well the art of warfare and making the most out of their bare, meager equipment. This they have demonstrated ably on countless occasions.

Must then, the very survival of a unit, a strategic force be determined by internal conflict? When will our politician-militarists end the vicious bickering which has endangered the safety of the Nation on two occasions already—Pearl Harbor and Korea? And lastly, how many more Guadalcanals, Tarawas, and Iwo Jimas must the marines fight before they become of legal age as a member of our unified Armed Forces?

Why Not Ask Mr. Hoover?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Grocers' Journal, official publication of the Southern California Retail Grocers' Association. No comment is necessary, but I commend this editorial to Members of Congress who are about to vote new powers to President Truman. The editorial follows:

WHY NOT ASK MR. HOOVER, MR. PRESIDENT?

At this writing, if confusing news reports of an even more confusing controversy can be correctly interpreted, Congress is on the verge of granting President Truman the dictatorial standby powers he has so stubbornly sought. He will have power to impose wage-price ceilings and rationing at his own discretion.

The President is now assured that he can radically alter the entire economic life of the United States when he alone decides that it is either necessary or politically expedient.

The President need not justify the timing of his action.

Meanwhile, the food industry, along with the rest of America, can continue to flounder in confusion until the President either uses his absolute powers or announces some definite course of action concerning their use.

So, it is possible that price controls will be imposed, at some time.

But how broad will be the scope of the controls? The President has already rejected the urgings of Bernard Baruch for over-all controls. It must be presumed that any price controls imposed will be selective in nature.

President Truman has publicly announced that there will be no return of the bungling OPA; that present Government bureaus are capable of administering all controls needed. He did not clarify his statement.

Since the record shows that the President is a very definite man once he has made a decision, it can safely be presumed that he has not as yet formulated any definite plans for imposing price ceilings or for enforcing them.

If a cat can look at a king, as 'tis said, surely a member of the food industry can give advice to a President.

Here is the advice:

Confer with Herbert Hoover, and closely follow his suggestions.

Herbert Hoover has proved himself, long ago, to be the ablest administrator of food controls ever known to the United States. Few can qualify as his equal on the complicated subject of domestic and world economy.

Let's look back 32 years, back to the last months of World War I. For the first time, America was called upon to share its food supply with a stricken world. For the first time, organized steps were taken to curb domestic consumption and prevent war profiteering in foods.

President Wilson wisely selected Herbert Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce, to serve as National Food Administrator.

How Hoover stepped into the new harness to thoughtfully determine the world's food needs; how he scorned rationing as a useless tool for curbing overbuying and hoarding; how he effectively fed the world by businesslike distribution—these accomplishments are brighter pages in the history of the First World War.

Details of how Hoover administered and enforced price controls will be of interest to everyone in the food industry. Retailers, remembering the utter confusion and arbitrary and unfair police actions of the late OPA, will find Hoover's methods of doing the job almost as unbelievable as they were sensible and effective.

Hoover did not organize a giant, unwieldly government bureau. He did not provide employment that was draftproof to men and women whose only experience in the retailing of groceries was the daily stocking of the family larder from store shelves. He did not set up a forum of confused but police-minded men and give them a whip hand over retail grocers.

Using the common horse sense that was the basis of his genius, Hoover rode roughshod over political-minded advisers to get at the heart of the price-control problem and find a solution.

Selecting leaders in the food industry in each State, city, and town, he appointed them as local administrators of his food conservation and antiprofiteering program. Then he let them alone.

There were meatless days and wheatless days. There was Karo syrup instead of sugar. And the people had faith in the trusted local leaders who urged food conservation under the name of "Hooverizing." And overbuying and hoarding became minimum problems.

(Maladministration of OPA robbed the people of faith, instilled them with cynicism and fear—and hoarding and furtive buying was ever a major and unsolved problem.)

And as for controlling prices at the retail level:

Under Hoover, a grocer was allowed to play on the team. He was regarded in the true light of a citizen-businessman who would honestly and sincerely do his share in keeping prices at the necessary level. He was not, as was too often the case under OPA prejudged as a virtual criminal per se.

Under Hoover no grocer was "called on the carpet" because he had unwittingly and through confusion created by Government master minds, sold a can of beans for a penny or two over the controlled price.

Hoover, knowing the effectiveness of simplicity, placed price ceilings only upon essential foods—flour, butter, eggs, beans, sugar, lard, etc.

(Under OPA a Los Angeles grocer and OPA officials conferred for days over the question of whether caviar was fish or meat—this in order to determine the ceiling price of the nonessential stuff.)

"Hooverizing" retailers were ordered to maintain an exposed blackboard upon which their cost price and the selling price of each controlled item must be listed.

Since retailers were allowed only a prescribed mark-up on controlled items, this simple and inexpensive blackboard method of control kept all in line—the public being its own best watchdog.

This blackboard method was highly unpopular in certain grocery circles—among those retailers who enjoyed preferred status with wholesalers because of volume buying, and among those who could demand fat rebates to gain advantage over competition.

Hoover's blackboards put all grocers on the same profit-opportunity level—and only those with profiteering hearts yelled about it.

This controlled mark-up and blackboard combination of price control made it unnecessary for grocers to read through reams of official directives written in confusing gobbledook. Grocers were not spending time and effort in continually changing price marks and tags. He priced his controlled items at the allowed mark-up level over wholesale price—and that was that.

Herbert Hoover's method of determining and enforcing retail price ceilings was, in gist, simple, direct, fair, and effective. It gained the confidence and cooperation of both public and businessmen. It was inexpensive to the taxpayers.

Can President Truman discover a better, less costly, more effective method of administering and enforcing price ceilings—or other necessary wartime controls?

Perhaps, he can.

If he cannot, then we suggest, respectfully: Why not ask Mr. Hoover, Mr. President?

Social Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOR C. TOLLEFSON

OF WASHINGTON

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 6000, the social security measure which recently was acted upon by both Houses of Congress, became law with the signature of the President. Although the measure is far from perfect it is a great improvement over the previous law in that it expanded the coverage and increased the benefits. It also liberalized the eligibility requirements. We have been informed that the Ways and Means Committee of the House will during the next year give further study to the whole social security problem with a view to presenting to Congress at some future date an even better, more workable and equitable measure, built on a sound financial basis.

The newly enacted measure adds almost 10,000,000 persons to the 35,000,000 presently covered by Social Security. The following is a breakdown of the new workers covered:

Category:
Nonfarm self-employed	4,700,000
Agricultural workers	850,000
Borderline employment	(200,000)
Regularly employed on farms	(650,000)
Domestic workers	1,000,000
Employees of nonprofit organizations (voluntary coverage)	600,000
Employees of State and local governments (voluntary coverage)	[1] 1,450,000

Category—Continued
Federal civilian employees not under a retirement system	200,000
Employees outside the United States	150,000
Employment in Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands	400,000
New definition of "employee"	350,000
Total under compulsory coverage	2,050,000
Total under voluntary coverage	7,650,000
Grand total	9,700,000

NOTE.—Figures in parentheses are subtotal figures.

COVERAGE

First. Farm workers are covered under the new law if the worker is employed continuously for 3 months by one employer and works 60 full days and earns at least $50 in wages in the calendar quarters immediately following 3 months of prior continuous employment for the same employer.

Second. Employees of State and local governments—except those who are already covered by an existing retirement system—would be eligible by voluntary decision on their part and through a Federal-State compact agreement.

Third. Employees of nonprofit organizations are covered on an elective basis. In order to obtain coverage the nonprofit organization must certify that it desires to have the old-age and survivors' insurance program extended to the services performed by its employees, and at least two-thirds of the employees must concur in the filing of the certificate. Those employees who do not concur in the filing of the certificate will not be covered, but all employees engaged after the effective date of the certificate will be covered on a compulsory basis. Once an employer has elected coverage concurred in by two-thirds of the employees the employer cannot withdraw the certificate for a minimum period of 10 years. The purpose of the 10-year requirement is to prevent an employer from jeopardizing the opportunity of a worker to achieve a fully insured status.

Fourth. Domestic workers: Coverage is extended to domestic workers in private homes—but not on a farm operated for profit—if the worker is employed 24 days or more in a calendar quarter by one employer and is paid cash wages of at least $50 for services rendered in that quarter.

Fifth. Self-employed, certain Federal employees, public-transportation workers, and other miscellaneous groups are also included in the measure. The largest group affected are the approximately 4,600,000 self-employed persons, including nearly everyone who works for himself except farm owners and tenants and certain professional persons.

DEFINITION OF EMPLOYEE

By redefining the term employee, the amendments extend coverage to approximately 400,000 persons as employees. Newly defined as employees are (1) full-time life-insurance salesmen; (2) full-time traveling or city salesmen—other than house-to-house salesmen—taking orders for their principal for goods for resale or consumption from retailers, hotels, wholesalers, and contractors; (3) agent drivers and commissioned drivers engaged in distributing meat, vegetables, fruit, and bakery products, beverages—other than milk—or laundry or dry-cleaning services; and home workers who earn at least $50 in a calendar quarter if they or their employers are subject to licensing requirements under State law and work in accordance with specifications prescribed by the employer.

BENEFITS INCREASED

The new measure increases the primary benefits paid on an average of 77½ percent. The greatest increases will be paid to those in the lower brackets, while those in higher brackets will receive smaller increases. Examples of increases are to be found in the following table:

Present primary benefit:	New amount
$20	37.00
Present primary benefit—Con.	New amount

INCREASED EARNINGS PERMITTED

A most important provision in the legislation is that which permits a beneficiary to earn in covered employment, without loss of benefits, as much as $50 per month, instead of the $14.99 which has heretofore been the limit. Many beneficiaries have in the past complained bitterly about this limitation. The amount of their benefits, plus the $14.99 earned on the side, was not sufficient in many cases to sustain them. The increased earnings permitted will afford a considerable amount of relief.

CREDIT GIVEN EX-GI'S

The social-security measure provides for giving World War II veterans wage credits under the insurance system of $160 per month for the time spent in service. This provision was included at the urging of veterans and veterans' organizations who felt that the men who were taken away from their private employment to fight in the armed services should be given some credit for the time they were away. If the provision had not been included in the legislation, these veterans would have lost several years of wage credits.

ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS LIBERALIZED

Both Houses accepted the conference report under which further eligibility requirements are greatly liberalized by requiring quarters of coverage for only half of the number of quarters since 1950 instead of since 1936 as under existing law. Quarters of coverage earned before 1950 may be counted toward the requirement. Thus, a person age 62 or over on the effective date of the bill would under the bill be fully insured for benefits at age 65 if he had at least six quarters of coverage acquired at that time. The maximum requirement for fully insured status would remain at 40 quarters of coverage, and the minimum at 6 quarters, as in existing law. Also, as in existing law a quarter of coverage would be a calendar quarter, during which the insured earned $50 or more in wages.

MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH, CRIPPLED CHILDREN AND CHILD WELFARE

The measure provides for an increase of $19,500,000 per year for maternal and child health, and child-welfare services. These additional amounts should help crippled children, particularly, and would also help the States meet the problems of run-away and delinquent children.

AID TO THE PERMANENTLY AND TOTALLY DISABLED

The addition of a new category is a major extension under the system of grants-in-aid to States for public assistance. Under it, assistance, financed partly by Federal funds, will become available to an additional group of handicapped persons 18 years of age or older.

Like other assistance programs of the Social Security Act, this program will be State initiated and State administered. Federal funds will be available to each State upon approval of its plan. As in the programs of old-age assistance and aid to the blind, the maximum individual payment in which the Federal Government will participate is $50, and the formula governing the Federal share is the same. The Federal Government will also provide one-half of the administrative expenses.

INFORMATION AVAILABLE

Many of the persons sought to be covered by the new social-security bill will have questions to ask concerning details of the legislation. Information can be had by inquiring at the nearest social-security office, either in person or through correspondence.

New Orleans—Foreign Trade Zone

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 8, 1950

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the text of an article by Serge Fliegers and Alvaro Perez of the Intercontinental Press which appears in the September 1950 issue of Americas, official magazine of the Pan American Union follows:

A Latin-American businessman visiting New Orleans can scarcely avoid doing business there. For the city realized the importance of a direct economic tie with Latin America and did something about it. It put on a planned and systematic trade drive. Today this initiative has paid off. During the past 3 years, New Orleans enjoyed the biggest trade boom in its history. With its shipping volume past the billion and a quarter mark this year, it is now the Nation's second port. Every third cup of coffee drunk in the United States is brought in through New Orleans, which also handles items ranging from wines, nuts, and toys to textiles and Haitian wood masks.

In 1943, during a sightseeing cruise of the lower Mississippi Delta, the newly appointed manager of the port of New Orleans, E. O. Jewell, overheard a conversation that set him to thinking.

"Qué tal, amigo, this great river is magnificent. In my country, Costa Rica, we do not have such river."

"But, my friend, we don't have them in my country either—Peoria, Ill."

"There are other things we don't have in our country that I'm looking for right now. Electrical equipment, for example. I need a thousand dynamos."

"What a lucky coincidence. I think I can fill that order for you."

The port manager took the story back to a group of New Orleans businessmen, including shipping and life-insurance company officials and a newspaper publisher. "Our port," Jewell pointed out, "is naturally suited to trade with Latin America. It would be nice to stimulate it by using a ship as a trysting place for importers and exporters—but a little impractical, I'm afraid."

Instead, his listeners suggested a spot on terra firma, right off New Orleans' famous Canal Street. William Zetzman, president of a local bottling plant, sent a letter to his more important commercial colleagues: "We want to start something new," he wrote, "something that has never been tried before." He invited them to a meeting, but added, "Don't bother to come unless you have a lot of money to invest in the future of your city."

Zetzman himself put up some thirty thousand dollars and more than 50 of his colleagues brought the minimum contribution—$1,000. They bought an old bank building and refurbished it in record time, decorating it with the flags of the 21 Western Hemisphere nations. Office space, a library, a lobby, and meeting halls were provided. They christened the new trade center "International House."

At first businessmen were apathetic. During the peak 1945 war year, the Port of New Orleans did some three quarters of a billion dollars' worth of trade. After the emergency stimulus had worn off, they felt, New Orleans would again become a sleepy southern town, handling mostly cotton and coffee. Not many of the thousands of manufacturers, distributors, consumers, and farmers in the mid-continent area—the 13 Mississippi Valley States served by New Orleans—had ever done business with Latin America before. "Why should we seek trade abroad?" they asked. "We have no contacts, we don't know the language or the procedure."

International House officials went to work. They sent representatives to Latin America, invited Latin American businessmen to stop over on their way north. Once in New Orleans, they were furnished with a bilingual secretary, a desk, a telephone, and a long list of mid-continent firms they could approach directly. Soon the businessmen of the United States and Latin America saw—like the two who had met on the sightseeing boat—that one manufactured what the other needed.

One firm in Demopolis, Ala., is in the export business solely because of the contacts New Orleans provided. The firm manufactured all types of agricultural equipment and had a surplus stock because of the weakening domestic market. It hesitated to try selling abroad because its officers knew nothing of the export business—what forms to fill out, to whom to write, how to pack and ship, and what technicalities to prepare for.

International House provided a detailed manual and a list of 30 prospective buyers from its files. In just two weeks orders arrived from Venezuela for 3 wagons, 3 trailers, and 50 trucks. Today the Demopolis firm has a flourishing foreign-trade department that is still expanding. During its first two years International House arranged about 30,000 such contacts between buyers and sellers.

But how about the Latin American visitors? More and more of them, stepping out of planes, disembarking from ships, spent a few days in New Orleans. They dropped in at International House, met their United States colleagues, and concluded their business deals. Meanwhile, officials of International House had absorbed some of the Latin spirit of hospitality and began to multiply its services.

One morning staff members found at the door a dejected-looking woman with a 6-month-old child in her arms and seven heavy suitcases. A Panamanian, speaking no English, she was looking for her husband, a United States sailor. She wanted a room, food for the baby, and help in finding her husband, and La Casa Internacional seemed the place to get them. The baby was fed, and a room found for her. Within a matter of days, her husband was located, and there was a touching family reunion.

Another time, a honeymooning couple from Venezuela came to see the historic places of New Orleans, its Cabildo built by Spanish colonists, the French Quarter, and the old cemetery. They stopped off at International House for dinner and a chat in Spanish with one of the Latin advisers. "We would love to see the rest of the United States," the husband remarked, "but we haven't enough money. If I only could sell a consignment of hides I have in my country, we could afford the trip." The same afternoon a United States purchaser was found and papers were signed. A month later a grateful postcard arrived from Niagara Falls.

No request is too large or too small for International House. So far, it has helped export a $4 consignment of toy balloons, and facilitated the purchase, by Argentina, of $3,000,000 worth of ships.

After confidence had been established among the businessmen of the midcontinent area, a new difficulty presented itself. Although products were available, Latin American businessmen could ill afford to travel through 13 Southern and Midwestern States showing their samples or inspecting prospective purchases. Instead, many proceeded farther north to the large manufacturing centers, where great numbers of factories and sales offices were grouped together.

New Orleans' international planners soon found an answer. At a cost of nearly a million and a half dollars, they constructed a trade mart. Again the flags of the 21 Republics were raised; and today, across the street from International House, a huge, modern, windowless building, gleaming white and completely air-conditioned, houses more than 600 different exhibit items. It takes just a couple of hours to sample the products of half the world, without moving farther than half a city block.

Recently a Peruvian purchasing mission arrived in New Orleans. "Just passing through," they said, "as we have a long trip ahead to locate manufacturers of the various items we need." Instead, they were taken on an afternoon's tour of International House and the trade mart. During the next week, without moving from New Orleans, they purchased all they could with their $500,000 budget and saved considerable traveling expense and fatigue into the bargain. The same thing happened to a group of buyers from Colombia, who were able to supply the needs of their country's merchant marine after a few business sessions at the International Trade Mart.

Neither International House nor Trade Mart facilities are restricted to nations of the Western Hemisphere. A visitor wandering through the long aluminum- and glass-lined corridors of the mart can see United States agricultural machinery, Bohemian glassware, and Costa Rican lumber products exhibited side by side. Except for direct rentals, there is no charge for the unending variety of services offered by the two institutions. They are supported mainly by membership dues levied on New Orleans businessmen and operate on a nonprofit basis.

But for the city itself there is a distinct profit. Director Charles Nutter (who has a long record of successful dealings with Latin America, first as a newspaperman and later as an executive) and New Orleans' Mayor De Lesseps Morrison say that 70 cents of every dollar in the pocketbooks of New Orleans residents comes directly or indirectly from the trade of their port. They expect that trade to pass the billion and a half dollar figure next year, making New Orleans one of the world's largest ports.

There is another development that will help New Orleans become one of the globe's foremost trading centers. Under a law recently enacted, the Foreign Trade Zone Act, sponsored by Congressman EMANUEL CELLER, of New York, both United States and foreign businessmen will be permitted to exhibit and manufacture goods in all the United States free-trade zones.

The New Orleans trade zone today comprises some 20 acres of excellent storage and warehouse space where foreign goods can be deposited without payment of United States tariffs. The idea of a free-trade zone was first tried by the Hanseatic League in the sixteenth century, but the first American free port was set up in New York as late as 1937; New Orleans created its zone in 1947. A reaction against high tariffs, it permitted the shipper to store his goods, dry them to reduce weight, remove parts that had spoiled or broken during the sea voyage, and sometimes repack or resort them to make use of a lower tariff classification.

For example, 30 cents' duty per gallon is charged on fresh pineapple juice imported by the United States from Cuba. But if, in the free trade zone, some coloring and preservative chemicals are added, the duty is only 8 cents per gallon, which means considerable saving for the United States importer and consumer. Brazil nuts, taxed according to their weight, can remain in the zone until most of their water content has evaporated, reducing their final weight and, consequently, the import duty.

Wines and other liquids can be brought into the New Orleans free trade zone in barrels, there to be repacked into bottles. This avoids possible loss from breakage en route. And Latin American countries that have no facilities for manufacturing the kind of bottles required by United States buyers can now avoid the tedious and costly process of importing the necessary glassware from the States, only to have it shipped back on the next boat.

J. H. Boyd, the zone manager, showed us around the enormous lay-out of the New Orleans free port. It was a far cry from the wooden reshipping platforms constructed 300 years ago by the Hanseatic traders. We saw lumber from Costa Rica, machine parts from Belgium, emeralds from Colombia, and blue, shimmering aquamarines from Brazil. "This is another free port facility," Mr. Boyd explained. "In the case of jewels, for example, a United States importer no longer has to lay out the 10 percent duty on a stone before it is sold. He can keep it here and show it to prospective purchasers. If he makes a sale, he pays the tariff; otherwise he is free to return it abroad."

As far as the United States public is concerned, the free port operation does not mean loss of duty income. According to the zone manager, it offers these advantages: It encourages imports and thus provides dollars for foreign purchasers of United States goods; stimulates the United States transportation business; gives employment to United States personnel in the handling, packaging, and grading of goods; provides a market for the United States manufacturers of packaging materials; and enables the small importer to operate without tying up his capital in tariff payments.

Typical of such small importers was the United States sailor who had used up all his savings to bring precious stones from Latin America. When he returned to the States, he had $7 left, not enough, naturally, to pay for the import duty, and was advised to store his wares in the free trade zone. One by one he sold the jewels and paid the tax. He is now back in Latin America on another buying expedition.

Last year the New Orleans free trade zone received some 50 different types of goods from 28 countries with a total estimated value of $27,101,114. With manufacturing within its area, it will be busier than ever.

The Case Against the Welfare State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, each year the National University Extension Association issues an annual debate handbook on the national high school debate question, which this year is:

Resolved, That the American people should reject the welfare state.

I have been asked to prepare a typical affirmative case on that question, and I ask permission to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD at this time my article entitled "The Case Against the Welfare State," which appears in the Twenty-fourth Annual Debate Handbook issued by the National University Extension Association, at page 63.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CASE AGAINST THE WELFARE STATE

(By KARL E. MUNDT, United States Senator from South Dakota)

(Prepared for Welfare State: The Twenty-fourth Annual Debate Handbook.)

Because of the many methods by which the so-called welfare state can manifest itself, any short definition of the welfare state is certain to be inadequate. A definition which fits one set of circumstances in a given area or era is sure to be found deficient in some other area or era. Unlike a police state or an absolute monarchy, the welfare state has no established historic principles or outlines which speakers and writers can employ to determine precisely when and where it exists.

On the other hand, some general definition must be agreed upon before one can debate or defend or denounce the welfare state intelligently. Intelligent discussion requires that certain characteristics be accepted as essential factors in a formula of government operating as the welfare state.

Many supporters of the welfare state endeavor to claim for it only its promised pleasantries and accept for it none of the realistic attributes of government essential to its operation. Many opponents of the welfare state, on the other hand, endeavor to identify with the welfare state a wide assortment of evils without giving consideration to the dividends it promises to produce. Neither position is defensible for debaters who desire to get at the hard core of truth in the arguments both pro and con, or to find "an area of agreement" in a definition which will permit them to debate their points of disagreement on the principles and policies involved.

In my opinion the following statement is an objective, unbiased definition of the welfare state, as that term is most generally used and recognized in the United States: The welfare state is a type of government utilizing a planned economy, implemented by strong centralized controls and Federal financial aids and grants, in an effort to provide livelihood, education, security, and full assurance against the hardships resulting from unemployment, ill health, disability, or old age for all its citizens regardless of age, color, capabilities, geographic location, or financial status.

Many will disagree with phases of this definition, as many are certain to disagree with any definition of the welfare state. Some will say the foregoing definition credits the welfare state with too much and fails to point out the loss of human freedoms involved in such a formula of government. Others will hold with equal vehemence that the above definition imposes too many responsibilities upon the state and assumes a larger task than is required. By and large, however, the preceding definition is as fair and factual as a single-sentence definition can be.

The key word in any definition of the welfare state is the term "provide." In setting up our American system of representative government our forefathers wisely used the word in the preamble to our Constitution, "In order to promote the general welfare." Nobody will argue that at the moment our Government is operating this country as a welfare state. Precisely in the degree that Government in this country shifts its emphasis and its efforts from the job of promoting to the task of providing the general welfare, the United States of America shifts from a state operating on the principles of private enterprise and individual initiative to that of one operating on the principles of the welfare state. If we keep this paramount point in mind, we should be able to proceed intelligently and the precise words used in any definition of the term should shrink into comparative unimportance.

OPPORTUNITY STATE VERSUS WELFARE STATE

In the remainder of this article I shall present some of the reasons why the American people should reject the welfare state.

I express my opposition to the welfare state with the concept in mind that the great heritage Americans have always enjoyed is the realization that more than any other country on the globe, the United States has always been recognized as the world's greatest opportunity state. I have often described the success formula of America as expressing our belief that the province of government is to provide a fair chance for a free people.

We do not propose to provide the creature needs for all the people. We propose instead to provide a fair, honest, and just chance for all people who have the desire, the ability, and the perseverance to get ahead.

If the Communists in Russia, the Nazis in Germany, the Fascists in Italy, or the Socialists in Britain actually performed in accordance with their pronouncements and their promises, any one of these countries under its particular brand of centralized controls could well be considered an ideal laboratory exhibit of the welfare state. Unfortunately for their people—and unfortunately for our purposes of comparison and contrast—none of these systems of government really provide for their people anything remotely resembling their pious and persuasive pronouncements.

To find an actual example of a system in which the promises made are really kept, one has to look to such an institution as a penitentiary, a county poor farm, or a charitable institution for the disabled or the aged. There we see a situation in which the needs of the people—the creature needs upon which welfare staters place so much stress—are provided.

Food, shelter, clothing, medical attention, educational material, security: all are available in such institutions. Opportunity, of course, is highly limited; but that real opportunity is also sharply limited or entirely absent in any country operating under the formula of the welfare state Thus the issue becomes largely one of security versus opportunity for the individual.

Perhaps the basic reason why our country has become the world's most enlightened and most envied area is that the equilibrium between opportunity and security we have been able to maintain is unique among all the countries of the world. The opportunity state which is America today does not claim to provide security to the individual in the degree that he could find it in a charitable institution or in a penitentiary.

Our great opportunity state makes no pretext of providing the degree of security given the subject of the King under the concept of socialism being slowly but surely advanced in Great Britain, whereby the State itself assumes for each subject the burden and responsibility of providing for his employment, his health, his old age and security against hardships of every type. The British welfare state as it is unfolding is slowly assuming the responsibility for freeing its subjects from hardships of every type; but it is moving much more rapidly to deny its people the opportunities and freedoms which built the mighty British Empire and kept it mistress of the seas for many centuries. In the United States, since the inception of our Government, we have consistently refused to purchase these extra elements of security by curtailing opportunities.

On the other hand, while the United States makes no pretense of providing complete security for everyone against all the exigencies of modern living, neither does it pretend to offer the individual citizens in our midst the maximum in freedom and unregulated opportunity. Human beings seeking the type of opportunity which prevails under the law of the jungle or in semicivilized regions can find greater degrees of unrestricted opportunities in other areas than in the United States. In many backward lands around the world, in semicivilized areas and on isolated islands, man can find the type of uncontrolled and unregulated opportunity that exists where only the rule of the fang and the claw prevails. This is not the type of opportunity that has made the United States the most envied and enviable opportunity state in the history of the world. Here in America our laws, codes of ethics, and accepted rules of behavior require the average citizen to exercise his individual liberty in the way best designed to permit equal freedom and opportunity to his fellow citizens. Our Federal Government exists to provide the prods and punishments essential to stimulate good behavior in industrial, business, professional, farming, and labor groups with the very minimum of governmental interference with political freedoms, private incentives, and individual opportunities.

In our opportunity state the Federal Government rightfully limits its function to establishing regulations which curtail excesses on the part of individuals or groups, to refereeing disputes and controversies among the many elements of our society, and to rectifying injustices brought about by extremes of human selfishness or gross indifference to the public welfare. But our Government does not and must not needlessly interfere with the processes and institutions of economic life. In the long run opportunity pays better dividends for everyone than the creature-need supplying type of security which denies citizens the challenges of individual initiative.

The equilibrium between opportunity and security which our Constitution has enabled us to maintain is both unprecedented and unparalleled in all human history. Such a balance cannot be sustained in a welfare state where individual opportunities are limited to provide a low level of security for everyone; it cannot be maintained in an unorganized society where individual opportunities jeopardize the freedoms and the security of everyone.

Too much emphasis on security sharply reduces and finally destroys individual opportunity just as too much emphasis on individual opportunity sharply reduces and can ultimately destroy security for everyone. Fortunately, both from history and from observation of current experiments in the age-old conflict between opportunity and security we can find abundant proof not only of the failure of the welfare state to promote the general welfare but also of its tendency to destroy existing opportunity, security, and welfare.

HOW DICTATORSHIPS DEVELOP

A careful study of the governments which place greatest stress on the centralized controls essential to the welfare state reveals that the system reduces the dignity, the importance, the freedoms, the opportunities, the security, and the welfare of the individual citizen. Two principles destructive of the opportunity and security of the individual citizen are common to communism in Russia, nazism as it was practiced in Germany, fascism as it was practiced in Italy, national socialism as it is practiced today in Great Britain, and the planned economy or the welfare state as it is proposed for America. The devices by which the welfare state proposes to provide the general welfare need frank analysis. The techniques and tactics necessary to put such a program into motion and sustain it in action should be of interest.

STEP ONE

The first universal tactic observable in the practice of communism, nazism, fascism, or national socialism is the necessity on the part of the state for taking from the individual citizen increasingly greater amounts of his income and his earnings. Sometimes this is done by excessive taxation; sometimes by outright confiscation, sometimes by the condemning of property and compensation with government bonds, sometimes through government competition. Whatever practice is used, the welfare state or any other system of government based on strong centralized controls must somehow get the money from the individual citizens if any of the promised dividends are to flow from the welfare state.

The pleasant and persuasive theory usually advanced by the promoters of the welfare state is that money is taken from the citizens because the government can spend the people's money in their own behalf more effectively and productively than the people who earned it could spend it in their own interests. In no country are the people told that their money helps keep the politicians in office and increases the importance and the luxury of official life. The people are told that their taxes are being increased, their withholding charges expanded, or their property confiscated because the politicians have better judgment about providing for the needs of the people than the earners themselves have.

Even a cursory examination of the techniques employed in all the big governments in history, disclose that the tactic of taking the money from the people is an inevitable part of the pattern of the welfare state.

STEP TWO

The second tactic inevitably found by the careful student of the welfare state is the increasing curtailment of the people's powers of decision and individual judgment. Increasingly, the people are oppressed by regulations, executive decrees, and prohibitive legislation limiting sharply the individual freedom of the citizen by expanding the power of the central government to control profits, working hours, wages, items produced, and standards of competition.

Such insidious and determined invasion of the individual rights of man is always done under the guise of providing for the public welfare. The people are told that only the politicians are wise or honest or unselfish enough to make decisions in the public interest. They are told that selfish interests or rugged individualists or monopolistic trusts among the general public will destroy the general welfare of the country unless the Government is given the right to make mandatory decisions.

At different stages of history, different methods are used in the application of the universal principles. Sometimes the people are deprived of their money by confiscation; sometimes by Government-planned inflation; sometimes by the steady increase of exhausting taxes. Sometimes the people's rights of decision are curtailed by restrictions on the freedom of expression, freedom of the press, freedom of movement, and freedom of religion, as in Russia today; sometimes curtailment comes from denying individuals the opportunity of private practice if they are members of the medical profession; or dictating the kind and amount of produce if they are farmers; or confiscating productive enterprises to be owned and operated only by the Government. In essence, the tactics are the same wherever big government sets out to provide the general welfare. Never, in any era of history, under any system of big government, are the people told "This is being done to perpetuate in power the politicians now in charge." Instead, under each system in each era the people hear the siren song that their property is being taken and their rights of decision reduced in order to assure for them the security they are not wise or unselfish or farseeing enough to assure for themselves.

Great Britain today presents a clear picture of the decline from the opportunity state to the welfare state. In Britain, the planners of the welfare state have advanced their experiment to the point where the government now owns, operates, or controls eight economic enterprises formerly conducted by private initiative. These eight are the Bank of England; the electric industry; the coal mines; the gas industry; the medical and health services; the transportation industry (including the railways, passenger busses, cargo trucks, and inland waterways); civil aviation; and the overseas communication system (including cables and wireless telegraphy).

Parliament has authorized the shift from private enterprise to public domination of a ninth great enterprise—the steel industry—but the recent election in Great Britain which indicated a great wave of public opposition to the welfare state is temporarily holding this transfer in abeyance.

THE LESSON WE SHOULD LEARN FROM BRITAIN

The British experiment is typical of the manner in which the cancer expands. First, the state increases taxes and reduces areas of individual decision in an effort to provide more power and a bigger purse for the politicians in charge of the experiment. The people are told the steps are necessary to provide the promised dividends for the general welfare. Additional drains upon the economic system grow so great that the national treasury runs increasingly into debt. To increase the intake of funds for the promised welfare dividends, the government then must take over and operate productive enterprises to bolster up a weakened national treasury. Other private enterprises, unable to meet such unfair competition, show losses which in turn lessen their taxpaying power and decrease the Government revenue. Eventually the failing private enterprises must be taken over and owned, operated, or controlled by the Government. The inefficiencies and extravagances of bureaucratic control often make impossible the producing of the revenues anticipated and required by the national treasury; thus the vicious circle continues. Ultimately, as in Russia, all enterprises are owned, operated, or controlled by the government.

The important point is that in the development of the welfare state the element of government control is the determining factor, not the element of government ownership or operation. Sometimes the totalitarians insist upon outright ownership and operation of enterprises; sometimes they prefer to continue the myth of private ownership but exercise government controls so complete that all revenues accrue to the government and all basic decisions are made by the politicians.

The inevitable characteristic of the welfare state is the element of control. History fails to record a single example of a welfare state existing even for a short era of experimentation without the element of compulsion. Inherent in the welfare state is the necessity for a planned economy which places in the hands of the politicians the necessary police powers to compel compliance. Without coercions, the welfare state cannot exist. Students desiring to acquaint themselves more fully with the function of control in systems of strong centralized government should read The Road We Are Traveling, by Stuart Chase. The author lists 14 attributes of this type of government and states, "There would not be so much taking over all industries in the old Socialist sense; the government would set up controls without ownership." Mr. Chase is an experienced authority and a careful scholar in the field of economic planning and welfare state proposals; consequently his stress on the point that the essential element in welfare states is control rather than ownership or operation is significant.

Undoubtedly, all who read this article will have read the analysis of the welfare state by John T. Flynn. His best-selling book, The Road Ahead, is must reading for any scholar endeavoring to understand the many factors involved in the welfare state proposal. In The Road Ahead, John T. Flynn points out the steps required in setting up a welfare state for the United States.[1]

Perhaps an even better authority than such scholars as Stuart Chase and John T. Flynn, however, would be a member of the present British Cabinet; for in Britain, under the guise of Fabian Socialism, economic and political planners are now producing a modern welfare state. In his highly informative and illuminating book, How Socialism Works, the Honorable John Strachey, present War Minister of the British Cabinet, points out the inevitable similarity of methods between socialism, communism, the welfare state and other types of political-economic systems operated under the compulsions and controls of a dominant central government. Mr. Strachey is an unusually well informed student of the ideologies of control; formerly a Communist, he wrote several works on the goals and methods of communism before he renounced that aggressive concept for the Socialist welfare state, which he is now assisting to construct.

How Socialism Works was written at the time when Mr. Strachey was a member of the Communist Party and an interpreter of its basic concepts. On page 156 of his treatise, How Socialism Works, John Strachey said:

"We also saw that it is impossible to establish communism as an immediate successor to capitalism. It is, accordingly, proposed to establish socialism as something which we can put in the place of our present decaying capitalism. Hence Communists work for the establishment of socialism as a necessary transition stage on the road to communism."

Inasmuch as the welfare state is simply a variant of the political concept known as socialism, one could well interchange the words "welfare state" and "socialism" in the foregoing quotation from Mr. Strachey's writings without in any way altering the accuracy or veracity of his analysis.

On page 157 of How Socialism Works, John Strachey makes this point additionally clear by the following direct statement:

"It is the function of the socialist system of planned production for use, and distribution according to work done, to establish the prerequisites of this higher form of society, which is communism."

Thus the point is made with additional force that scholars and interpreters of the political phenomena known as socialism, communism, and the welfare state clearly understand that a system of planned production for use is the hard core of similarity which binds them together. The political controls which compel citizens to conform with the system of planned production inevitably mean totalitarianism at the end of the road.

Unfortunately, many students of the subject have forgotten that until 1917 Lenin referred to himself as a Socialist or a Socialist-Democrat. In April of that year he adopted for his adherents the name "The Communist Party." In the so-called April Theses which Lenin published in 1917, he said: "Socialism is bound sooner or later to ripen into communism, whose banner bears the motto 'from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs.'"

One of the best American authorities on the subject of the welfare state is Donald R. Richberg, professor of government at the University of Virginia, during the 1930's Administrator of the NRA. In my opinion, Donald Richberg is an honest liberal; and being an honest liberal is one of the most difficult assignments in America.

Donald Richberg makes the authoritative statement: "In a welfare state the function of all private associations which are engaged in, or affect, production or distribution must be to act as instruments or agents of the government in meeting its assumed responsibility." The concept of compulsion and the devices of government control are again shown to be essential in the establishment or operation of the welfare state.

Sir Stafford Cripps, Chancellor of the Exchequer in Great Britain, said in 1946, "No country in the world, as far as I know, has yet succeeded in carrying through a planned economy without the direction of labor." Great Britain is no exception to that rule. In 1949, the British socialist government announced directives compelling men to remain in mining and agriculture. A planned economy or a welfare state without the elements of compulsion and coercion would be a recipe without ingredients.

THE PLANNED ECONOMY—A POLITICIAN'S PARADISE

From my own observations I might add one anecdote to supplement this point. Not long ago, I was engaged with a prominent member of the administration circle in Washington on the question whether America should adopt the planned economy of the welfare state. My distinguished opponent argued, "Certainly, Mr. MUNDT, you agree that economic planning is essential for an individual family or a business institution. Surely you must believe in economic planning for yourself, for your family, for the possibility of a rainy day, for old age and for the unpredictables which lie ahead. If economic planning is important for one individual family, it must certainly be many times more important for the 40,000,000 families in America. Without economic planning by a central state, how can we be sure that as many automobiles will be produced as are needed and that some companies will not produce automobiles which they are unable to sell? Without economic planning, how can we be sure that there will be teachers for all schools and schoolrooms for every teacher? Without a planned economy and careful central planning, how can we be sure that all of the fabricators who use steel will have steel enough for manufacturing roller skates, razor blades, carpenters' tools, bicycles, as well as farm machinery and railroad equipment? How can we be sure that a few big soulless corporations will not greedily monopolize the entire output of steel and freeze out the little-business man and the small producer entirely?"

My rejoinder was based primarily on the following simple questions: Will you agree with me that the planned economy and economic planning by the state are useless and futile so long as the program remains in the platform of a political party or on a bureaucrat's desk and is not actually put into operation? My opponent necessarily answered in the affirmative. Then I asked, Would you agree with me that putting into operation the program of a planned economy would be futile and would fail to bring about the dividends of which you speak if, after the plan is proclaimed, each individual citizen is still permitted to follow his own inclinations and either accept or reject the plan in accordance with his own desires? Again necessarily, the reply of my opponent was affirmative.

Obviously, my next question was, "Will you then agree with me that the planned economy of the welfare state which you propose must certainly fail to fulfill its promises or carry out its program unless you give to politicians of the Capitol City who make the plans, the police power to compel compliance? Will you agree that the government must have the police power to jail or penalize people who refuse to comply, that without this police power the planners must be ineffective and probably can only compound the chaos rather than produce the efficient program of activity which you desire?"

This time, reluctantly, but again necessarily, my adversary answered in the affirmative.

The imperative necessity of providing government compulsions inevitably destroys the individual initiative, the private enterprise, the political independence which are part of our heritage as citizens of the world's greatest opportunity state.

Realistic students and observers analyzing the forms of government available to man in the world today, must keep in mind that in any form of economic or political activity the human equation cannot be eliminated.

Human beings are neither better nor worse, their ideals are neither nobler nor more sordid, because they are engaged in a political rather than an economic activity. Many inequities and injustices exist in our American opportunity state. Human greed, selfishness, disregard for others, and the desire for self-aggrandizement frequently operate against the weak and reward some beyond their merits. Here and there monopolies arise, interlocking directorates reduce the benefits of competition, and the strong sometimes profit from the errors and incapacities of the weak. These consequences flow from the fact that men in economic enterprises are human, heir to all the temptations and weaknesses of humanity. Unfortunately, individuals in politics are no less human and no more virtuous, on the average, than individuals engaged in private enterprise.

BEWARE OF A POLITICAL MONOPOLY

Simply transferring an economic enterprise from the hands of the individual to the control of the all-important state fails to remove it from the frailties and vices which are part of human nature. In fact, placing politicians in control of a nation's economy tends to expand the areas in which human frailties can demonstrate themselves; for all semblance of competition is thus removed, and one great political monopoly evolves.

Even economic monopolies, under our present American system, are subject to legislative regulations, to competition from stubborn independent entrepreneurs, to the pressures of public opinion, and to the fact that if they grow powerful and objectionable enough the state will eventually restore their functions to the hands of competitive enterprises. But against a political monopoly, all these factors are futile. In the final analysis a political monopoly can be broken up only by a revolution of the people; individual enterprises are powerless, public opinion is ineffective, and the political monopolies use their economic power to subjugate the citizen to the state.

Thus the frailties and weaknesses, the ambition and selfishness of human nature find greater opportunity in the welfare state than in any system of private enterprise, political independence, and personal opportunity. The individual citizen in our American opportunity state is protected alike from the excesses of politicians and from industrial giants who may seek our destruction.

Unless America emphatically rejects the welfare state we must lose here the personal opportunities and political privileges which unhappily have already departed from many other areas of the world.

Utopia is an unattainable objective. We must measure our advantages and disadvantages today against the evils or the dividends we would obtain by surrendering our rights as free men to the all-powerful state. Differences in degree at a given era of history may exist between communism, nazism, fascism, national socialism, and the welfare state, but no basic differences or distinctions exist in the direction in which men travel when they relinquish control of their individual destinies to political planners. By no legislative or political legerdemain can citizens hand to their rulers the control over all their affairs and still assure to themselves the right to correct and curb the new evils thus set in motion.

As the record of history is slowly written the prophetic wisdom of our constitutional forefathers becomes increasingly clear. In founding this Republic to promote rather than provide the general welfare, they precluded the concept of the welfare state and put in motion a system of government which has evolved into an unprecedented opportunity state. If we are to keep our privileges, we must avoid heedless tampering with the basic formula of freedom that has made our Nation great and kept it strong: namely, that the opportunities flowing from private enterprise, political independence, and individual choice "to provide a fair chance for a free people" must not be destroyed through the transfer of authority from the hands of the common people to those of the politicians in Washington, D. C. If this were to happen in America, we would gain neither security nor opportunity; we would lose the very elements comprising the general welfare which our people now enjoy. Moreover, having lost the individual powers of self-determination, we would have sacrificed the rights of our people to act according to their own desires. We would be shameful traitors to our great American heritage.

Subversives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD O. LOVRE

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. LOVRE. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Congress I have been vitally interested in maintaining a free and prosperous America. To maintain a free America I believe it is absolutely necessary to see that subversives are not allowed in the Federal Government. Those there should be removed at once. Furthermore, I believe that we must approach our international dealings with foresight and understanding and in a realistic and positive manner.

For that reason, I have consistently supported appropriations for a strong army, navy and air force, and funds for the FBI so that it could ferret out disloyalty among government workers. I have watched carefully our diplomatic dealings and have been dismayed at the lack of understanding and some of the actions taken by the administration leadership

If you agree with President Truman's decision to send troops to Korea you simply cannot agree with Secretary of State Acheson's "hands off" far eastern foreign policy prior to June 27. When I returned from a visit to Korea and the Orient last fall I warned of the danger of Communist aggression in the Far East. I was not alone in recommending a positive firm foreign policy in that area of the world. Men of foresight of both political parties joined in offering that counsel.

Mr. Speaker, this good advice, much of it made right on this floor, was ignored by administration leaders. As a result, today American men are fighting and dying in the rice paddies of Korea.

In their frantic efforts to absolve the administration of blame in the Korean crisis, some Fair Deal political aspirants are resorting to a smear campaign against those who objected to economic aid to Korea without military aid to back it up. There were a good many Members of this body who felt that way. They were divided among Republicans and Democrats. In fact, I believe the number was 192 in all.

Mr. Speaker, it is time for an accounting by the Truman-Acheson-Johnson administration.

Mr. Speaker, what happened to the 70 group air force which the Congress twice voted?

Mr. Speaker, what happened to the more than $90,000,000,000 which was given to the Defense Department for military preparedness since 1945?

Mr. Speaker, why was the Marine Corps cut to the bone? The Marines have always been our first line of amphibious attack in time of emergency.

Mr. Speaker, why was our Navy curtailed. High ranking Naval officers were muzzled and condemned when they criticized administration policy of scrapping the Navy.

Mr. Speaker, why did our State Department follow the line laid down by Owen Lattimore as regards Korea and the Far East? Remember he recommended that Korea be allowed to fall and that we withdraw from China. Our official State Department policy followed this advice until we virtually lost control of the Orient.

Mr. Speaker, as a result of such a policy we find ourselves now fighting in Korea and our prestige and interests in the Far East threatened.

Mr. Speaker, as a result of the policy of the Department of Defense, American men were sent into Korea poorly equipped and poorly trained to meet the Red invaders.

Mr. Speaker, why were Marshall-aid countries who received billions of dollars of American tax money permitted to send strategic war materials to Soviet Russia and her satellites?

Mr. Speaker, why have administration officials in this country bought several million dollars worth of dried eggs from Communist China when American farm wives have had a hard time getting along on the prices they received despite the Government-support program? Such action has helped the Reds and hurt loyal American housewives.

Mr. Speaker, no one has explained yet to American fighting men, their mothers, and sweethearts just why they are today battling in Korea.

Mr. Speaker, Fair Deal administration spokesmen should explain the terrific influence upon our affairs exercised by fellow travelers and Communist sympathizers. I, along with thousands of loyal Americans, was astounded when our Secretary of State refused to turn his back on Alger Hiss after he had been convicted in an American court by an American jury.

Mr. Speaker, the only solution to the problems which face us today is a change of leadership. This change must be made before it is too late.

Mr. Speaker, unless we have a different type of thinking in high places the survival of America as a free nation of free people is threatened.

Cleveland Plain Dealer Article on the Speech of Congressman Wayne L. Hays, of Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WATKINS M. ABBITT
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from the Cleveland Plain Dealer, of April 1, 1950, which appeared on the editorial page of that outstanding Ohio newspaper, and which was written by the veteran Washington correspondent, Walker S. Buel. This article was also reprinted in the Martins Ferry (Ohio) Times-Leader, one of the leading newspapers in Congressman HAYS' district.

The great speech of my good friend and colleague, the Honorable WAYNE L. HAYS, is recorded for posterity in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I think it is fitting that this tribute from the outstanding Ohio newspaper also be recorded in the Appendix of the RECORD.

This is one of the many instances of fine contributions that our good friend, Congressman HAYS, has made since he has been a Member of this body.

HAYS TELLS OFF MARCANTONIO—ATTACK ON COMMUNISM SUPPORTED BY BOTH SIDES OF HOUSE

(By Walker S. Buel)

WASHINGTON, March 31.—Representative VITO MARCANTONIO, of New York, American Labor Party firebrand who is serving his seventh congressional term and is no slouch as a rabble-rouser, met his match on the floor of the House this week in the person of an Ohio Democratic first-termer.

Aroused by a MARCANTONIO defense of a land-reform plan in Italy, sponsored by a Communist-dominated confederation, Representative WAYNE L. HAYS, of Flushing, uncorked an extemporaneous reply which drew tribute from both sides of the party aisle. Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK, Massachusetts, Democratic floor leader, as the debate on assistance to Europe continued, took occasion next day to tell the House:

"The gentleman from Ohio made a great speech yesterday. It was the speech of a man not only of courage but of a man with the mind of a statesman who recognizes the basic issue that is involved."

ANSWERED BACK

Ordinarily, House Democrats do not answer MARCANTONIO, who votes often with them on domestic issues. His party line on foreign policy is well known and often expressed and he is permitted to talk without much challenge. But HAYS, who has been twice in Italy in 2 years, went after him hammer-and-tongs when MARCANTONIO delivered a long denunciation of the Marshall plan as a failure which "has meant exploitation and despair for Italy," and denounced the United States-supported De Gasperi government of Italy.

HAYS, an Ohio Presbyterian, and MCCORMACK, a Boston Catholic, joined in giving an unusual note of religious import to the House debate. HAYS said that the issue in Italy is not land reform, important as that is.

"The issue is whether or not we have a government in Italy which recognized God or whether we have a government which does not recognize God and prohibits the population from recognizing God," he continued.

MCCORMACK told the House:

"This is not a sermon, we are here because of our belief in God. This assembly could not exist in the Soviet Union. These people could not be seated in the gallery and you and I could not meet our constituents, as we do, in our office or at home if it were not that we are citizens in and believers in the spiritual government that democracy stands for."

HOPE FOR PEACE

The Ohioan, member of a select expenditures committee which visited Europe, told of a moment of prayer with the Pope at Rome as he concluded an audience with committee members.

"I have never been a zealously religious person," HAYS said. "I have taken it in stride, like most of us do. I was never tremendously impressed by religion and what it has meant to mankind until I started thinking about that experience. Then I realized that there must be some hope in the world for an orderly solution of our problems: we had just come from the Holy Land and Damascus, where the Prince of Peace, that advocate of tolerance and charity walked, talked, taught, and died. I thought: Yes; we have made some progress in the world in the last few hundred years.

"This thing, you must understand, could not have happened 150 years or so ago, because Catholics and Protestants were spilling each other's blood in religious wars. This little understanding is not a very long stride in point of time, but we have been making it, we are learning, and I believe that is the only solution. You cannot force it on from the top by a gang, like the ungodly Communists who only want to put themselves in power at the expense of the freedom and liberty, the food, the shelter, and the clothing of the masses. That is what we saw all over Communist Europe, in Poland, in Czechoslovakia, and in Yugoslavia, behind the iron curtain.

"You hear about these voluntary labor battalions in these Communist countries. They all work voluntarily. The only thing that happens to them if they do not do it, is that their ration card is taken away and they cannot buy any food; their shelter card is taken away from them and they do not have any place in which to live; their clothing card is taken away from them and they do not have anything to wear.

"That, of course, is merely progress according to the definition of the gentleman from New York."

HAYS is a former teacher of history and public speaking. He gave MARCANTONIO quite a lesson.

A Prayer for America

OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, in practically every synagogue in the country a prayer is offered up as part of the Sabbath services for the preservation of our country and for its well-being.

My attention has just been directed to a prayer offered by Rabbi Jacob Goldberg in Temple Israel at Lake Peekskill, N. Y. This would be a better country if all of us took time to offer similar prayers.

The prayer is as follows:

A PRAYER FOR AMERICA

Almighty God, bless with health, courage, vision, and high purpose, the President of the United States of America and all the leaders of our country, that they may govern wisely and justly. Grant to the Government of America the will and the power to solve its problems in the democratic manner and to give to each of its inhabitants the opportunity to lead a happy and a useful life. We pray that Thou shalt show the leaders of our country as well as the leaders of all nations, the way to peace, and that Thou wilst not allow another world war, with all its horror and killing, with all its waste and destruction, to engulf Thy humanity. Amen.

Republican Fantasy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 17, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Post of August 15, 1950:

[From the New York Post of August 15, 1950]

It seems that history can be rewritten at home as well as abroad.

Did you know that the leaders of the Republican Party opposed the wartime alliance with Stalin even while they were hailing the defense of Stalingrad? Did you know that they said often and boldly that they would prefer to let thousands of Americans die fighting the Nazis single-handed rather than risk any postwar dealings with Stalin? Did you know that they loudly condemned FDR's efforts to bring Russia into the war against Japan? Were you paying attention when the GOP chieftains valiantly opposed demobilization of American forces after VJ-day? Were you listening when they demanded that all our troops be kept in uniform at overseas stations to block aggressive Soviet moves which they shrewdly foresaw? Have you forgotten that they told the country, bluntly and fearlessly, that demobilization—and all the ways of peace—would have to be indefinitely postponed because Russia would push us around the moment our armies disbanded? Do you remember how the Republican high command denounced the administration for bringing the GI's home too swiftly?

You don't remember all that? Come to think of it, neither do we. During the 1944 campaign, we even thought we heard Thomas E. Dewey accuse the Roosevelt administration of planning "to keep men in the Army when the war is over because it fears there will be no jobs for them in civil life." And Dewey wasn't alone—or so it seemed to us. On November 10, 1945, we thought we saw a Times headline which read: "TAFT asks Ohio division return first from Pacific." In those months the air seemed full of other Republicans—and Democrats—making similar noises.

Now we are told that none of this really could have happened. It says here in a manifesto issued yesterday by Republican members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that any fool would have known better in 1945; that all our present woes are due to "the failure and refusal of American leadership in 1945 to recognize the true aims and methods of the rulers of Soviet Russia." It says here in the same declaration that "to this failure can be traced the disintegration of our Armed Forces in 1945 which would not have occurred if the need for retaining adequate forces had been explained to the American people." The Republican statesmen knew it all the time. They knew it was senseless and suicidal to bring the GI's home while Russians still roamed the world. They know all that and more; they just forgot to tell the country what they knew, and now they have even forgotten that they forgot.

Elimination of Unemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL ELLIOTT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, Dunn's Review for August has a very interesting article styled "How a New England Town Eliminated Large Scale Unemployment" which depicts how Nashua, New Hampshire has within the past two years met, grappled with and substantially conquered the economic disease of unemployment.

Since the district which I have the honor to represent is plagued with the same problem, four of its nine counties having been classified by the United States Department of Commerce as having the most critical unemployment of the entire Southeast, I am including this article as a part of my remarks with the hope that it may prove an inspiration to those who are diligently working to solve the problem of unemployment.

The elements of Nashua's attack on its unemployment appear to be these:

First. Cooperation of business men, employees, unions, townspeople, chamber of commerce and city government to attract, and persuade new industries of the advantages which Nashua had to offer.

Second. An industrial consultant was hired to supervise a survey and propose a plan of action, which, when agreed upon, the cooperating groups gave the necessary momentum to see that it was carried through.

Third. Enlistment of local capital with which to furnish employment in those areas where it could best suit the over-all plan.

Fourth. The groups interested in Nashua's future concentrated on a program of pointing out the outstanding advantages which Nashua had to offer and pursued this objective by direct mail, newspaper advertising, radio and personal contact. Among other things they emphasized that their city was a good place in which to work and live.

Fifth. Each firm, large or small, that expresses an interest in Nashua is given immediate, thorough, and courteous attention.

The article points out that work in these directions is hard, and oftentimes discouraging. Persistence, however, on the part of the people of Nashua is now paying great dividends as it sees its unemployment shrink with each passing month.

This work at Nashua has brought its people closer together and has given them an awareness of their own ability that causes them to dream that their city will be even greater than it was before unemployment came their way.

The article follows:

HOW A NEW ENGLAND TOWN ELIMINATED LARGE SCALE UNEMPLOYMENT

(By Thomas Holton Hoare)

Nearly 2 years have passed since Nashua, the "Gate City" of New Hampshire on the banks of the Merrimack River, containing a population of 35,000 people, found itself in the middle of an industrial controversy that made the headlines of newspapers, magazines, and business papers all over the country.

Textron, Inc., Nashua's largest single employer, had announced the closing of its Nashua mills and the liquidation of its properties there. As a result, many prophesied the end of the great textile industry in New England.

Headlines all over the country tolled the death knell of Nashua. In a few months, they said, it was destined to become a ghost town, casting a shadow that could engulf the entire State and might even affect all of industrial New England. Many read these stories, listened to dire predictions, and, shaking their heads, agreed that this was the end of Nashua and nothing less than a miracle could save the town. This belief was not shared by the people of Nashua and other courageous people in New Hampshire.

When the Nashua Telegraph came off the press late that afternoon of September 13, 1948, its headlines spoke for the New England community that refused to be beaten. They read: "Read for challenge, city swings into action as mills announce plant closing. New industry campaign on: Textron to shut down here." They had sounded the note and the leaders of Nashua, together with its people, began a campaign of concerted action that has resulted today in Nashua being recognized as one of the brightest spots in the New Hampshire employment picture and a place where industries, considering new locations, have shown great interest.

The story of how all this was done in such a short span of time contains no magic words or formulas. It is the story of plain down to earth Yankee ingenuity, clear thinking, and unselfish service on the part of everyone concerned.

Nashua recognized the basic fact that although Textron's decision to move out of the city would put one-third of its industrial workers out of work, the city still had 50 or more diversified industries that were in excellent condition and would continue to provide work. Logically, the next step was to see what could be done for the 3,600 who would lose their jobs on December 31, 1949, the date Textron had set as its deadline.

The night the news of the Textron decision was announced, the chamber of commerce met and immediately formed a committee to study the problem. It asked the mayor to name a committee of three aldermen and three chamber of commerce members. The mayor's committee, spearheaded by then Alderman Hugh Gregg, set to work collecting facts from both Textron officials and the union. A meeting was arranged at which Textron modified the December 31 date and agreed to maintain the Jackson Sheeting Mills "as long as possible." Textron later extended that indefinite period to a full year, thus insuring continued employment for about 1,800 of the 3,600 Textron workers. This was only a temporary solution of the problem, and the people of Nashua wanted action toward a full solution that would stop at nothing less than full and continued employment for all workers.

INDUSTRIAL CONSULTANT HIRED

The next step consisted of the formation of a new citizens' committee of the leading business men of Nashua and called the Nashua Industrial Committee. It raised over a thousand dollars by private subscription to engage the services of an experienced industrial consultant. At the suggestion of the New England Council and the New Hampshire Development Commission, Laurence C. Plowman of Portland, Maine, was brought in to devise a plan of action.

After a preliminary survey, a plan was proposed whereby the Textron holdings might be bought locally and an attempt made to sell or lease the properties as separate units to new industry with the accent on diversification.

Armed with this plan, and determined to see it through, the committee visited officials of the Textron organization and offered to buy all of the company's Nashua properties. After 10 days of discussions and negotiations, during which time hearings by a subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee were being held concerning Textron operations, it was agreed that the committee would buy the properties from Textron for the sum of $500,000, of which $100,000 was paid in cash and $400 000 was taken as a mortgage by Textron. In addition, Textron agreed to lease back the Jackson Mills from the group for a period of 10 years and to continue their sheeting operations.

Before the sale agreement and lease agreement were signed, the committee members organized the Nashua-New Hampshire Foundation and engaged Mr. Plowman as manager. Its seven trustees agreed that the purpose of the foundation would be "to promote the public welfare in the city of Nashua, N. H., and especially to work toward a solution of its unemployment problem by a continuous effort to attract and establish a new industrial development for that community."

Under New Hampshire law, the new organization could have been set up as a voluntary nonprofit corporation and, on the basis of its purpose being to promote the public welfare could have requested and undoubtedly been granted permission to become tax free. The foundation ignored this possibility in view of the tax loss that such an agreement would have meant to the city and further provided for any eventual profit from the venture by naming the New Hampshire Society for Crippled Children as the final beneficiary at "such time as all obligations as may hereinafter be incurred in connection with the trust's acquisition of any property from Textron, Inc., shall have been satisfied and establishing new industrial development for Nashua has been accomplished." By this move, it identified itself with a well recognized and approved State-wide project, hence the name "Nashua-New Hampshire Foundation."

Even before the ink was dry on either the trust agreement or the purchase and lease agreements, the men who comprised the nucleus of the new foundation saw the formation of a new enterprise known as the Nashua Textile Co. organized around a group of Textron workers skilled in the manufacture of such specialized textile products as automobile convertible tops, and shoe and glove linings, products much in demand in today's market. With local funds subscribed by Nashua citizens, a new company was formed with Robert Hamlett, a local lawyer, as president, and James Milliken, a former Textron employee, as general manager.

The Nashua Textile Co. then leased 175,000 square feet of space from the foundation and bought the necessary machinery from Textron on a long-term sales agreement. Since its beginning in late 1948 the company has grown from 175 employees to more than 300. Its products are well made and in demand and the company has become an integral part of the Nashua industrial community.

THE MEN WHO MADE IT POSSIBLE

The foundation is a group of energetic and unselfish men who claim little of the credit for the success of the venture. They quietly share the credit for what has been done in the past year with the citizens of Nashua, their active chamber of commerce, and the New Hampshire State Development Commission. They explain, for example, that at the first news of Textron's decision to leave Nashua, the New Hampshire Development Commission offered its assistance immediately. Since that organization must, of necessity, show no favoritism, Edward Ellingwood, director of the commission, explained that his organization considered the Nashua problem a State-wide problem and an emergency.

The commission had several advertisements scheduled for October release in national newspapers and business papers, outlining the benefits of New Hampshire to new industry. It changed these advertisements to describe Nashua and its possibilities as a place for new industry because of its available ready-made space, and its good location.

The chamber of commerce recognized its primary duty to the city as a whole and realized the potential effect of such a threat to the business of the city. It visualized what might be in store for the merchants when 25 percent of the working population was threatened with a loss of income and consequently would be reluctant to buy anything but the bare necessities, despite the coming fall and Christmas season upon which the merchants rely heavily. To counteract the threat, an advertising program underwritten by the merchants was instituted under the direction of George J. Gordon, chairman of the merchants' division of the chamber of commerce.

It included radio and newspaper advertising designed to attract the people of the surrounding towns, suggesting that they make Nashua their shopping center. The cry was, "We accept the challenge." The results were amazing. Instead of sales falling off, merchants found themselves doing as well as in the previous year and in many cases a good deal better. Thus the merchant group of Nashua maintained its spirit and helped to show the way to the rest of the city.

BIG BUSINESS REPRESENTED

It is interesting to note that most of the members of the board of trustees of the Nashua-New Hampshire Foundation together with the two grantors are members of some of the largest industrial firms in Nashua. Elliott A. Carter, chairman of the foundation, is vice president of the Nashua Gummed and Coated Paper Co.; Francis P. Murphy (former Governor of New Hampshire) is chairman of the board of the J. F. McElwain Shoe Co.; Walter L. Barker is president of the Improved Paper Machinery Corp.; George J. Gordon is president of the Gordon Manufacturing Co.; Hugh Gregg, secretary of the foundation and its prime mover, is secretary-treasurer of Gregg & Sons, sash and door manufacturing company, and is now mayor, having been elected to that office in November 1949. Vasco Nunez, president of the Nashua Gummed and Coated Paper Co., and Robert C. Erb, president of the J. F. McElwain Shoe Co., members of the original Nashua Industrial Committee who acted as grantors in connection with the formation of the foundation, although not at present members of the board of trustees, have continued their interest in the project and have worked closely with foundation trustees.

By their energetic action to bring new industry to the city, these men have disproved the old chestnut often heard in small cities to the effect that old established concerns frequently discourage new industrial development for fear new industries will compete with them to their disadvantage for the existing labor supply. This group has gone to great lengths to help encourage new industry. In several cases where interested parties have expressed an interest in Nashua and, after inspecting the foundation's properties, decided they were not suited to their operations, the trustees have shown them other locations in the city where the new concerns did eventually buy or lease property.

It was the unselfish attitude on the part of everyone concerned that helped to bring Nashua out of the emergency. An example of combined direct action was the case of the Baldwin Lumber and Box Co., a new milling concern which purchased a wood mill and box factory through the efforts of the foundation and the chamber of commerce. Recognizing that the new concern needed more business to put it on a firmer footing, the group who had seen to the sale of the mill went further and helped to secure a contract which resulted in 30 more Nashua workers being assured of employment.

INFLUX OF INDUSTRIAL CONCERNS

To date the records of the Chamber of Commerce of Nashua show that since Textron's announcement on September 13, 1948, 12 new industrial concerns have come to Nashua and 1 company already in Nashua has expanded its operations. Seven of the twelve concerns, including the Jamey Shoe Co., manufacturers of women's shoes, and the Bagshaw Co., makers of industrial needles, have taken space on the foundation's property. Together with the Nashua Textile Co. and five other smaller concerns, they now have over 1,000 workers on their payrolls. Textron's Jackson Mills gives employment to 1,650–1,700 additional workers.

With several new concerns interested in Nashua properties, it is hoped that by the end of 1950, there will be more employment in Nashua than there were when Textron was operating at its peak and nearly as much as during the war period.

In examining the unemployment figures at the local office of the division of employment security, it is evident that the combined efforts of the people of Nashua have prevented any extended unemployment. The charts and graphs of Russell Evans, the local director, show that Nashua had the largest decrease in unemployment of any city in New Hampshire from May 1949 to May 1950. Unemployment decreased 43.3 percent during this period.

SKILLED EMPLOYEES AVAILABLE

Mr. Evans' figures also show that there is a large reservoir of skilled employees living in the surrounding towns who will take factory work when available. This is an important factor considering that at the present rate of incoming industry to Nashua there will be a greater demand for workers than at any time since World War II.

As a result of the successful sale and lease of 1,503,500 square feet of its available space, the Nashua-New Hampshire Foundation has been able to show the people of Nashua that the time will soon come when nearly all industry in Nashua will be privately and locally owned. Their success also enabled the foundation last month to pay off the remaining balance of the $400,000 mortgage, $289,603.80, from the proceeds of sales and rentals of properties.

The space still available for lease or sale through the foundation totals 1,006,250 square feet in buildings whose condition ranges from good to excellent. The foundation is now entertaining the possibility of constructing a new modern, air-conditioned plant for an acceptable manufacturer.

The progress of the whole endeavor is reflected in the attitude found throughout the city and brought sharply into focus by the support of the last Community Chest campaign, in which the $71,750 goal was oversubscribed by $5,000. In quoting the figures, William J. Barrett, the Community Chest president and a vice president of the Nashua Trust Co. and a trustee of the foundation, explained that this result was doubly amazing, in view of the fact that the goal was the largest it had been in any peacetime year and $7,000 more than in the preceding year, when it fell short by $3,000 even before there was any threat of unemployment.

He attributed one reason for the success to a new spirit of cooperation between management and labor in Nashua that seems to have pervaded the community since the crisis. In one plant alone, he pointed out, the percentage of contributions rose from 60 to 94 percent, along with increased gifts from the employers.

Too much cannot be said for the spirit and determination of the people of Nashua in overcoming the problem that faced the city. However, new industry would not have been created there or brought there by spirit alone It was the combined efforts of progressive groups that faced the problem squarely and went out and acted positively and wisely.

In seeking new industry, these groups, such as the chamber of commerce and the Nashua-New Hampshire Foundation, working together, concentrated on a program of pointing out the outstanding features Nashua could offer.

A GOOD SALES CAMPAIGN

Using every media possible—direct mail, newspaper advertising, and radio—they pointed to the ideal location near the commercial centers of New England and New York, the excellent available space in well-built and well-equipped buildings, the fine transportation facilities, the abundance of utilities, the quality and availability of skilled labor, and the industrial record Nashua has made for herself over the last century or more. In addition, they showed that the city itself was a good place in which to work and live. They talked and wrote about the fine schools, the absence of any slums, the geographical layout of the city in which the industrial plants are spread out over a wide area and not concentrated at one point.

They extolled the reputation of New Hampshire as a vacation State and as a winter and summer sports center. They pointed out the New Hampshire equitable tax system whereby a threefold tax structure is payable to the city in which the industry is located at the rate determined by the city itself. They further showed that the State has no income tax, corporation tax, or sales tax.

These men in their attempt to give Nashua a new prosperity are bringing these hard facts home to hundreds of businessmen, industrialists, and small factory owners throughout the country by every means of advertising and promotion. Each firm, large or small, that expresses an interest in Nashua is given immediate, thorough, and courteous attention. It's hard work and often discouraging work, but those involved realize that the future of Nashua rests with them.

Their success can make their city an even greater one than it was before trouble came.

Work of this sort is not without its problems. There is large machinery to move, problems in legal conveyance because of the intricate steam and electric lines, roads and fences to be kept in repair, and the problem of seeing how the new tenants can best be served. But the actions and results of the persons participating have shown that they have the necessary faith and ability to overcome problems. The phenomenal success attained since the work began has convinced even the doubters outside of Nashua that Nashua will not become the ghost town predicted, and its crisis has tempered the strength of the city and brought the people closer together and more aware of their own ability and rightful pride born of Yankee common sense and hard work.

A Feasible Method of Desalting Sea Water Is of Great National Importance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, the Public Lands Committee is considering a bill to authorize a study of feasible means of converting sea water to make it fit for potable use, H. R. 3123. Although I have not introduced a similar bill, I do want to speak and act in favor of this measure. I think the proposed legislation has very great meaning. In meeting vital human needs it may have greater potentiality for good than has the splitting of the atom. I am not alone in this appraisal, which amounts almost to a prophecy, because high officials of the Government, including the President himself, are favoring this study. President Truman mentioned it in his first official message to the Eighty-first Congress. It is well known that the Secretary of Interior and several of his assistants are keenly interested in this proposal and anxious to go all out in this effort. What about legislation necessary to lay the ground work?

While I have not myself introduced a bill of this kind, I have said to my colleagues, both in the House and the Senate, that I wanted to do everything in my power to help the move. I know of Senator O'MAHONEY'S great interest in this proposal and have promised to work with him in furthering the legislation. Likewise, I have told my California colleagues—not alone Mr. MCKINNON, but his predecessor and others—that I wanted to join them in this effort and sponsor it, or at least to help in doing so. It seems there has been an inclination on the part of some from California to scoff at this idea of drawing on the sea for usable water. Although I have noticed that fact for the past several years, I have not refrained from taking an active part in this legislative effort because of possible ridicule, coming from Los Angeles, which might be heaped upon it. No doubt, there will be more ridicule, as there has been, coming from that quarter. No, it is not from lack of interest on my part in this proposal but because of the press of other matters that I have been slow about inviting Congressman MCKINNON to appear before my committee.

What other similar bills have been introduced covering the subject in this or other Congresses? Beside H. R. 3123 which we have before us in this Congress, there is a Senate bill, S. 1300, similar to the McKinnon bill. It is to be observed that bills in the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses have been introduced by California Congressmen, which I note with interest and understanding.

It is to be especially noted that Congressman MCKINNON represents the great naval base area of San Diego where fresh water is so critically needed.

I recall that Mr. MCKINNON'S predecessor in the Eightieth Congress introduced a bill similar to this, but on which no hearings were held and no action was taken. Thus we see that great interest in the problem of converting sea water into usable form attracts the attention of Members from the San Diego area. However, so far as I can find, no such bill has been introduced by Members of Congress from Los Angeles. It may be easy to explain the reason why the idea is so lightly held in the Los Angeles area. But first let us look at the real reason for this curious legislative-geographic fact as it applies to San Diego.

Certainly if this proposal is feasibly possible, it should be done at San Diego, Calif., because of the critical water shortage there and because of the vital need of good water for human consumption at that great naval port.

The population of San Diego has increased enormously, and San Diego is of increasing importance as a naval base so that it is of national importance for our security that we look well to the fresh water supplies at that place. San Diego has inadequate local water resources and must now depend upon importing water from the Colorado River, which she is doing. In fact, the volume of Colorado River water carried through the metropolitan aqueduct is, for the city of San Diego, in more vitally needed proportion than for Los Angeles. This water is carried long distances through a branch aqueduct, which slender lifeline might be disrupted, leaving the city of San Diego and the port disastrously short of water. San Diego cannot develop local water resources to the point where she can rely entirely on such sources in the event of the disruption of her branch aqueduct. This fact points up the need for the thing for which this legislation calls, so that if it is humanly possible and engineeringly feasible, San Diego may draw upon the blue Pacific even for her drinking water.

In critical water shortage areas in central California—that is, north of the Tehachapi—it would also be highly desirable for us to be able to draw upon the vast Pacific in case of emergency or shortage. If we can discover how to treat seawater to make it potable, even if it is somewhat more expensive than natural supplies, it would be a matter of safety to have some stand-by equipment able to draw upon the sea. Some of the gentleman from central California, grateful no doubt for the generous supply of water furnished by nature in central California, but knowing that it is not equally distributed, have probably been influenced to favor this same legislation.

NEED AND ATTITUDE OF LOS ANGELES

Contrary to the mass of propaganda emanating from Los Angeles that the faucets of her kitchens were likely to go dry if S. 75 were passed, which smoke screen was raised against that Arizona legislation, we have lately heard it said, and I know it to be a fact, that the Los Angeles area has sufficient water by getting what is legally hers from the Colorado River, and therefore there is no need of importing water into the Los Angeles area even by human efforts from the Pacific. That fact is what I have thought all along during the last several years of the Arizona-California water controversy and therefore was not fooled by this fog of propaganda. Perhaps no other Member of Congress was fooled by it.

Even though Los Angeles and surrounding area have adequate water resources right under foot, plus water imported through two immense aqueducts, and therefore is less in need of stand-by water facilities than is San Diego, in my opinion, yet it is none too safe for such a great city to depend entirely upon those two aqueducts for supplemental water. Let it be understood that I would not take away from or keep away from either of these two aqueducts a drop of water, but either or both of them could be disrupted by earthquakes or by man. In fact, the Owens River aqueduct was once dynamited by Californians. Therefore a plant for the conversion of sea water, if we can find that there is such a thing feasible, might be a measure of safety even for Los Angeles in case of trouble.

Luckily, for Los Angeles and the Nation, that great city does not depend completely on imported water through her two aqueducts, because the containing area consisting of 1,400,000 acres of habitable land has good water only a few feet below the surface in an underground storage capacity of 7,000,000 acre-feet, which, according to a statement by California engineers, is capable of furnishing through pumped wells a safe annual yield of 700,000 acre-feet of good water. This tremendous reservoir is kept supplied by an extensive watershed extending along the Pacific coast for 90 miles and extending from the sea into the interior to high mountains an average of 50 miles. The rainfall on the coast is a low average of about 12 inches annually but on the mountain area the precipitation will run as high as 25 or 30 inches annually. The resulting tremendous run-off is carried to the underground reservoir by such streams as the Los Angeles River, the San Gabriel River, the Santa Ana River, and others. Prior to the building of the two aqueducts, Los Angeles and the surrounding cities drew their water supplies entirely from this vast underground storage, and could do so again to a considerable extent for a long time in case the aqueducts should be disrupted.

In the long drawn out and complex struggle between Arizona and California over the legal division of the waters of the Colorado River, one of the chief arguments Californians paraded before the public was the threat, so-called, to the Los Angeles water supply by such legislation as S. 75. Therefore, it was with much pleasure and understanding that I heard Congressman HOLIFIELD on August 22 in a prepared speech say:

California believes that its legal share of Colorado River, if protected, will be adequate for California's foreseeable needs and California will fight to preserve those legal rights against any attack.

Congressman POULSON has said about the same thing as found in his extension of remarks on August 17, and still other authoritative voices have stated the same satisfying fact. Since I recognize that California has a great volume of water legally coming to her from the Colorado River and of that Los Angeles has a certain legal share of the California quota, which amount I believe can be maintained before the highest court of the land, and which I would like to see done, therefore I am not worried about the vital water supply of Los Angeles.

However, I still think that even with an almost inexhaustible underground supply, and even with the two largest aqueducts in the world to bring the city melted snow from the high Sierra Mountains, and fairly good irrigation water from the Colorado River, I still believe that it would add greatly to the safety of Los Angeles and its vicinity if they had the facilities which we seek for San Diego to take municipal waters from the Pacific Ocean.

The Public Lands Committee received some correspondence from an engineer in San Diego presenting strong arguments for stand-by plants to convert sea water for human consumption. He pointed out the danger of letting any vital water supply depend upon aqueducts to convey water from distant sources. Even if the best process known for desalting sea water should be found to be somewhat more expensive than the cost of municipal water, even so, this engineer feels as I do that stand-by plants should be provided as a step in military safety. I quote from his letter:

We are now facing a very definite threat of war but the aqueduct boys do not recognize any such words as "war," "bombs," "aircraft" or "sabotage." Ask any United States air service officer what a few old-fashioned TNT bombs of World War II vintage would do to our costly aqueducts. They know that Los Angeles would be out of business for the duration. Also San Diego and every other California community dependent upon aqueduct water. In any real war of the future I'll wager our aqueducts would be a thing of the past in exactly the time it would take the enemy to get at them. But, of course, the aqueduct boys never mention any such thing.

San Diego (approximately 400,000 population) is now on a voluntary plan of water rationing and wondering how they're going to get through the summer. The city has no reserves of water whatever and is simply worrying along from day to day with the Colorado River aqueduct supply—against which serious inroads are already being made by the United States defense installations as a result of the trouble in Korea.

I predict that it isn't going to be very long * * * possibly before the end of this summer, when about 1,000,000 housewives in various parts of California will go to the kitchen sinks and find themselves with waterless plumbing. Or some Russian bombs on our aqueducts will produce a far more serious result. Then and then only do I expect to see anything done about getting potable water from ocean sources. We will then probably learn how to do it from some "more progressive country" like Saudi Arabia, Mexico, or Peru.

To California (as just one of many semiarid areas) fresh water from the ocean would be worth more than all our oil wells, all our mines, all our present agriculture, all our present industry, and all the assessed property valuation of the State.

Why should I, a Congressman from Arizona in the interior of the great West, be so much interested in this study? Well, this proposal if feasible would be good not only for the coast of California but if found to be what we hope for can be a life saver to all parts of the Nation's ocean shore line. On the other side of the world it can be a great help to the ancient Mediterranean lands which were once well watered and fruitful but now barren and desolate. If an inexpensive and feasible way, without using too much of some other natural resource can be found, this idea could have as great a benefit to the human family as does the splitting of the atom.

Let it not be supposed that we in the Rocky Mountain area or throughout the interior of the western region, hundreds of miles from the sea, are not at all interested in desalting water. At the lower edge of every great irrigation project in the Rocky Mountain region, certainly in Arizona, California, New Mexico, and Utah, to say nothing of the other States higher up, will be found water so saline as to be unfit for drinking purposes or for irrigation. In fact, the accumulation of salt is one of the major problems of irrigation. At the present time we attempt to flush it out of the land, which requires the use of a lot of water which should be used some other way. Therefore, if this idea has any merit for the sea coast it would have the same merit not only for the Imperial Valley in California, the great Salt Lake Basin in Utah, the enclosed basins in Nevada, but on every other great irrigation project where once fresh river water has become salty through many uses and reuses. I hope this idea of purifying sea water is sound and workable.

The Most Highly Beloved Man I Have Ever Known

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, few columnists possess the rare gift of expressing themselves in homey, down-to-earth language, and at the same time exhibit as keen sense and deep appreciation of the virtues of his fellow men to the degree possessed by Jack Williams, Washington correspondent of the Kansas City Star and one of Capitol Hill's most popular members of the Press Gallery.

Jack Williams' articles are always factual and terse, replete with readers' interest and need no embellishment.

Several weeks ago, Jack Williams wrote a column on my very good friend and the good friend of every Member of Congress, the Honorable DEWEY SHORT, a soldier, statesman, orator, teacher, traveler, and one of the greatest raconteurs that ever set foot in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, for 12 years I have served with DEWEY SHORT on what is now the Armed Services Committee of this House. I shall never forget the words that on one occasion were spoken by the Honorable CARL VINSON, Democratic chairman of that committee, in referring to DEWEY SHORT as "the most highly beloved man I have ever known."

Mr. Speaker, I remember also the first occasion on which I enjoyed the distinguished privilege and pleasure of introducing our good friend and colleague, DEWEY SHORT, to an audience.

I had previously asked my secretary to obtain some more or less intimate background details with respect to DEWEY's experience, family, and other data that would be of interest.

In a very short while my secretary handed me a veritable avalanche of the things that had been accomplished by our friend. One thing, however, stood out above all else in the short biography handed me. It was the written statement that—

In all history there had been no man who had ever served in the Nation's Congress whose mind was so enriched, whose personality was so endowed, and whose humanities were so greatly influenced by formal education than was the mind of the Honorable DEWEY SHORT.

Mr. Speaker, since that day I have never listened to Congressman SHORT speak either in or out of Congress but that I think of the veritable catalog of colleges, universities, and other schools of higher learning that have contributed to enriching the mind of the man we all call our friend—veteran, statesman, and ranking minority member of the Armed Services Committee.

Knowing that Jack Williams' article will be of immense interest to DEWEY SHORT'S many friends in and out of Congress, under unanimous consent I insert the same into the RECORD.

The article reads as follows:

DEWEY SHORT SHINES ON GOP RAMPARTS—THE OZARKS ORATOR, SEEKING REELECTION, IS A GRADUATE OF BAKER UNIVERSITY AND HAS ATTENDED BOSTON UNIVERSITY, HEIDELBERG UNIVERSITY, BERLIN UNIVERSITY, OXFORD UNIVERSITY, AND HARVARD

(By Jack Williams)

WASHINGTON.—A large photograph of a span of mules hangs conspicuously in the office of one of the most recalcitrant, undeviating and unsubduable Republicans in Congress.

Of course, elephants too are on the desk and tables of Representative DEWEY SHORT, of Galena, Mo., the only GOP House Member from Missouri. But it was the 4-footed donkey emblem of the Democratic party which propelled SHORT into stalwart Republicanism.

SHORT, 51 years old, had just mailed his filing fee to Jefferson City to seek his tenth 2-year term in the House, as he pointed to the picture of the mules.

WORKED HARD FOR MONEY

"I shined shoes, sold newspapers, and did odd jobs to buy Jack and Jason and that wagon to which they are hitched," SHORT reminisced. "With them I earned enough by selling ice and hauling to save $1,000 by the time I finished high school in Galena. That was a lot of money in those good old pre-deals days. It started me on my way to getting an education."

SHORT went on from there with the aid of a fellowship and a loan from a cousin to get an education which qualified him for his present title of the "best educated man in the House." He started out to become a preacher, and did preach later, but his flair for oratory plumped him into Congress as the "boy oratorical wonder" back in 1928.

SHORT dug out of a closet a copy of a keynote speech he delivered at the Missouri Republican convention in 1936. He read it aloud. He said he could use the same speech today, that spending and bureaucracy still flourish.

"But I have not given up," he said. "I still believe the theory that the government is the master instead of the servant of the people is wrong. I can continue to wait for a reversal in the trend. So I am seeking another term."

ATTRACTION AS SPEAKER

The youthful-looking Ozark Congressman is perhaps the most colorful figure in the House. When he speaks Democrats as well as Republicans come to the floor to hear his flights of oratory. A sample of his satire was his reply to a criticism of his knowledge of national affairs by rotund Representative O'TOOLE of Brooklyn, Democrat.

"Why, I have been farther back under the barn looking for eggs than you have been from Brooklyn," SHORT shot back.

O'TOOLE grinned and sat down amid the laughter.

Few if any Members of Congress have traveled so far as the man from "deep in the Ozark backwoods." Galena is a town of 507 population which SHORT said was "only a few more than when I was born." He lives in a house across the street from the one where he was born.

After finishing Galena high school, SHORT attended old Marionville College, 2 miles from Galena, for 2 years. It was a Methodist college. He then went to Baker University in Baldwin, Kans., where he was graduated. He entered Boston University School of Theology where he was graduated and won the Frank D. Howard scholarship which sent him to Heidelberg University in Germany, then the University of Berlin and finally to Oxford University in England. He returned to the United States and later spent a year studying law at Harvard University.

A RHODES CANDIDATE

His last school work was financed by lectures on his European travels. At Baker, SHORT was voted a candidate for a Rhodes scholarship but it was awarded to two older students at another school on the theory that they were much older and SHORT would have another chance. He never waited but went on to win the Boston University scholarship.

SHORT believes that a "tragic day of reckoning" lies in wait from the rising national debt. He is the ranking minority member of the Armed Service Committee.

"The first line of defense is a sound economy," he said. "A bankrupt nation never whipped anybody. Government is no different from an individual. Our national debt now is $257,000,000,000, and in spending a record forty-two billion this year we will have to borrow five and one-half billion to meet our bills. The Fair Dealers don't mention that taxes have been increased a hundredfold. There was seven billion in money in circulation in 1940. This has been increased through inflation to twenty-eight and one-half billion at this time.

"The resources of our country are being siphoned to Europe. Our natural resources have been depleted by two World Wars. Oil, lead, zinc, iron, and other commodities upon which this country must look to survive have been depleted."

SHORT is anxious to get back to his district in southwest Missouri to start campaigning. He will be there during the Easter recess of Congress from April 6 to 17.

VOTED FOR UNITED NATIONS

SHORT opposed the League of Nations. He voted for the United Nations.

"I was willing to try it," he said. "We haven't got very far with it. Guess we will have to be patient."

After his long stay away from Missouri getting an education, SHORT returned to the Midwest with degrees in theology and philosophy. He became a philosophy faculty member at Southwestern College in Winfield, Kans., in 1923. After a year there he returned to Harvard for a course in law of 1 year. He never took the bar examination, but returned to Southwestern to remain from 1925 to 1928.

He became a supply pastor at a Springfield, Mo., church during his teaching period. His sermons caused him to be much talked about. In the 1928 campaign, Republicans planned a huge rally in Springfield. They went to SHORT and urged him to make the principal address.

SHORT's father, long a Republican leader and county chairman, joined in the request, and SHORT accepted. His address won him fame as the "boy wonder" orator, and he jumped headlong into politics, entering the race for Congress from his old home district, then the Fourteenth. Missouri had 14 Members in the House then. Today it has 13, and SHORT is the seventh.

GAIN IN HIS DISTRICT

There is a pretty good chance that Missouri will lose one Member as the result of redistricting after the 1950 census, SHORT said. He added that his own district had grown in population.

SHORT was elected to the House in 1928, defeating the veteran Democrat, the late James F. Fullbright, in the normally Democratic district. In 1930 Fullbright turned the tables and defeated SHORT. In 1932 Missouri congressional candidates ran at large because the State legislature failed to carry out a redistricting.

SHORT that year ran for the Senate nomination but was defeated in the primary by the then mayor of St. Louis, Henry Kell. In 1934 the old Fourteenth District had been redistricted and SHORT's Ozark region became the Seventh. He was nominated and elected to Congress and has been reelected since that time which makes him the only Representative ever elected from the new Seventh.

UNESCO Supports UN Action in Korea

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on July 22 the executive committee of the United States National Commission for UNESCO called for a special meeting of the Executive Board of UNESCO—the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization—to consider what action UNESCO should take in support of the UN in Korea and in other areas of possible aggression. The committee's resolution was forwarded to the UNESCO Executive Board by Luther H. Evans, a member of that Board and a member of the National Commission.

Count Stefano Jacini, of Italy, Chairman of the UNESCO Executive Board, subsequently received requests for the special meeting from Board members representing nine other nationalities—from Belgium, Brazil, France, Greece, Lebanon, Norway, the Philippines, Turkey, and Venezuela.

At its meeting, July 22, the United States National Commission also urged a Nation-wide educational campaign in this country on the responsibility of the UN in the current situation. This program now is being planned.

The National Commission is established by law to advise the State Department on UNESCO affairs. It is composed of approximately 100 leaders in the fields of education, science, the arts, business, labor and press, radio and films. The chairman of the Commission is George D. Stoddard, president of the University of Illinois.

I am inserting at this point in my remarks copies of the resolution of the UNESCO Executive Board; the statement of Dr. Evans; and a digest of the original resolution of the Executive Committee of the United States National Commission for UNESCO:

ACTIONS OF THE UNESCO EXECUTIVE BOARD AT A SPECIAL MEETING OPENED IN PARIS AUGUST 26

The UNESCO Executive Board was called into special session in Paris, August 25, 1950, to consider UNESCO's obligations resulting from the attack on the Republic of Korea. Count Stefano Jacini, of Italy, Chairman of the Board, summoned the meeting at the request of Luther H. Evans, United States Librarian of Congress, and members representing nine other nationalities.

Chairman Jacini announced that at a closed session of the Board August 26 members unanimously condemned the aggression against the Republic of South Korea.

Previously, the Board had heard Director General Jaime Torres Bodet, of UNESCO, and Benjamin Cohen, Assistant Secretary General of the United Nations, who presented a letter to UNESCO from Trygve Lie, Secretary General of the UN, asking UNESCO's aid in explaining the responsibilities of the UN in the current situation.

Following are the texts of two resolutions passed by the Executive Board August 26:

"Profoundly moved by the armed attack of which the Republic of Korea has been the victim, and which brought the Security Council of the United Nations to adopt certain measures with a view to reestablishing peace and security, considering that one of the essential aims of UNESCO is, as stated in article 1 of its constitution, 'to contribute to peace and security by promoting collaboration among the nations through education, science, and culture in order to further universal respect for justice, for the rule of law, and for human rights and fundamental freedoms for the peoples of the world.'

"Considering that the general conference at its fifth session reaffirmed that 'all the activities of UNESCO must be directed toward the peace and prosperity of mankind' and that these 'activities, to be fully effective, imply a truly and sincerely universal outlook excluding all thought of aggression and founded on recognition of the principles of justice and freedom on which the constitution of the organization is based.'

"Considering that, in the resolutions adopted by the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council on July 31, 1950, and August 14, 1950, respectively, the specialized agencies were requested, in accordance with the terms of their agreements with the United Nations to give whatever help the unified command of the United Nations in Korea might request, in order to assist and bring aid to the civilian population in Korea, considering that the Economic and Social Council, in council, in its resolution of August 14, 1950, also stressed the necessity for aid in securing the understanding and the support of the peoples of the world for the action of the United Nations in Korea, and requested the Secretary-General to seek, in the name of the Council, whatever form of cooperation was best adapted to this purpose.

"Taking note of the communications of the Secretary-General of the United Nations concerning the help which UNESCO could give, in accordance with the above-mentioned resolution, assures the population of Korea of its deep and earnest sympathy, renders respectful homage to the soldiers of the United Nations who are fighting on the Korean front in the name of international solidarity, recalls that international peace and security must be based on the respect of the principles of law and the decisions of the competent organs of the United Nations, if force is not to triumph over law, and if justice is to be maintained, expresses its confidence in the program and methods of UNESCO in serving the aims of peace of the United Nations, through the perfecting of international cooperation, through the amelioration of the living conditions of man and through the development of international understanding by means of education, science, and culture.

"Considers, that in order that UNESCO may aid the United Nations in eliminating the dangers of war more effectively, it is particularly urgent, at this moment when human solidarity is under trial and when human rights are in peril, that still wider and more active support should be given to the execution of its mission, by governments and national commissions of member states.

"Decides that within the framework of its competence, UNESCO will give all possible aid and assistance to the action undertaken by the United Nations in Korea and toward this end, instructs the Director-General:

"(1) To relieve the needs of the civilian population in Korea within the fields of education, science, and culture, by means of emergency relief, and, at the appropriate time by a reconstruction project;

"(2) To develop, within the resources at his disposal, including the periodical publications of the organization, the execution of the program resolutions concerning teaching about the United Nations and its specialized agencies, putting particular emphasis on the necessity for collective security, based on respect for law, with the aid of concrete examples and to this end to utilize appropriate documentation provided by the Secretary-General of the United Nations appeals to the governments and national commissions of member states to participate to the extent of the means at their disposal in this action.

"Requests nongovernmental organizations, which participate in the task of UNESCO, men and women whose activities are devoted to education, science, culture, and information, and all those who wish to live in peace with their fellow men, to contribute to the work of UNESCO, in that spirit of liberty which characterizes all of its actions with a view to reinforcing in the minds of men the intellectual and moral defenses of peace through law which the United Nations are responsible for developing and safeguarding."

In implementation of the above resolution, the executive board authorizes the Director-General—

"(1) With a view to providing assistance to the civilian population of Korea:

"(a) To send a mission to Korea, upon the request of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, to investigate the needs of the civilian population of Korea, in liaison with the unified command and the appropriate organs of the United Nations responsible for civilian relief;

"(b) To provide, upon request, educational supplies on an emergency basis;

"(c) To prepare in close liaison with the United Nations and the specialized agencies and launch a campaign in cooperation with member states and their national commissions and with nongovernmental organizations, for assistance to the Republic of Korea in the field of educational, scientific, and cultural relief and reconstruction.

"(2) With a view to strengthening through teaching about the United Nations and its specialized agencies, a full understanding of the principles of the United Nations action for peace and security;

"(a) To prepare, in close and constant collaboration with the United Nations, both written and audio-visual materials for use in schools, adult classes, and universities.

"(b) To produce and distribute these to member states in English, French, and Spanish, in sufficient quantities to enable member states to adapt them and diffuse them on a large scale for their own purposes;

"(c) To put at the disposal of the Secretary-General of the United Nations two specialists with instructions to cooperate with the United Nations Secretariat in order to assemble relevant documentation in connection with the United Nations action in Korea."

STATEMENT BY LUTHER H. EVANS, MEMBER OF THE EXECUTIVE BOARD OF UNESCO, UNITED NATIONS EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION, AT A SPECIAL MEETING OF THE BOARD IN PARIS, AUGUST 28, 1950

The United Nations has called on its member nations to repel the armed attack on the Republic of Korea. In doing this, it has taken an historic step—transforming the hope of outlawing aggression into the determination to defeat such aggression.

Institutions, like men, have a purpose in life, else there is no reason for their existence. The United Nations was created by the peoples of the world for certain purposes proclaimed in the Charter. The preeminent purpose is to strengthen peace and prevent aggression.

When peace was wantonly broken in Korea by the deliberate aggression of armed forces, the United Nations was challenged to justify its existence. It met that critical test by ranging the forces of justice against the aggressor. By that act the United Nations became, in fact as well as in name, the defender of the peace.

The purposes of UNESCO are set forth in its constitution. Foremost among these is the purpose to contribute to peace and security by furthering universal respect for justice, for the rule of law, and for the human rights and fundamental freedoms affirmed for all peoples by the Charter of the United Nations. These are the very principles which the United Nations is fighting to uphold in Korea, a member of UNESCO.

The duty of UNESCO is plain. It must fulfill its obligation to the United Nations by explaining to the peoples of the world, with the help of teachers, scholars, writers, and other leaders in the communication of knowledge and ideas, that the issue in Korea is clearly drawn between the defense of peace and permitting brute aggression to succeed. It must help create throughout the world an understanding of the vital role that the United Nations has assumed in Korea and the responsibilities it faces in other areas of possible aggression. Naturally, UNESCO must also do its full part in rebuilding the shattered life of the Korean nation.

The United Nations has spoken for the conscience of mankind. UNESCO can have no greater task than to uphold the United Nations as the defender of peace. Let us get on with the task!

UNESCO REQUESTED BY UNITED STATES LEADERS TO TAKE ACTION ON KOREAN SITUATION

An immediate session of the executive board of UNESCO to take appropriate and vigorous action with respect to the impact of the Korean situation on the peace of the world and in regard to other areas where acts of aggression may occur," has been requested by the executive committee of the United States National Commission for UNESCO, it was announced today.

The committee transmitted its request to UNESCO headquarters in Paris through Luther H. Evans, Librarian of Congress and vice chairman of UNESCO's executive board, which is composed of leaders of 18 nationalities selected from UNESCO's 59 member nations.

The committee submitted for consideration the following possible courses of action:

"Adoption of a strong statement of support for the action of the United Nations.

"Convening an emergency session of the general conference of UNESCO.

"Concentration of UNESCO's resources and the necessary transfer of funds and personnel to the fullest extent possible for the execution of an emergency program in support of the United Nations.

"Devising and utilizing all available means for the dissemination of the facts concerning the causes of the present situation in Korea and other actions which may threaten the peace in other areas of the world.

"Convening regional conferences for education and information.

"Immediate planning for effective 'relief assistance' and reconstruction in Korea.

"Inviting governments and national commissions to cooperate in the execution of the program authorized by the Board and/or the General Conference."

The committee's action was taken on the premise that UNESCO—the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization—has a primary obligation "to promote peace and security" and "to further universal respect for justice and the rule of law". Citing recent actions of the UNESCO General Conference at Florence, Italy, stressing the necessity of "cooperating loyally * * * in the framework of the United Nations" and "to promote respect for human rights throughout all nations" * * * the executive committee reminded the UNESCO Executive Board that:

"* * * the United Nations Security Council has determined 'that the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea constitutes a breach of the peace';

"* * * threats of further aggression may occur in other areas of tension;

"* * * it is the obligation of UNESCO to cooperate with the United Nations for the preservation of peace;

"* * * UNESCO has special resources for education and for disseminating information, including national commissions which give UNESCO access to the people in member states."

The executive committee also adopted the following statement related to the position of United States organizations and citizens:

"On June 25, 1950, the peace of the world was broken by an act of aggression in Korea. Never before had such an act taken place against so complete a background of international collaboration and organization as that represented by the United Nations. Never before were the issues involved in a breach of the peace conditioned so fully by the fundamental consideration that even defensive military action must have as an underlying objective 'the building of the defenses of peace in the minds of men.'

"The United Nations Security Council has determined that the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea constitutes a breach of the peace, and in accord with its Charter the Council has taken direct action to end the conflict. The executive committee of the United States National Commission for UNESCO is in complete support of this decision and the steps that have been taken to carry it out.

"The executive committee of the United States National Commission now calls to the attention of the members of the National Commission and to the people of the United States that UNESCO itself has a vital role to play in the present crisis * * *."

The executive committee therefore requested the National Commission's committee on activities in the United States to make plans for the development of information materials and discussion programs which would help clarify both the immediate and long-range implications of the Korea situation; the responsibility of the UN for taking action in this and other possible areas of aggression; and to solicit the advice of national organizations in preparing such programs.

The United States National Commission was established by law to advise the Department of State on UNESCO affairs and has the major responsibility for UNESCO programs in this country. Composed of 100 members—60 representing national organizations and the others selected as individual leaders from many fields—the Commission is headed by George D. Stoddard, president of the University of Illinois, and three vice-chairmen: Detlev Bronk, president of the Johns Hopkins University; Erwin D. Canham, editor of the Christian Science Monitor; and Mrs. Henry Potter Russell, San Francisco civic leader.

Members of the executive committee, which took the above actions at a meeting held in Washington, include: Senator William Benton, Mrs. Harvey N. Davis, Frederick S. Dunn, Milton S. Eisenhower, Robert M. Gates, Charles S. Johnson, Waldo G. Leland, Raymond F. McCoy, Earl J. McGrath, C. J. McLanahan, Stanley H. Ruttenberg, Mrs. Raymond Sayre, Alexander J. Stoddard, George F. Zook, Paul H. Sheats, and Dr. Evans. Other National Commission members who took part in the Washington meeting—presided over by Chairman Stoddard—were Monsignor Frederick G. Hochwalt and Miss Myrna Loy.

Where Do We Go From the Thirty-eighth Parallel?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I dare say that nobody in the United States now remains in ignorance of what we are fighting in Korea. We all know that we are fighting armed Communist aggression, set in motion by the bloody tyrant of the Kremlin.

But few of us, indeed, know why we are fighting at this particular time and place, in view of the fact, so often conceded, that Korea is of small military value in the over-all conflict between democracy and communism.

Perhaps nobody knows, even at this late date in the Korean war, what we intend to do after the Communist armies have been defeated, as defeat them we must and most certainly will.

So there you have the two questions which must be answered by the Truman administration before this war is much older. Why are we fighting at this time and place? What shall be our policy with respect to Korea after the fighting has ceased?

The fact that these questions even now have not been answered, is proof enough, it seems to me, that ever since the end of hostilities in World War II, back in 1945, the Truman administration has utterly lacked any real policy at all in its conduct of this Nation's foreign affairs.

It has been pointed out repeatedly, by men who may be better informed than I, that support of the Nationalist government of Chiang Kai-shek, at the time when Congress provided the authority and funds for that support, would have prevented this Korean war. With that help, which the Communist-infiltrated State and Commerce Departments rendered null and void, Chiang could have held a major portion of China. Today there would have been a Chinese Nationalist Army of at least 2,000,000 men, to hold back the Communist hordes in Asia.

With Chiang Kai-shek still dominant in China, we would have had time to prepare; time to correct the monumental blunders whereby we weakened our military power, at a time when violence is the world order of the day.

Even though the completely ill-advised and incredibly stupid policy of announcing that we would not defend Korea had encouraged the Kremlin to order the invasion of the infant Korean Republic, the presence of a tremendously strong and well-equipped Chinese Nationalist Army in the Far East would have doomed that invasion to quick failure. American boys would not now be dying by thousands in the marshes and on the mountains of the Korean Peninsula.

If Chiang Kai-shek had received the arms which it was the intent of Congress that he should have, he would not now be caged up on the island of Formosa. There would have been no reason for the presence of American naval forces in the narrow seas between Formosa and the Chinese mainland. We would not be in the position of alone, and without even United Nations moral support, challenging the millions of Chinese Communist soldiers, well trained and equipped by the Russians.

It is here, in my humble opinion, that the greatest threat to world peace exists. The war in Korea is being fought, nominally at least, as a United Nations war against Communist aggression. The naval activity off Formosa is solely American, the result of a unilateral decision by the President of the United States. In this fact lies the explanation of the President's recent order, which compelled Gen. Douglas MacArthur to withdraw his statement to the Veterans of Foreign Wars on the status of Formosa.

It was easy to get United Nations support for the action in Korea, because nobody's interests, except those of the Koreans, are at stake. But the naval blockade of the Chinese mainland opposite Formosa was, and still remains, a challenge of the Chinese Communist government; and Great Britain has given diplomatic recognition to that government, unrealistically hoping thus to retain the British foothold in Hong Kong, and British investments and trade in China.

Therefore it was obvious that the President sought to make his action with respect to Formosa consistent with his action with respect to Korea. By saying that American policy contemplates no military base on Formosa, and that the status of Formosa must await action by the United Nations, the President accepted the totally unrealistic attitude of the British. Speaking solely as an American commander, and not as the commander of United Nations forces in Korea, MacArthur told the manifest truth, when he said that Formosa must be included in the American perimeter of defense against Russian expansionism. In the end, I predict, MacArthur's policy will prevail.

All of these considerations, I believe, lead only to one conclusion, which is that the Truman administration's foreign policy, thus far since the end of World War II, has been no policy at all. It has been a series of vacillations, of makeshift decisions on the spur of the moment, without either foresight or good judgment—and always subject to the influence of Communist appeasers, to say nothing of pro-Communists and Communist agents hidden away in the Government departments.

Proof of these things is offered by the fact, now glaringly apparent, that the decision to fight in Korea and to blockade the waters between China and Formosa, was a decision of desperation. It constituted a belated recognition of the fact that Truman's policy in the Far East, as formulated by the State Department, was utterly wrong. It was a tacit confession that the Republicans were right, when they tried in every way possible, to force the administration to carry out the will of Congress, in aiding Chiang Kai-shek before it was too late.

White House and State Department opposition to assistance for Chiang, it will be recalled, was based solely upon the contention that the Nationalist Government was corrupt. It ignored the fact that we are less interested in Chinese morals than we are in stemming the tide of communism in Asia. It would seem that the administration wins all the little moral battles, only to lose the big one, which is the battle to keep the world free. The administration's attitude toward Fascist Spain, it should be added, is identical with its former attitude toward Nationalist China.

On the basis of all I have said here, it is manifest that the reason why we are fighting in Korea at this particular time is in fact solely that the Truman administration is striving desperately, at a high cost in American money and American lives, to rectify its earlier mistakes in the Far East. But we have still to consider what our policy is to be in Korea, after the fighting is ended; if, indeed, it does end and does not lead directly into another world war.

When we have pushed the North Korean Communists back to the thirty-eighth parallel, shall we stop there, or shall we go on to the Manchurian border, thus ending the artificial partition of Korea? Would the United Nations lend support to such a project? I think we should find out about this, although I doubt if the United Nations would act favorably; not so long as the Russians are present to wield the veto.

The Security Council's order called only for the North Koreans to cease hostilities and withdraw behind the thirty-eighth parallel. But in spite of this, Warren Austin has hinted that the United States Government feels that it should go forward. Like most Republicans, I agree with him that only by so doing can a repetition of the present breach of the peace be prevented.

And then, conceding that a unified Korea is thus brought back into being—what then, may I ask, shall we do? Shall we permit our effort to end merely in a long period of occupation, with the wretched Koreans living miserably, as a subject people, in the rubble of their destroyed towns and villages? Or shall we make some practical application of the principles embodied in the Marshall plan? It is plainly manifest that we must give the Koreans something more than a mere promise of freedom from Communist rule. If we offer them only misery under foreign domination, they may well decide that Communist promises of an earthly paradise are preferable. And we must not forget that the other nations of Asia, now wavering between the Communist and democratic ideologies, are watching to see which way to jump.

It is my conviction that the United Nations, which means in effect the United States of America, must guarantee the Koreans, first of all, a rebuilt Korea; secondly, we must guarantee them liberty and freedom from all outside domination, either Communist or non-Communist; thirdly, security against armed aggression, from whatever source; in the fourth place, we must show them how the democratic way is the way to civil peace and both national and individual prosperity. And we must implement this teaching by helping to raise the standards of living, by encouraging capital investment, by training the people in technical skills, and by taking such steps as are possible to assure the Koreans of trading possibilities abroad.

These things should be done, of course, under the sponsorship of the United Nations, if the obstacle of Russian opposition can be overcome. But if not, still the United States should do the job, insofar as American resources permit.

It has been suggested by one of the ablest Members of the United States Senate that the United Nations might guarantee the Koreans against foreign aggression by neutralizing a strip, 10 to 30 miles deep, along the border between Korea and Manchuria. This is a good idea, if it could be brought about in the face of virtually certain opposition by Communist Russia.

In conclusion, I submit that the proposals I have outlined here comprise a proper policy for the American Government with respect to Korea, after the Communists have been driven out. With respect to the situation at Formosa, I agree completely with General MacArthur. Formosa must be kept, come what may, within the perimeter of American defense against the onrush of communism in Asia.

Missouri Farmers' Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend remarks I include resolutions adopted by the Missouri Farmers' Association at their annual convention held at Columbia, Mo., August 7–8, 1950, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS OF THE THIRTY-SECOND ANNUAL CONVENTION, MISSOURI FARMERS ASSOCIATION, AUGUST 7-8, 1950, COLUMBIA, MO.

FOREWORD

Delegates and members at this, our thirty-second annual convention, are pleased to learn that during the past year the Missouri Farmers Association has made further progress.

Our membership stands at 124,085. At no time in the history of the Missouri Farmers Association have our cooperatives been in a sounder and more prosperous condition. No other class of Missourians can claim to have enjoyed more competent legislative representation both at the State and the Nation's capitals than members of the Missouri Farmers Association.

The Missouri Farmers Association, with the support of more than half the farm families of Missouri, is now able to render more service and effect greater savings than ever before, and of this great organization Missouri farmers can feel justly proud.

1. Foreign policy: The farmers of Missouri pledge their wholehearted support of our Government's foreign policy, believing that our Government and the United Nations had no alternative to the measure taken in Korea. Farmers are not pacifists, as their record in every war since the American Revolution proves. We are peace-loving people, and it is our earnest hope that our Government's search for peace will be unremitting. It is our belief that the chief hope of lasting peace lies in the United Nations, and therefore we urge that the United Nations be gradually strengthened so that eventually an international police force may be able to maintain order throughout the world.

2. Our biggest farm problem: Farmers have numerous problems, many of which cannot be solved except by national legislation. However, there is one problem that looms larger than all the rest, that cannot be solved by national legislation, but which can be solved by the farmers themselves through cooperation with their neighbors. That one, big problem is: Buying at retail and selling at wholesale prices. Historically, farmers have had to do business at that kind of disadvantage, and it is one of the chief reasons why farmers organized the Missouri Farmers Association.

With the exception of a few areas where Missouri Farmers Association cooperatives do not yet exist, farmers of Missouri are no longer compelled to accept whatever price is offered for the products of their sweat and toil and to pay whatever price is asked for the supplies they need on their farms.

Through the ownership of a great cooperative marketing and purchasing system which flies MFA emblem, Misouri farmers are at last in position to market their products and obtain their supplies at cost. Year by year more farmers are using their organization to win for themselves their economic battles. Our total annual volume of business now approaches $225,000,000 on which important annual savings are being made in terms of cash. Important as these cash savings may be, however, the measuring stick MFA cooperatives provide in hundreds of towns throughout the State—which helps keep prices reasonable—has saved Missouri's farm families countless thousands of dollars in years past.

In order to make this cooperative system even more effective in the years ahead only one thing is necessary: Farmers must put more volume through it, must do more business with local MFA exchanges. Volume is the answer to the ancient problem farmers have had for so long, the problem of being compelled to buy at retail and sell at wholesale.

Therefore this convention urges every farm family to do as much business as possible through MFA exchanges and other MFA cooperatives in the coming months and years.

3. The family size farm: Census figures show that ever since 1900 the size of farms has been growing larger and the family size farm has been declining in numbers. Mechanization of agriculture has been the chief factor in this trend. Machinery has enabled one man to operate more land than was the case when horse-drawn equipment was used. The disparity in farm income has made it necessary for the farm family to operate a larger acreage in order to obtain sufficient income for family living.

We of the Missouri Farmers Association view this trend toward larger farms with alarm. Unless it is arrested, the final outcome will be large-corporation farming with much absentee ownership. More and more people will move into industry, taking their places in the mass production lines. A time may come when only two classes of people will exist in the United States—the small minority of owners, and the large mass of workers who own nothing but their personal belongings, but who vote on election day.

There is a way to safeguard the family size farm. Farms can be enlarged by means of vertical farming, without moving the fences. This can be accomplished by the greater use of plant foods and more efficient farming, plus the more thorough use by farmers of the cooperative marketing and purchasing system which is now provided by the Missouri Farmers Association. The standard of living of families living on average sized farms can thus be improved and the family size farm thus be safeguarded.

4. Livestock pasture farming: The Missouri Farmers Association endorses the livestock pasture farming program of the Missouri College of Agriculture. This program contemplates the increase of livestock numbers and a greater use of pastures, pointing out the fact that it would take 3,300 years for the first 7 inches of top soil in blue grass sod to erode as compared to the other extreme of only 14.9 years where corn is produced continuously. The program points to the need of tripling the use of lime on crop and pasture land, to the need of increasing the use of fertilizer by six or seven times, and to the need of contouring crops and building terraces on a total of 5,000,000 acres in order to insure permanence and prosperity to Missouri agriculture. Such an objective, we believe, should be the common goal of Missouri farmers in order to arrest the alarming decline in soil fertility and to effect a gradual improvement.

5. Farm legislation: The uncertain foreign situation has vastly changed the outlook for agriculture. No one can say at this time what lies ahead for us internationally, except that it seems obvious we must be well prepared in a world where there is unrest and outlawry. Emphasis toward greater production in agriculture which we knew throughout World War II will likely be resumed.

However, farmers must be working on a long-time farm program which will forestall an economic collapse in agriculture such as occurred in the post World War I years. We have not yet had farm legislation, helpful as some of it has been, that seemed adequate to meet the needs of farmers.

Lately we have had price supports without provision for disposing of surpluses, which is unsound. The bipartisan farm bloc has practically disintegrated, and this is a misfortune for agriculture. Farm organizations have disagreed among themselves as to what should be proposed, and this disunity has been reflected in the Congress, as witness the makeshift and temporary farm legislation that body has enacted during recent years.

Briefly, the long-time farm problem consists of two parts: (1) There is a need to restore the bipartisan farm bloc in the Congress; and (2) we must somehow learn how to live with farm surpluses.

In order to restore bipartisan interest and support for sound farm legislation, we propose that a bipartisan commission representing all sections of the United States be established, this commission to have the authority to administer farm legislation. Then we propose that a food stamp plan be adopted which will make surplus foods available to the one-third of the American people who are on the lowest rung of the economic ladder, while at the same time we urge that educational institutions and others accelerate nutritional education with the objective of upgrading the diet of those who have sufficient income to enable them to eat properly.

It is our belief that if all of the American people were financially able to and understood the need of consuming a well-balanced diet of meat, milk, fruits, and vegetables, there would be no farm surpluses. At the same time the American people would be the healthiest and happiest any people have ever been in the world's history.

6. More electric power needed: Electric service must be extended by the various REA-financed cooperatives until the drudging burdens are lifted from the backs of our people and the primitive conditions are eliminated from all farm homes.

We take cognizance of the fact that the REA-financed cooperatives have been hampered by an inadequate supply of power with which to energize new lines and increase the power loads of existing lines. The Missouri Farmers Association will continue to support the REA and the REA-financed cooperatives, as well as the Southwestern Power Administration, to the end that every farmstead in our State becomes electrified.

7. Vote for our friends: This is an election year. There never was a time when it is more important than now for farm men and women to get acquainted with their candidates and to vote only for those who are friendly toward agriculture and farmer cooperatives.

There are enemies abroad in the land who are spreading hate and distrust in the minds of businessmen and other people against farmers and their cooperatives and some of these enemies are allegedly supporting candidates unfriendly to farmers and opposing others who are friendly.

Unless farmers take more interest in elections in the future than they have in the past, we stand to lose many of the gains we have made during the past quarter century or more.

8. School-lunch program: We have supported and will continue to support the school-lunch program which has been of great benefit in improving the nutrition of school children. We call attention to the fact that the State department of education has been hampered in administering the school-lunch program because of lack of funds. For this purpose, the State of Missouri has provided only $20,000 per year which amounts to only eight-tenths of a cent for each Federal dollar handled. Only 1,404 schools out of 4,928 have been taking advantage of the program. More schools should participate, but this will be impossible unless more money is provided for administering the program. Therefore, we recommend that the next general assembly give consideration to this problem which means so much to the school children of our State.

9. Governmental farm agencies: A number of agencies have been provided for the aid and assistance of agriculture by our Federal Government. These agencies include the Agricultural Extension Service, the Rural Electrification Administration, the Soil Conservation Service, the Farmers Home Administration, the Production and Marketing Administration, and the Farm Credit Administration. The State of Missouri has established and maintains the State Department of Agriculture.

All of these agricultural farm agencies are serving the Missouri farmers ably, and owing to the growing complexity and enormity of the problems which face agriculture, these agencies will be needed by Missouri farmers even more in the days that lie ahead than in the past.

The Missouri Farmers Association takes this occasion to express its appreciation for the good and fine services being performed by these farm agencies.

10. Approval of CROP: The Christian Rural Overseas Program, otherwise known as CROP, is a relief organization sponsored by Church World Service, Catholic Rural Life, and Lutheran World Relief. It is designed especially for rural people and its purpose is to bring relief through the churches to poverty-stricken people throughout the world. The MFA has cooperated with this organization since it was organized 3 years ago, and urges that farm people in our State support this worth-while cause.

11. The WPFA and JFA: Farming is a family enterprise. It is natural and desirable, therefore, that the entire family should be interested in the Missouri Farmers Association, and that farm women and children should also have their organizations. The Women's Progressive Farmers Association, as well as the Junior Farmers Association, has contributed much to farm-club meetings and farm women and children can exert a tremendous influence upon the Missouri Farmers Association in the years ahead. MFA members should encourage these two splendid organizations.

12. The University of Missouri and others: We hereby express our deep appreciation to the University of Missouri and its personnel, the city of Columbia and all others whose wholehearted cooperation and hospitality have helped to make this convention a success.

13. Officers and employees: We hereby express our thanks and appreciation to the officers and employees of our association and its affiliated agencies for their services and efforts performed over and beyond that called for in regular performance of their duties.

14. Reaffirmation: We reaffirm the policies expressed in resolutions adopted by previous conventions that are now in effect, except insofar as they have been modified or supplemented by the resolutions adopted at this annual convention.

What Are Our Soldiers Fighting for in Korea?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, seeking an answer to the question, What are the boys in Korea fighting for? the Saturday Evening Post of September 2 comes up with the following editorial:

OUR AIM IN KOREA HAS TO BE NOT TO GET LICKED LATER ON

Columnist Marquis Childs was disturbed recently by reports from the Korean front that American soldiers didn't know what they were fighting for. He added that a Committee on Religion and Welfare in the Armed Services had been appointed by President Truman and had made a report on morale building to Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson, but nothing was done about it. Mr. Childs, who appears to think that the Committee on Religion and Welfare in the Armed Services knows what the boys in Korea are fighting for, urges that the committee come clean and tell them.

This sounds simple, but there are easier assignments than explaining to a young man of 19 why he is expected to slog around in Korea and perhaps be killed. Were the dangers not so imminent, an angry man might be tempted to trace the causes of the crisis back a few years, and preface his "indoctrination" thus:

"At Casablanca on January 24, 1943, Franklin D. Roosevelt announced that our aim in fighting the Germans and Japanese was 'unconditional surrender.' So the Germans and Japanese fought to the last gasp and we were forced to destroy their military and economic power completely. As a result, the two most powerful forces opposed to Russian expansion have been eliminated, and, once again in 10 years, braver and wiser men must repair the damage done by their fatuous predecessors."

An equally despairing note could be struck in this one:

"When the victory over fascism and militarism was almost won—that is to say, in February 1945—a group of American statesmen, including President Roosevelt and Alger Hiss, journeyed to Yalta in the Crimea to settle a few matters with our great democratic ally, Josef Stalin. At that time, Mr. Stalin was so democratic that it was felt that the defeat of undemocratic Japan would not be complete unless Russia entered the war. To persuade Stalin to take this step, which he had already agreed to take at a Moscow conference a year earlier, we gave Russia about the same rights and privileges in Manchuria which the Japanese were not democratic enough to exercise. Later, when Stalin decided to stop being democratic and to become a 'menace to free peoples everywhere,' he set up arsenals in Mukden, which is in Manchuria. The tanks used by the North Koreans come from there."

Then why are Americans fighting an unequal battle in Korea? The only answer now is that Korea isn't a war, but a battle in a larger war. Perhaps it's only a feint to screen a Red attack somewhere else. Whatever it is, the issue is the same: survival—not merely of something intangible like a way of life, but of individual people in every free nation, including ours.

We cannot defeat Communist aggression by wringing our hands over the imbecility of certain State Department functionaries, although their colossal effrontery in clinging to their jobs makes a study in abnormal psychology. There are occasions when the only immediate war aim is not to get licked. We'll need something better if our cause is to appeal to the world's millions. But we can meet the challenge of world communism only by throwing it back. That is the onerous and tragic assignment of this generation.

Note the conclusion. At the moment, they are fighting "not to get licked."

But the Post is not satisfied with that answer, and adds:

We'll need something better if our cause is to appeal to the world's millions. But we can meet the challenge of world communism only by throwing it back. That is the onerous and tragic assignment of this generation.

At least half of the world's millions do not subscribe to our form of government, to our ways.

Are they, the world's millions, demanding that we throw back communism by an aggressive war against them?

Are our people demanding that we pick up this "onerous and tragic assignment" of fighting wherever on earth a Communist may rear his head?

And let me ask the Saturday Evening Post, can we fulfill that assignment without losing our individual freedom, the security of the Republic?

Will the Saturday Evening Post please answer this very practical question?

Aren't You Ashamed?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I think the Members of the House will be interested in reading a rather timely editorial that recently appeared in the Wichita Eagle, Wichita, Kans. It is entitled "Aren't You Ashamed?" I think it contains a considerable amount of food for thought. The editorial follows:

AREN'T YOU ASHAMED?

Spokesmen for the administration are busy these days explaining why the Nation was unprepared in a military way when the trouble started in Korea. On the radio, in the press, and from the public platform they are placing the blame for this unhappy situation. Accepting no responsibility themselves, they say the American people are wholly to blame for the Nation's lack of preparedness. This may come as a bit of surprise to the average citizen, who had thought such matters were in the hands of his Government.

These apologists say the people are to blame for the fact that only $1 out of seven of defense appropriations was spent for equipment since VJ-day. The rest went for "housekeeping," for Government payrolls, bureaus, and commissions, which meant votes for the administration rather than national security. You put hundreds of ships in mothballs, instead of keeping them in serviceable condition. You stopped construction of a huge aircraft carrier, tore down an Army camp in Alaska that had cost $16,000,000,000, ordered it shipped to Seattle, and then had the boats turn around and take it back to its original site.

You fired a great admiral for having the courage to warn the administration what was going to happen. You forced Government stenographers to get along with only three typewriters each. You spent $200,000,000 for potatoes, $258,000,000 for tobacco for starving Europeans, and a paltry $56,000,000,000 for dams and ditches in behalf of votes for the do-gooders. These are only a few of the things the people did to keep the patriots in Washington from providing military preparedness. Aren't you ashamed?

Answer Phone Service a Big Help to Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 17, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Daily News of August 18, 1950:

ANSWER PHONE SERVICE A BIG HELP TO DOCTORS

(By Vincent Adams)

Marching along with medicine and becoming as important as the stethoscope to the physician is the Brooklyn Telephone Answering Service operated by Samuel S. Schiller.

Last year this service, which has approximately 2,500 clients, handled over 2,000,000 telephone messages at its headquarters, 66 Willoughby Street. More than 1,500,000 calls were for the medical profession, with pediatricians getting the bulk of the business.

Several persons owe their lives to the service; doctors praise its convenience and, with war clouds gathering, it is believed that the company's forty-odd switchboards throughout Brooklyn could step into the breach should normal phone service be disrupted.

Unexpected developments in a prenatal case resulted in an SOS for the attending physician. Calls to his home, office, hospital, and a club were in vain. One operator recalled the doctor raved about a small Italian restaurant he visited twice a year to feast on spaghetti swimming in clam sauce and washed down with red wine.

Sure enough the doc was there. He sped to his patient in time to deliver a 7-pound boy.

EX-SWITCHBOARD OPERATOR

Guiding light behind the enterprise is genial Sam Schiller, 40, former Wall Street runner, truck driver, insurance clerk, salesman, and switchboard operator. This wiry, energetic lightweight looks more like a former pugilist than a successful businessman because of his broken nose, symbol of fights in the tough neighborhood of his youth.

While recovering from pneumonia he learned to operate a switchboard and landed a job in a hospital where he met his wife, Teresa. Even with their combined salaries, the Schillers found tough going. Then Sam dreamed up his idea of a physicians' phone answering service. Starting with one client and a hundred promises he opened a service in 1934 in the Bronx. This flopped. He tried again and failed. Another attempt, another fiasco.

Encouraged by his wife and daughter, Maureen, now 16, he tried again in Brooklyn in 1937. He clicked. At first he worked 19 hours a day. Today, with a large staff manning 10 branches in Flatbush, Boro Park, Bensonhurst, Crown Heights, Brownsville, Kings Highway and Coney Island, Williamsburg, Grand Army Plaza, and Midwood, he takes it easy.

The FBI, Northwest Mounted, and Scotland Yard are slow at getting their man compared with phone answering service girls tracing a physician for an emergency. When a subscriber signs up, the operators, in cooperation with the customer, compile a list of places where he may be reached. This file is kept confidential.

ALWAYS GET THEIR MAN

Whether the customer is playing golf, having a cocktail, or playing canasta at a club, these girls always get their man.

Customers find the service eliminates many headaches. The operators, because of their experience, can cut into a line when the maid is having a long conversation with her boy friend and relay any important message.

The 24-hour-a-day, 7-days-a-week service also handles chores for business offices, finance companies, oil distributors, electricians, TV and radio repair shops, dentists, and fire adjusters.

Recently when operators complained Brooklyn Telephone Answering Service was too much of a mouthful he promised to shorten it soon.

When friends chide him for haunting the office for long hours he cuts them short with: "This may seem dull and tedious to you, but to me it's something I love. The thought of being useful to someone else and possibly saving a life is the greatest thrill in the world."

REA in South Dakota

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. LOVRE. Mr. Speaker, I am highly gratified at the fine progress in rural electrification being made in South Dakota. A recent report from REA here indicates that more than 60 percent of South Dakota farms are now receiving central-station electrical service. This represents a jump of 22 percent in the past year.

During the year 13,500 farms were added to the REA system in South Dakota. Today more than 40,000 South Dakota farms are electrified as a result of the efforts of REA, private-power companies, and other distributors. There are 31,355 farms obtaining service from the 31 REA cooperatives in South Dakota.

The REA operates 25,581 miles of energized line in the State, and under loans already approved by the Rural Electrification Administration here in Washington, the total lineage will be increased to 36,088 miles to serve 58,239 of the State's more than 78,000 farms.

Mr. Speaker, I have long been vitally interested in REA and am pleased with the advances which have been made nationally and in South Dakota. In both the first and second sessions of the Congress I vigorously supported appropriations of funds for REA. I have worked with South Dakota REA groups and especially the directors of the East River Electric Power Cooperative, an organization of 21 REA cooperatives, in their efforts to expand their transmission facilities and secure additional and more dependable power for South Dakota farms.

I know that REA development will continue in South Dakota. The coming of hydroelectric power from Missouri River dams will be of great benefit in bringing lights to every farm home in the State. Every effort of REA and others interested in orderly development of our power resources must be encouraged.

Mr. Speaker, I pledge to you and to the people of South Dakota that I will continue to exert every effort to expand rural electrification through a healthy REA program.

Mr. Speaker, another matter to which I should like to call your attention is the farm problem.

Since I have been in Congress I have devoted a good deal of my time to agricultural legislation. I represent one of the greatest agricultural areas in the United States and some of the best farmers in the Nation live in my district. As their Representative in Congress, I have attempted to deal with their problems.

Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that I believe the farmer deserves full 100 percent of parity for his goods and efforts. I have waged a continuous fight since coming to Washington for this concept in farm legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that upon farm prosperity rests national prosperity. The farmer's economic condition accurately reflects the national financial picture. When the farmer is prosperous, history has shown that all segments of our economy are prosperous. When the farmer is in bad financial condition, we have depressions and bad times.

Mr. Speaker, I have attempted to deal with this problem through a farm plan which I have introduced in Congress known as H. R. 8509, which I introduced on May 15, 1950. This plan would provide full 100 percent of parity for the family-sized farmer. It would be a farmer-managed program and it would be self-financing. It further recognizes the need for on-the-farm storage of farm crops and the value of good soil conservation practices.

My plan operates on the same sound theory that any business uses in the conduct of its affairs. Surpluses on farms have always been a complexity. Consequently, we must deal with them to solve the over-all problem.

My plan proposes that the farmer select local committees and State and National boards to manage his program. Through these local boards, farmers would be assured of full 100 percent of parity on that part of their farm crops domestically consumed. Each farmer would have a quota upon which he would be assured full parity.

Surpluses would be disposed of by the National Board in exports in accordance with United States commitments abroad. Excesses would also be channeled into new chemurgic uses—a field that has hardly been explored.

My plan also provides that surpluses be used in a food-stamp program or a school-lunch program.

Mr. Speaker, by the orderly disposal of surpluses we arrive at a solution to the farm problem without wasting valuable food. Food produced from God's ground is utilized by God's people as He intended. It would not spoil and rot in caves and warehouses. It would be used.

Fees charges for the disposal of this surplus would finance the program. Thus we get away from the New Deal-Fair Deal philosophy of solving all problems by running to the Federal Treasury. The program is handled in a businesslike manner.

Mr. Speaker, my plan is one which would be managed by the farmers themselves—from the bottom up rather than from the top down as at present. The farmers would have their own program. No bureaucrats would tell them what to plant or how to run their farms.

Mr. Speaker, my plan would also protect the consumer, because prices would be stabilized at parity—which, by definition—is a price fair to both producer and consumer.

Mr. Speaker, my farm plan has made tremendous progress in Congress in its short life. It has already had a hearing by the House Agriculture Committee. The need for stability of farm prices because of the Korean war and the world emergency should be added reason for its early adoption.

Mr. Speaker, we must continue the fight for full parity and a stable farm market which I have begun in this Congress. I promise you and I promise the farmers of South Dakota that I will continue this relentless battle.

Social-Security Improvements—Ten Million More Protected; Benefits Increased 50 to 100 Percent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, although everyone's primary concern is still focused on the battlefields of Korea, and is concerned with the clarification of our completely vague foreign policy, there are, of course, other things of great consequence going forward at the Capitol which affect the lives and security of millions of Americans. Of these current events, one of the most significant was the final enactment into law on August 28 of a greatly improved social-security system.

For those of us who have been continually working toward this end, the present act is a culmination of more than 5 years of persistent effort.

And the present bill is worth waiting for. It is no mere amendment, but practically a complete rewriting of the law. Scores of beneficial changes have been made, protection has been extended to nearly 10,000,000 additional persons, and individual benefits have been increased from 50 to 100 percent.

While this law is not the ultimate answer to a completely adequate security system, and while I still favor the exploration of a true national pension system, nevertheless, the present law is generous and fair beyond our earlier expectations, and goes a very long way toward providing at least minimum security for the majority of the working people of America.

With the addition of the 10,000,000 newly insured workers, about 45,000,000 of our present working force of 64,000,000 may come under the Social Security System. And amongst those still excluded, including farmers, doctors, lawyers, engineers, accountants, and the like, there are many, if not most, who presently do not want coverage under the System.

Among those newly protected are approximately 1,000,000 regularly employed domestic servants, almost that many farm workers, and persons who are partially self-employed such as insurance salesmen, commission drivers, traveling salesmen, and industrial homeworkers.

A major injustice has been removed by covering for the first time the self-employed. Heretofore the small proprietor or contractor, for example, has made a contribution of taxes for his few employees but despite his payments, he himself was not covered. Now he may be.

Another major improvement in which I take great personal pride is the provision allowing war veterans an arbitrary wage credit of $160 per month for all the time they spent in service. It was grossly unfair to penalize the veteran who was involuntarily out of civilian employment for periods up to four years or more, and this provision under the new law, which is of direct benefit to thousands of South Jersey veterans, is the result of the adoption of my own bill, H. R. 69, which I introduced on January 3, 1947, and which I reintroduced January 13, 1949, and which has now been enacted into permanent law.

Death benefits are changed and improved as are payments to survivors. The widow of an insured worker still receives three-quarters of the primary benefit, but there is now three-quarters additional allowance for the first child, and additional benefits for additional children, so that now a widow with 3 children could get a maximum of $150 per month.

It is unfortunate that the provision contained in the original House bill for permanently or totally disabled persons was cut out by the Senate, but on the other hand, the public assistance program, which matches State funds, is greatly liberalized.

I agree that the adoption of the so-called Knowland amendment in this legislation was of debatable wisdom, but it would have been a tragic mistake to have recommitted this bill for any further corrections. Such a recommittal would have unquestionably killed the bill until next year, and as it is, it goes into immediate effect commencing with September, and payments made in early October will reflect increases granted by the present law.

A couple of examples will clearly show the increased benefits which will be immediately payable: An insured worker earning $200 a month with only 5 years coverage would formerly have been paid a retirement of but $37 per month, now the pension would be $65 per month. A retired man and wife with 30 years coverage would have formerly gotten $78 per month, and now would receive $120 per month.

HOW BENEFITS ARE INCREASED

The following table shows how retirement benefits will be increased under the new social-security law. The new figures are for workers who retire at age 65 after June 30, 1952, with at least six quarter-years of coverage after next December 31:

RETIRED SINGLE MAN
[5 years' coverage]

	Old	New
Average monthly wage:

RETIRED MAN AND WIFE
[5 years' coverage]

	Old	New
$300	63	120

The following table shows how primary benefits will increase immediately for those now retired or those who may retire before having six quarters of coverage after December 31:

Present	New	Present	New
$30	54

Firemen, policemen, school teachers, and those presently covered by pension funds in New Jersey are, in accordance with the desire expressed by the overwhelming majority of them, excluded from this national system. Most of them preferred their own local pension funds. Other municipal employees may come into the Federal plan. Local offices of the Social Security Board will provide further details.

On the whole, while of course imperfect, this is a good law, and takes a big forward step in providing reasonable minimum security for the American people.

Support UMT Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Memphis Commercial Appeal for August 20, 1950:

SUPPORT UMT BILL

Memphis Post, No. 1, of the American Legion is asking all local and civic clubs to give active support to efforts on behalf of a universal military training program. A concerted effort is being made by veterans' organizations to have such a program authorized by the Congress at this session. Such a program is regarded as being essential to national survival, is wanted by the Defense Department and should be activated as soon as the Army can spare the men and time to get at it.

The support the Legion wants from local groups and individuals is that of favorable expression by them to Senators MCKELLAR and KEFAUVER and Representative DAVIS. The Legion's suggestion is excellent, and we hope it will be adopted by all our readers regardless of where they live in the mid-South.

A UMT bill has been introduced in the Senate by Chairman TYDINGS (Democrat, Maryland), a war veteran with a very gallant record, who told the Senate the grim truth that we will never again enjoy the time to get ready for war. This Congress and this country cannot get ready for world war III. There is no such thing as getting ready. You simply get ready as best you can.

Because we have not been and are not even now ready for war even on the scale of that in Korea, American elements which were committed to action soon after the Korean War started are still in the line—denied because of lack of replacements the rest periods they should have.

We hope every reader will tell his or her Congressman that they must start building up a tremendous pool of trained manpower through universal military training, and that it must be undertaken this year and not next, when it may be altogether too late.

Tapping of Africa's Rich Resources

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED MARSHALL
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, for centuries the developing of the rich resources in Africa have been delayed largely because of the prevalence of disease. Under the ECA's technical assistance program, the United States is attempting to assist in solving the problems of health by the control of disease-carrying insects.

With the control of disease in Africa, it will open up for the world resources which will be very helpful in raising the standard of living of millions of people in the world. The application of modern science and technology to raising the standard of life of all mankind to minimum civilized levels and hence to the achievement of victory over famine, malnutrition, disease, and misery will certainly assist the world in the direction of peace.

As well as developing the social and economic life in Africa, it will also assist the economic life of many of the more developed countries. Many of these more developed countries are dependent upon the importation of many basic minerals and raw materials. In some cases the sources of these minerals and materials are becoming exhausted. It is important to the economy of these countries that new resources be found and developed to the maximum extent. It is important that we call on our American scientists to examine and make reports about these resources. It is important to our economy and national defense that we obtain information concerning these vast resources in advance in order that we may take advantage of the situation politically.

By the direction and utilization of the products in assisting the economy of the African continent, we can materially decrease the monetary assistance contributed by this country in attempting to assist in increasing world trade. In making a survey of the resources of Africa, it would seem desirable to determine particularly the possibility of the production of power, and since many of the countries of the world have made rapid strides in the development and utilization of peat, it would seem desirable to give attention to this important resource. It appears that the United States could supply men who have made a study of these problems to assist in this development. By rendering this assistance, it would not only establish friendly relationships with the people of Africa but could very easily prevent these rich resources from falling into the hands of those who might use them to our disadvantage.

At this time I also wish to call the attention of the House to the expenditure of approximately $1,000,000 allocated to promote industrialization of 340 square miles of Holland now almost entirely devoted to peat cutting. This program will mechanize this industry, thus making it possible for the utilization of these resources. It is by this type of assistance that the United States not only establishes friendly relationships but also is able to build the economy of the world by increasing living standards to promote the ways of peace.

Register and Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the text of a radio broadcast by me on the important subject, Register and Vote.

This is your Congressman, JOHN McGUIRE. I should like to talk to you about the freedom of the ballot box. Voting has been termed the sacred right of every citizen. Voting is more than that; it is a duty. Voting is one of the major foundation stones of our democracy. There is more to voting than merely going to the polls on election day. Many people, millions of people, do not and cannot vote, because they do not register. It is up to you as a thinking citizen to get your name on the registration books, and then vote next November.

When you were in school as a youngster you stood up with the rest of the kids, and took the oath of allegiance to the flag of the United States of America. Don't let that schooltime pledge end your job as a useful citizen. That pledge was to impress upon you your priceless heritage as a free citizen of the United States. Make that pledge come true by exercising your franchise—by registering and then voting in all elections.

It is the sad truth that only half of the eligible voters went to the polls in the 1948 presidential election and cast their ballots. It is also the sad truth that a much smaller percentage of eligible voters voted in 1948 than in 1896.

We have greater problems today than ever before. The survival of a free world is at stake. It is more necessary that the people express their will today than ever before in history. It is more important that the voice of democracy speak today than ever before.

It's your solemn obligation to have your say in the solutions to this and all other problems of government. Americans fought and died just a few years ago and are fighting again today to preserve that heritage of freedom, for which our forefathers fought many generations ago.

By wise decisions at home, and wise choices at the ballot box, we can elect those who represent all the voters and not just a part of the voters. We can preserve our freedom, and create a peaceful world, and a prosperous America. Government is therefore your business. All of the activities of government, national and local, affect you personally, intimately, and directly. They affect your jobs, your homes, the prices you pay, the education and the future of your children.

Inaction settles nothing, and causes trouble. Don't let George do it. Make your action in government positive and effective.

Register. And then vote. The last day you can register in Connecticut is October 21. And if you are not registered by then, you cannot vote in November.

The dates and hours for registering in the towns in the Third Congressional District are as follows:

Bethany at the town hall on the following Saturdays: September 23, October 14, and October 21, from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m.

Branford at the town hall, September 22, from 5 p. m. to 8 p. m.; October 14 from 10 a. m. to 6 p. m.; and October 21, from 10 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Cheshire at the town hall on the following Saturdays: September 23, from 9 a. m. to 12 noon; October 14 from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m.; and October 21 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

East Haven at the town hall on the following Saturdays: September 23 from 9 a. m. to 3 p. m.; October 14 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.; and October 21 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Guilford at the town hall on the following Saturdays: September 23 from 9 a. m. to 12 noon; October 14 from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m.; October 21 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Hamden at the town hall on Saturday, October 14 and October 21, from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Madison at the town hall on the following Saturdays: September 23 from 9 a. m., to 12 noon; October 14 from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m.; and October 21 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Meriden at the city hall on Saturday, October 14 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.; Friday, October 20 from 2 p. m. to 8 p. m. and Saturday, October 21, from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Milford at the town hall on Tuesday, September 26 from 5 p. m. to 8 p. m.; Saturday, October 14 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.; Wednesday, October 18, from 1 p. m. to 8 p. m.; and on Saturday, October 21, from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m

New Haven at the city hall on Saturday, October 14 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.; and Monday, October 16 through Saturday, October 21, from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

North Branford on the following Saturdays, September 23 from 2 p. m. to 5 p. m., at North Branford town hall; October 14 from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m. at Northford Community House; and October 21 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m. at North Branford town hall.

North Haven at the town hall on the following Saturdays: September 23 from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m.; October 14 from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m.; and October 21 from 9 a. m. to 8 p .m.

Orange at the town hall on Saturday, September 23 from 1 p. m. to 4 p. m.; Saturday, October 14 from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m. and Saturday, October 21, from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Wallingford at the town hall on Tuesday, September 19 from 5 p. m. to 8 p. m.; Saturday, October 14 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.; Thursday, October 19, from 7 p. m. to 9 p. m. at Yalesville town hall, and Saturday, October 21 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

West Haven at the town hall on Friday, September 22 from 5 p. m. to 8 p. m.; Saturday, October 14, from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.; Saturday, October 21 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Woodbridge at the town hall on Tuesday, September 19 from 9 a. m. to 12 noon; Saturday, October 14, from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m.; Saturday, October 21 from 9 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Members of the Armed Forces may register at their town halls any weekday.

Register and play a role in democracy's fight against totalitarianism.

The Eleventh Anniversary of the Nazi Attack on Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, today marks the eleventh anniversary of the Nazi attack on Poland, beginning World War II and its tragic train of events.

I have a communication from an American citizen friend of Polish extraction who holds that it is particularly appropriate on this day, when our boys are dying in Korea, to remind the world that forces of aggression and imperialism are threatening freedom even as they did in 1939.

My correspondent makes the following points:

1. Poland, a free and democratic Republic, a true friend of the United States, had in 1939 two valid pacts of nonaggression with Germany and Soviet Russia.

2. Poland was a member of the League of Nations and an ally of France and Great Britain.

3. Without provocation and without warning, Hitler's Germany attacked Poland on September 1, 1939, in the same fashion as the Soviet-led troops of North Korea attacked South Korea on June 25, 1950.

4. Hitler's attack on Poland was made possible by Stalin, who on August 25, 1939, approved the Soviet-German Treaty.

5. Acting in connivance with Hitler, Stalin ordered his troops to invade Poland on September 17, 1939, thus preventing Poland's armed forces from further resisting the Nazi invaders.

6. In a subsequent meeting at Moscow, Poland was divided between Nazi Germany and Stalin's Soviet Russia.

7. The pattern of aggression now stretching over an 11-year period has thus been set. Nazi Germany has been liquidated; the other partner, Stalin's Russia, has been permitted to acquire Poland and 12 other independent nations, including China.

8. Neither during the war, nor upon its completion, has the Polish Nation accepted defeat and enslavement. The Polish Army fought at the side of the United States, British, and French troops all through the war, and the Polish Nation is today as unanimously opposed to the Communist rule as it was opposed to the Nazi occupation.

I recall so well that when I returned from a trip to Europe and the Middle East in the fall of 1947 I warned my countrymen that communism was on the march, bent on destroying our way of life. I contended that we should build up our military defenses and halt the sending of war potentials to the Soviet Union. Belatedly, and after a terrific cost, we have begun to do these things.

It is my prayer that those nations associated with our own in protecting freedom and striving for world peace will soon be able to end the present conflict and, by continually focusing the spotlight on aggressors, their techniques and nefarious ends, will cause the entire world to see that peace can only be enjoyed when men are truly free. The Polish people are long-suffering, but justice must be their reward.

Legislative Record of Hon. John Davis Lodge, of Connecticut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a statement by the former Governor of Connecticut, Hon. James C. Shannon, having reference to our colleague the gentleman from the Fourth District [Mr. LODGE], Republican nominee for Governor of the great Constitution State.

Governor Shannon's statement has great credibility due to his extended experience as counsel for labor, he being an attorney of much ability and good reputation. His high evaluation of Mr. LODGE follows:

I would like to comment on some statements that have been given wide publicity in the past week or so, by certain spokesmen for labor political action organizations, about what they claim to be the record of JOHN LODGE, Republican nominee for Governor, on the basis of his votes as a Member of Congress.

I do not think that I need to discuss these statements in detail, as Congressman LODGE already has done so from Washington, where he is doing his duty as a Congressman and has refuted in every detail the statements intended to support the contention that he is not a friend of the working people.

The statements by the labor spokesmen are false, as the record proves. Not only that, but thousands of Connecticut citizens, who keep informed about what is going on in Congress, know that the statements are false, because they are familiar with Mr. LODGE's record in Congress, which coincides with progressive Republican action and with the Republican platform in recommending and approving legislation which is for the best interests of all of us.

The labor spokesmen have endorsed all of the Democratic candidates, and presumably are determined to attack all of the Republican candidates, although it is quite apparent that they speak only for themselves, and have no proxies for the votes of any other union members.

The members of organized labor in Connecticut are accustomed to doing their own thinking on political as well as on other matters. They will do so in this instance again, because Mr. LODGE has a very liberal and sensible record on labor legislation, which can be easily proven.

The same thing applies to the other statements made against Mr. LODGE, that he voted against aid to Korea, and that he voted against social security. The spokesmen who made these statements surely must have known better, for it is absolutely clear that LODGE voted for aid to Korea, not once, but twice; and he also voted for the amplification of social security, not once, but twice.

Those who utter the misstatements I have referred to are doing a disservice to all of the members of affiliated labor groups. There is no justification for a campaign of bare-faced untruths, and I am sure that labor union members themselves will be quick to resent it.

It is particularly ironical for Mr. LODGE to be thus attacked by labor mouthpieces for the Democratic candidates, because not only is his labor record as good as any candidate now seeking election, but he himself is now and for many years has been a bona fide member of the American Federation of Labor Union.

The MacArthur Episode

OF

HON. ROBERT HALE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over Station WCSH:

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, I shall talk to you this evening about the episode of the MacArthur message, because I consider it extremely important and revealing.

The facts of the situation are these. The Veterans of Foreign Wars, assembled in convention in Chicago, had on August 17 cabled their greetings to General MacArthur, together, I assume, with a complimentary expression of confidence in his leadership. The general replied to this message with a cable, in which he thought fit to give the Veterans of Foreign Wars a statement of the strategic and political considerations applicable to the defense of Formosa. The entire cable occupies approximately two columns in the New York Times. In it, the general states that he believes it in the public interest to state his views about the relationship of Formosa to our strategic potential in the Pacific.

He explains carefully the changes wrought by the last war. Before the war, our western strategic frontier lay on the littoral line of the Americas, with an exposed island salient extending out through Hawaii, Midway, and Guam to the Philippines. Now our strategic frontier embraces the entire Pacific Ocean, which the General says has become a vast moat to protect us as long as we hold it. "If we hold this line," the general says, "we may have peace; lose it, and war is inevitable. The geographic location of Formosa is such that in the hand of a power unfriendly to the United States, it constitutes an enemy salient in the very center of this defensive perimeter, 100 to 150 miles closer to the adjacent friendly segments—Okinawa and the Philippines—than any point in continental Asia." In the hands of a hostile power, Formosa could, he says, "checkmate defensive or counter-offensive operations by friendly forces based on Okinawa and the Philippines."

The last four paragraphs of this message are so significant and are expressed with such force and dignity that I feel compelled to quote them in full.

"Nothing could be more fallacious than the threadbare argument by those who advocate appeasement and defeatism in the Pacific that if we defend Formosa we alienate continental Asia.

"Those who speak thus do not understand the Orient. They do not grant that it is the pattern of the oriental psychology to respect and follow aggressive, resolute, and dynamic leadership—to quickly turn on a leadership characterized by timidity or vacillation—and they underestimate the oriental mentality. Nothing in the last 5 years has so inspired the Far East as the American determination to preserve the bulwarks of our Pacific Ocean strategic position from future encroachment, for few of its people fail accurately to appraise the safeguard such determination brings to their free institutions.

"To pursue any other course would be to turn over the fruits of our Pacific victory to a potential enemy. It would shift any future battle area 5,000 miles eastward to the coasts of the American continents, our own home coast; it would completely expose our friends in Australia and New Zealand, our friends in Indonesia, our friends in Japan, and other areas, to the lustful thrusts of those who stand for slavery against liberty, for atheism as against God.

"The decision of President Truman on June 27 lighted into flame a lamp of hope throughout Asia that was burning dimly toward extinction. It marked for the Far East the focal and turning point in this area's struggle for freedom. It swept aside in one great monumental stroke all of the hyprocrisy and the sophistry which has confused and deluded so many people distant from the actual scene."

Please note that this message contains no criticism by General MacArthur of his military superiors, and implies none. On the contrary, the closing paragraph accords the highest praise to the statesmanship of President Truman, when on June 27 the President "ordered the United States Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack upon Formosa."

Of course, I do not know what considerations induced in General MacArthur the belief that it was in the public interest for him to state the strategic considerations in the detail which he did. Whether his patience had been tried beyond endurance by having military considerations overruled in the State Department I cannot say. It is possible of course to take the position that a naval or military man should never give any public expression of his ideas about the national welfare. There was a good deal of discussion on this point a year or so ago when Admiral Denfeld gave his testimony before the Committee on Armed Forces. However, this may be, I do not hesitate to express my own opinion that an authoritative statement of the military considerations applicable to the defense of Formosa is very much in the public interest.

No statement could be more dignified and from my point of view no statement could possibly be truer than General MacArthur's. This is the first authoritative military statement that the American people have had on the whole Formosa question. Secretary Johnson said in recent testimony before a House Committee that last winter's decision not to defend Formosa was not a military decision but that it was taken in the top echelons, which means of course by President Truman and Secretary Acheson.

In ordering General MacArthur to retract the statement President Truman exercised what I presume are his undisputed rights as Commander in Chief. However, the practical effect of what the President has done seems to be most unfortunate. Last winter when the discussion first arose about the wisdom of holding Formosa the President never stated the arguments either for or against our aiding the Chinese forces on Formosa. On January 5, he simply said that we would not provide military aid or advice, and Secretary Acheson said that the decision had to do "with the fundamental integrity of the United States and with maintaining in the world the belief that when the United States takes a position it sticks to that position and does not change it by reason of transitory expediency or advantage."

The difficulty with the President's recent message is that it throws new doubt on what we actually are going to do about Formosa. We fought the war to protect the territorial integrity of China. Had we been willing to allow Japan to conquer China, there never would have been an attack on Pearl Harbor. We started at Yalta to reverse this policy of preserving the freedom and independence of China, and inaugurated the policy of allowing China to be dismembered.

In January 1950 President Truman said in effect, if the Chinese Communists can capture Formosa that is okay with us. Then in his statement to the Nation in June President Truman said: "I have ordered the United States Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa, and I have requested the Chinese Government on Formosa to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland."

Now what I want to know, what the American people want to know, what Chiang Kai-shek must want to know, and what I am sure Stalin and the Politburo want to know is whether the United States is going to save Formosa or save the face of Mr. Acheson and the leftist bloc in the State Department. If we are going to save Mr. Acheson's face, then I entertain the most genuine apprehension as to whether we are going to save the United States. Because from the moment that we reversed our policy of aggressively preserving the integrity of China, Secretary Acheson has been uniformly and egregiously wrong. As a result of this uncertainty everybody is confused, not the least Mr. Stalin, whom in this particular we ought not to be confusing. I do not see how Chiang Kai-shek and his Government can reach any conclusion other than that the Government of the United States is vacillating hopelessly in a situation which it either does not comprehend at all or comprehends only intermittently.

Furthermore, the President's new attitude leads me to wonder whether the pro-Communist group in the State Department is not back in the saddle. If it is, then the Chinese Communist Government is going to be recognized, its delegates are going to be seated in the Security Council, and all hope for using the United Nations as an instrumentality for enforcing world peace is gone.

This is a deplorable situation and only one man can clean it up. That is the President of the United States. Will he clarify the situation or will he confound it even further if indeed greater confusion be possible?

The Fifty-first National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the fifty-first national encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars have been held at Chicago, Ill., from August 27 to September 1, 1950. The delegates to this convention have all seen service on foreign soil in the defense of our country. They are truly representative American citizens, and they adopted at that convention two resolutions which I feel represent the feeling of the majority of American citizens today.

The first resolution, condemning the policies and procedures of the Department of Defense, was passed by a vote of 3,495 to 5, and the resolution deploring and condemning the present policies of our Department of State was passed by a vote of 3,497 to 3. Those resolutions follow:

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Whereas the present events in the early weeks of the Korean campaign clearly revealed that our Department of Defense was completely unprepared to enforce our foreign policy; and

Whereas hundreds and hundreds of poorly equipped and inadequately trained American boys were required to make the supreme sacrifice against a savage and well-armed foe in the mountains and on the plains of Korea; and

Whereas the Congress has appropriated billions of dollars for national defense since the close of World War II with the belief based on repeated assurance from responsible officials of the Department of Defense that our Nation would thereby have a balanced and adequate defense force to support our national policy and to be ready to cope with any emergency short of total war; and

Whereas the first test of armed strength which came in Korea revealed that in spite of repeated assurances by responsible officials of the Department of Defense and the boast that if we were attacked at 4 we would strike back at 5, we did not have adequate armed forces to stop and hurl back the Communist forces of North Korea: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the fifty-first encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States in convention assembled in Chicago, Ill., August 27 to September 1, 1950, That the encampment go on record as condemning these disastrous and capricious procedures of the Department of Defense which have brought our Nation's defenses to their present shameful and inadequate condition in the face of the present threat of Communist world-wide aggression and call upon the President of the United States to seek out and appoint new and competent leadership in the Department of Defense.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Whereas the present policy of our State Department has failed to attain the objectives for which the Veterans of World War I and II fought and won to secure permanent peace; and

Whereas the great majority of the employees of the Department of State are honest, patriotic, and hard working, it seems, however, for some time past, the Department has been infiltrated with some persons whose leaning appears to be wholly totalitarian, or who lack necessary ability and good old-fashioned American common sense; and

Whereas in 1939 Stalin had behind the iron curtain 180,000,000 persons and now by reason of the vascillating and appeasing policy pursued by the Department of State, there are 300,000,000 persons back of the iron curtain, and unless a firm and determined policy is adopted by the State Department many millions more will be brought under Communist domination; and

Whereas it appears that our intelligence operation in the Department of State today has been weak and ineffective: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the fifty-first annual encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we deplore the present policy of our Department of State which is endangering the very existence of our beloved country; and be it further

Resolved, That those persons in the employment of our State Department whose misfeasance and nonfeasance has resulted in the failure of diplomatic relations be immediately discharged from Government service and be it further resolved that our foreign intelligence be stressed so that we may be second to none in the world in that field; and be it further

Resolved, That those persons in our State Department whose loyalty to American ideals is questionable shall be forthwith dismissed from the service and the President of the United States is respectfully petitioned to seek out and appoint new patriotic and able persons in the Department of State; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States and to the presiding officials of the two Houses of Congress, and to the Secretary of State.

A Defendant Who Won't Defend

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, the people in my district are aroused and angered at what appears to be collusion between the Housing Expediter and certain labor organizations in the matter of decontrol of rents in the city of Los Angeles.

Based upon the facts in my possession, I ask a congressional investigation of the Housing Expediter's conduct in this case, and if the facts are borne out, I demand his removal from office upon the grounds of a deliberate attempt to retard or stop the legal decontrol of the city of Los Angeles as provided for by the Congress of the United States.

Wednesday afternoon, August 30, at a special court of appeals session to hear arguments to restrain the Housing Expediter from doing what this Congress has directed him to do, the Housing Expediter's attorney refused to defend himself. Instead, he in effect sided with a CIO attorney against the city of Los Angeles and the position the city has taken in the matter of local rent decontrol.

Earlier in the week a United States district court judge threw out the case brought by the unions seeking to restrain the Expediter from decontrolling Los Angeles. The city's charges that the court did not have jurisdiction and that the case was brought prematurely before the Expediter had acted on the city's resolution, was sustained by the ruling.

The Los Angeles City Council published notice of public hearing 10 days before the hearing was held July 28 in City Hall. The council adopted the necessary resolution after hearing, as Congress prescribed, by a 10 to 4 vote. One councilman was absent. The resolution, under the city charter, properly certified, was duly forwarded to the Housing Expediter who received it here in Washington August 2. Thus the city fully complied with the law. Then followed an unexplained delay of 10 days. During this time the Expediter made no public statement, to the best of my knowledge. He did nothing although the resolution was in his possession all of that time.

Then for some unknown reason on August 14 Mr. Woods appeared uninvited before the City Council of Los Angeles. He urged the council to reconsider its decontrol action and instead give the property owners a 15 percent rent hike, but keep controls on until December 31. This is known as the Chicago formula. The council voted 10 to 5 against such a proposal. One councilman asked Woods:

Who invited you here? We didn't. We're curious to know.

Woods evaded the question. The mayor issued a statement that he had not asked Woods to come to Los Angeles. I would like to know who did invite him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are affidavits in connection with the case heard in district court to prove that the Housing Expediter's Office supplied the unions with the names of the tenants whose names appear as part of the court action to restrain Woods from issuing the decontrol order.

I should like to quote from an affidavit of one Louis L. Drouet which was filed August 28 in connection with the case heard here in district court:

On the night of August 24, 1950, I attended a meeting held at 5164 Santa Monica Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif., at which Mr. Leon Clifton, public relations counsel for the A. F. of L. Clerks' Union 770, stated that the day that Tighe Woods was in town he had dinner with him after he had spoken in the council chambers and Tighe Woods saw eye to eye with him and would program with him. Mr. Clifton said that their delaying tactics and injunctions have only started, that if this judge failed to issue a restraining order they were going to file a writ of supersideo, and that was a beauty. It would really delay it for a long time, and these delays were always saving the tenants money and that they would keep this thing going and use all the delays possible in the law. At least they may be able to delay it until the recall went through and until a State-wide election was held, and by all means to vote for Jimmy Roosevelt and HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS.

Mr. Speaker, this deliberate attempt by the Housing Expediter to bypass the rent laws approved by this Congress is sufficient evidence to demand his removal from office.

Woods admitted to the council that its procedure was legal and in order. He said he would return to Washington and immediately issue the decontrol order. He also hinted that he knew an injunction was in process. I ask, why did he go to Los Angeles in the first place?

Mr. Speaker, it is significant, to further prove collusion between the Expediter and union officials, that when the Expediter appeared before the city council on August 14 he stated for the first time publicly, to the best of my knowledge, that he would decontrol Los Angeles rents upon his return to Washington. It was the first public acknowledgment that the council's resolution was in order. It is not a mere coincidence that the basis of the complaint for the injunction was predicated upon Woods' threatened intention of decontrolling rents in the city of Los Angeles. The complaint, according to court records was executed August 10, 4 days prior to the time that Woods made his first public statement concerning decontrol of Los Angeles rents.

To show further collusion, Mr. Drouet also stated that he attended another meeting August 16 at 2200 West Seventh Street, Los Angeles, Calif., at which Mr. Maxwell Miller was in charge. Mr. Miller stated at this meeting that the hall was donated free. The hall is known as Farber's Park View Manor. Mr. Farber was investigated, Mr. Drouet stated, and found that he advertised daily in the Daily People's World, a Communist-controlled paper, which for the past year had been sponsoring and leading the fight to keep control on real property.

I quote again from Mr. Drouet's statement:

Mr. Maxwell Miller informed the gathering and stated he wanted no money from the people present, that they had $10,000 to recall Councilmen Ed Davenport and Don Allen, but he needs lots of affidavits of many hardship cases to present in Washington, D. C. He stated Tighe Woods was served twice with a summons, once in Washington, D. C., and once in Los Angeles. That Woods had to be served in his place of residence. That they invited Tighe Woods to Los Angeles; that they had 100 attorneys to help all tenants with eviction notices, that the A. F. of L. and CIO attorneys would help them also back in Washington; that the purpose of this fight in Los Angeles was of major importance because if controls were removed in Los Angeles the rest of the large cities would follow suit and a precedent would be established—that as a result of having placed Tighe Woods under the restraining order which had been served on him they were delaying the rent increases and saving the tenants $2,000,000 per month; that this method of delay would enable them to also circulate a referendum petition so they could force an election in the city of Los Angeles. He introduced Leo Goodman, CIO man sent here by Walter Reuther to aid in the fight to continue rent controls. He spoke of the good Congressman and the bad and urged all present to vote for HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS for United States Senator and for Jimmy Roosevelt for governor. After the meeting I stated to Maxwell Miller that he was using Communist-front tactics to delay the decontrol of rents and get crowds out on the pretense of being friends of the tenants but in reality he was campaigning for Jimmy Roosevelt and HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS, the answer from Mr. Maxwell Miller being just a sneer.

Wood's general counsel, Mr. Dupree, stated in a sworn deposition that he knew of the injunction action on the morning of the day that it was filed. Woods appeared before the city council at 10 a. m., August 14, Pacific daylight saving time. That would be 1 p. m., Washington time. In other words, when Woods appeared before the city council, he did so in bad faith; because both he and his attorney knew of the existence of the complaint which had been signed on August 10. They were deliberately stalling and interfering with the law they swore to uphold.

When union attorneys met in the judge's chambers here in Washington August 14 about 4:30 p. m., the Expediter's attorney was on hand—as defendant—to expedite service of notice upon himself.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the attorney for the Expediter did not object to the motion for the restraining order, did not and has not up to this moment filed one single paper or offered one objection on behalf of the Government of the United States. This is in spite of the fact that he is charged with administering the rent laws on behalf of the Government.

Hence we have, for the first time in my memory or knowledge, an administrator of a Federal agency as defendant in a law suit restraining him from carrying out his duties, deliberately refusing to defend the laws which this Congress in its wisdom has seen fit to pass. Moreover, conspiring, according to the evidence, to delay the whole lawful decontrol of rents in the city of Los Angeles.

Such malfeasance of office warrants more than a casual scolding. This frivolous handling of a congressional mandate, which I am constrained to believe borders on collusion between the Expediter and others, is sufficient to demand an investigation by this Congress. If such investigation bears out the facts as I know them, I demand his removal from office.

Address by Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania, at Adams County, Pa., Sesquicentennial Celebration

HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from an address delivered by me at the crowning of the Adams County sesquicentennial queen at Gettysburg, Pa., on August 30, 1950.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I sincerely and deeply appreciate the privilege of participating in these notable exercises.

It is an honor to join the fine citizens of Adams County in this sesquicentennial celebration.

Anniversaries such as this are important milestones in the progress and development of our State and Nation.

It is appropriate on such occasions to review the accomplishments of the past and to plan for greater achievement in the future.

In the pages of history may be found the real meaning of Americanism. The struggle and sacrifice which have built American greatness point the way to patriotic duty and the course by which we may contribute to the greater glory of our flag and our Republic.

It is always an inspiration to return to Gettysburg. Here American valor reached its highest peak in the fiery crucible of war. Here is the shrine of the Union, sacred to every American whose heart is imbued with love of country and devotion to its ideals.

Today our Nation stands again at the crossroads of history. We are facing a crisis just as grave as that decisive moment at the high-water mark of the rebellion when the fate of the Union hung in the balance here at Gettysburg.

Today we are united, fighting to preserve for our land and for the world that concept of freedom which we hold to be God's greatest gift to mankind.

The enemy we fight has long plotted and planned for our destruction. His treacherous aggression in Korea is but the opening gun in a campaign to dominate and enslave the world.

American patriotism is the only power in the world that can save the free nations from being crushed under a cruel and ruthless dictatorship which denies God and would rob humanity of all freedom.

Make no mistake about it; we are facing a war for survival.

The critical situation before us calls for total and complete effort on the part of every citizen, every man and woman who can help build the strength and power of our fighting forces and our home front.

To advance our country's cause we must put aside all selfishness, all thought of gaining advantage through the war, all demands for higher profits or higher wages.

It would be dangerous folly to underestimate the size of the job that we will be called upon to do. It would be equally dangerous to think that we can have business as usual and pleasure as usual.

We must realize that the years ahead will call upon us for sacrifice—and we must be prepared in the patriotic spirit of the Nation's heroes who rest eternally on the Gettysburg battlefield.

As a soldier I have given a great deal of thought to national defense and I am convinced that we should have a system of universal military service. That is the only way we can provide trained manpower ready for action.

Under the American system every able-bodied man should be willing to bear arms in our Nation's defense. That is a fundamental obligation of citizenship in a free country.

There should be harmonious and effective cooperation between labor, agriculture, and industry, combining their full productive capacity for the war effort.

We must determine to bear the cost of war, as far as possible, on a pay-as-you-go basis. Otherwise our individual freedom may be lost under a crushing burden of debt and inflation even after we win the war.

As I said before, higher wages and increased profits should be forgotten when the future of our country is at stake.

And finally we should all work for a great moral and spiritual awakening, mobilizing all the right-thinking, church-going people of every faith into battalions of righteousness for God and country.

We must make it clear to all the world that we fight only that men shall be free.

We seek no conquest or territorial gains.

Our objective is peace and freedom to illuminate the whole world with the eternal light of Gettysburg's Peace Memorial.

Hon. Carl Hayden, of Arizona

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Out To Repair Fences," written by Doris Fleeson in today's Washington Evening Star, with reference to our colleague the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. I have always been a devoted follower of Doris Fleeson. I did not know why; but since she wrote this article with reference to the Senator from Arizona I know why.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUT TO REPAIR FENCES—HAYDEN, SENATE'S "GENERAL MANAGER," ADMITS HAVING PRIMARY TROUBLES

(By Doris Fleeson)

Senators who had watched five of their colleagues bite the dust in the primaries realized it was a hard year for incumbents, but they really panicked this week.

Senator CARL HAYDEN, Democrat, of Arizona, apologized for not being able to stand by on various problems, but said rather diffidently that he was having primary troubles and would have to go home. Senators concede that it's a free country and anybody can run for office who wants to. But their story is that if it can happen to Carl, it can happen to anyone.

Senator HAYDEN is genuinely unique. He is a Senator loved for his personal qualities who has by hard work attained great power and influence, but he has a real passion for anonymity. Only insiders know how effective he is in the work of the Senate.

GENERAL MANAGER

As chairman of Rules, Senator HAYDEN is in a sense the Senate's general manager, with power over the conduct of its business and its physical property. He parcels out the offices, for example, including those prized cubbyholes in the Capitol, so convenient to the Senate floor, so inaccessible to the importunate constituent.

It is hard to believe that anyone with that power can be popular, but Senator HAYDEN, by reason of his consideration and unselfishness, is. A notable example:

When the Republicans expected to take over the Government in 1948, the then Rules chairman, Senator Brooks of Illinois, spent $60,000 fixing up a handsome hideaway in the center of the Capitol, complete with recreational facilities. When the Republicans and Senator Brooks were defeated, Senator HAYDEN fell heir to it.

He promptly put in a call to Senator LUCAS, of Illinois. "I have a present for you," he said. "It's the best office in the Capitol. You're majority leader, and besides it's poetic justice." The delighted Senator LUCAS promptly held open house amid his splendors and told the tale.

RENOWNED FOR WORD

But it is as ranking Democrat on Appropriations, the most powerful committee of all, that Senator HAYDEN does the day-in-day-out work for which he is renowned. Chairman MCKELLAR, for reasons of age and health, can do little, and Senator HAYDEN is the steersman. Appropriations is also the committee which contains the most rampant Republican minority—WHERRY, BRIDGES, FERGUSON, et al.—attempting to sway events through the power of the purse. It is as definitely not a place for softies, which both parties bear in mind when assigning members to it.

Senator HAYDEN'S major triumph this year was to produce an Interior Department appropriation bill with which Secretary Chapman not only found no fault but added: "If I can't do a good job next year with that bill, I'm plain incompetent." The bill gave Interior—the most important Department of all to Arizona—what it asked, free of the hampering restrictions with which it has often had to contend. Even public power projects were spared.

The defensive excuse of one Republican: "Carl always gets his stuff on the floor, anyway, and I'm tired of fighting him."

Senator HAYDEN is not a New Dealer; in fact, he is definitely right of center and the southerners count him a civil-rights ally. Nobody ever seems to be angry at him, though.

Communists in Government Employment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OWEN BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Red Herring Gets Bigger by the Day," published in the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of August 30, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RED HERRING GETS BIGGER BY THE DAY

Among the public statements that he now wishes he had never made, "red herring" will probably haunt Mr. Truman the longest. The latest to be added to the list of self-confessed or convicted Communists is Attorney Lee Pressman. Mr. Pressman now acknowledges that he was a member of the Communist Party while he was an employee of the New Deal. He also names as fellow members John Abt, formerly a lawyer in the Agricultural Administration; Nathan Witt, an official of the National Labor Relations Board; and Charles Kramer, an employee of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Pressman, a lawyer who represented several Federal agencies and who later became general counsel of the CIO, admits to membership in the Communist Party in 1935. He quit the CIO when that organization opposed the Progressive candidacy of Henry A. Wallace for the Presidency. And, like Mr. Wallace, he too has now broken with the Progressives because of the Korean aggression.

Thus, with each passing day it becomes clearer that the charges of Communist infiltration of the New Deal had basis in fact. To dismiss the whole thing now as a red herring would be an affront to millions of patriotic Americans who are appalled by these revelations. How many more Communists in Government there were, and how many are still there, will probably never be known. Those who are most valuable to the party are never registered or referred to by name. It is a skulking, hole-in-the-corner kind of business at best, and the conspirators are hard to pin down.

And these were tactics that paid off. A single Hiss at Yalta was worth more to the Kremlin than a membership increase of thousands. To have key men in the Agriculture Department, with a National Labor Relations Board, and in the State Department must have given the Kremlin the feeling of holding four aces in its dealings with this country.

To these misguided subversives working in the higher echelons of Government must also be added the motley crew of traitors who are gradually being rounded up by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Nine have been netted in recent weeks and there will probably be more. In his red-herring charges, Mr. Truman was just as wrong as he was in calling the turn of deflation. He was as wrong as he was in seeing "best prospects for peace" just prior to the Korean outbreak. In fact Mr. Truman has been so consistently wrong, that it is a tribute to the innate durability of the country that we are still functioning.

The Grange Program for Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Grange Presents an Action Program for Defense," written by Albert S. Goss, master of the National Grange, for the editorial page of the September 1950 issue of the National Grange Monthly.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GRANGE PRESENTS AN ACTION PROGRAM FOR DEFENSE

(By Albert S. Goss)

This defense program embodies the basic philosophy of the National Grange as set forth in the three Grange guideposts, which are equally sound in war or peace:

1. All prosperity springs from the production of wealth; or anything which retards the production of wealth is unsound.

2. The compensation of each should be based on what he contributes to the general welfare.

3. The prime purpose of government is to protect its citizens from aggression—both physical and economic.

Make no mistake—we are at war. The Korean front is but one phase of a conflict that has been in the making for over 100 years. Communism, with its atheism and cruel materialism, has constantly maintained that it could not live in the same world with capitalism, democracy, and Christianity; that one or the other had to survive; and that its destiny lay in promoting revolution so that communism might rule the world.

Through all the ups and downs from the day of Karl Marx to the present moment, destruction and world conquest have been the goal toward which every move has been directed. Living underground most of its life, it has constantly relied upon intrigue, violence, and destruction to gain its ends. World revolution has been its constant aim, openly preached. The only question has been when

The tragic agreement at Yalta, followed by intensified subversive infiltration on Russia's part, and by a coddling policy on ours, has brought about a great change in five short years. Then we were the most powerful and influential nation on earth, leading the way to what the world believed would be lasting peace. Today Russia is holding the world in fear of war. She has swept over nearly half of Europe and Asia, and through her policies of infiltration has so weakened much of the uncontrolled area as to make it an easy potential victim of armed force.

As with all aggressors, her purpose has been to go just as far as possible without committing any single act serious enough to arouse nations to war. With the exception of Greece, where our aid caused her to withdraw, her aggression has been largely confined to subversive activities and capturing control of governments through revolution. Statements accredited to responsible officials in Washington that Formosa and Korea would not be defended because they were not necessary to our defense plans, probably prompted the Korean attack. Here for the first time was an attack by a communistic government upon a free nation.

Suddenly it has become unmistakably clear that if nations are to be permitted to live in freedom, Russia's course of world aggression must be stopped. We do not know what her next step will be. If she wins in Korea, it may be the first of many more such attacks throughout the world. If she sees she is about to lose, she may launch other attacks to divide our efforts. She may be testing out to see if the time has come to tackle the world, now weakened by subversive infiltration. In any event the days for hoping that world peace will prevail without the backing of armed might are over. We must be prepared for the worst while working harder than before to keep peace. The peace of the world depends on America's strength—both military and economic strength.

The biggest mistake we can make is to fail to recognize that this is a world war in every sense. Even if the shooting should be confined to Korea, the struggle will go on, both on the ideological and the economic fronts. Witness what communism has done to the church and the Christian leaders of Europe. Witness her flouting the sanctity of treaties and agreements. Witness the horrors of the police state, the slavery and brutality going on behind the iron curtain. Witness Russia's blocking all the United Nations' peace proposals, and her building what is probably the most powerful military machine in history. Make no mistake; we are at war on the military front, the economic front, and the spiritual front, and we must be fully prepared on all three.

1. We must rebuild our power to resist aggression. We must prepare to meet force with even greater force, working in cooperation with the United Nations. We must arm ourselves and help our allies. Our military technicians are unsurpassed and Congress should see that ample funds are available to make full use of their knowledge and skill to assure the best possible protection for our men and our Nation.

2. We need a sound tax system designed to meet the expense of government and war activities as we go, as far as practicable. We have already expanded our credit to a dangerous position. This will require heavier taxes and all should pay their share, meaning personal sacrifice and tightened living standards for all. We must take all profiteering out of war.

3. All unnecessary Government expenditures should be promptly curtailed. We need a real austerity program in Government employment and in the expansion of social services.

4. Critical materials should be allocated. This should be carried out on a voluntary basis as far as possible in cooperation with the National Security Resources Board, but if voluntary allocations fail, compulsory allocations should be used.

5. One of our gravest dangers lies in the field of inflation. This must be attacked at its source by keeping the supply of goods and money in proper relation. We may expect increased purchasing power because of more jobs, complicated by fewer goods to purchase, because of larger diversion to war purposes. Surplus purchasing power should be drained off by (a) increased taxes, (b) curtailed credit for consumer goods, and (c) a campaign for individual purchase of Government bonds. Defense production should be stepped up through more generous credit for production purposes, with purchase or price guarantics, where necessary.

6 Rationing should be used if consumer goods become scarce, to assure that each gets an equitable share. Rationing should not be employed unless voluntary efforts fail. Campaigns against hoarding are our best assurance against rationing.

7. If profiteering occurs, price controls may be necessary. General price controls should not be attempted without rationing unless limited to cases of distinct profiteering. Without rationing, price ceilings serve to increase the purchasing pressure on short supplies, frequently curtail production, and inevitably lead to evasion. If price controls are adopted, prices must be set at levels which will encourage ample production.

8. If price controls are adopted as an anti-inflationary device, control should go straight across the board including wages, and profits so that all may be treated alike. We should not attempt rationing or price control unless we mean business and intend to enforce the law.

The first five steps should be taken at once and ample authority given to bring the other steps into play as needed.

Our future policy should be determined by the Congress itself. It is recognized that in time of emergency, it is often necessary to give the President power to act promptly in matters which will not wait on the slow processes of congressional deliberation. This should not mean the abdication of its constitutional authority by the Congress. It is still our policy- and law-making body, directly representing the people, and should constantly keep control to make sure that its will is carried out. Where special powers are given to the President to act in order to avoid delay, Congress can and should maintain its Constitutional responsibility in two ways. First, every special transfer of power should be individually revokable by the Congress by a simple majority vote of each House. Second, the Congress and the President should work in the closest of harmony on all things. Such close cooperation could be materially advanced by providing a bipartisan liaison committee chosen without regard to seniority for frequent contact with the President. Such a committee could be of inestimable help to the President with the tremendous responsibilities on his shoulders when so many grave decisions have to be made.

Similarly, all matters involving our international relations should be worked out in the closest cooperation with the Congress in order that no commitments may be made which might run counter to the thinking of these representatives of the people. Let us not abandon our belief in Democracy either under stress of war or in the formulation of peace policies. Let us rather strengthen it and develop practical ways of making full use of it so that we can combine the guidance of the representatives of the people with the quick decisiveness of the Executive on detailed operations so frequently necessary.

Finally, we are enjoying the highest living standards and the greatest prosperity of any nation in history. This is primarily due to the basic Christian philosophy of the sacredness of human life, and of integrity and fair dealings with our fellow men. Here is the crux of the age-old struggle. It not only imposes on us the responsibility for protecting all that we believe in but also of making sure that we are living up to the truest concepts of our beliefs.

Whatever the outcome, the time has come to tackle the problem ahead with all our strength. The more we accomplish through voluntary democratic efforts, the fewer controls we will need. There is much for Granges to do. In the uncertain days ahead there will be more, both in the field of individual effort and concerted action. Our twice-a-month meetings provide a wonderful opportunity for service. Let us keep strong and fully prepared to live up to the responsibilities which are ours.

Transoceanic Television

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Our Next Frontier—Transoceanic TV," written by David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corp. of America and brigadier general, Army of the United States, Active Reserves.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR NEXT FRONTIER—TRANSOCEANIC TV

(By David Sarnoff)

Television promises today to open up new horizons far beyond anything yet seen in this new and growing means of communication.

It is within the range of possibility now that events across the seas will one day be visible at the moment they happen to anyone within reach of a television set.

We already know the scientific principles for linking the hemispheres by television. When they are worked out and become a practical reality, we shall be able to see, as well as hear, around the world.

This development will prove to be one of the most revolutionary advances that science has ever offered mankind.

It will make it possible, for example, for the violent reality of distant battlefields to be experienced by people on the home front. Transoceanic TV, too, will make such happenings as international meetings, sports events, and human everyday living in distant places almost a first-hand experience to audiences in all parts of the world.

The prospect promises more for real understanding among all peoples, for making human brotherhood a reality, than perhaps anything since the invention of the printing press.

Aviation is hailed today as one of the most effective means of unifying the world. Thousands of people fly to and from Europe every week in luxurious comfort across an ocean that it used to take days and weeks to cross. The distance between the world's continents has come to be measured, not in the thousands of miles, but in the few fleeting hours it takes to cover the distance.

Yet, great as its contribution is, aviation still caters to a minor fraction of the population, while television, just a few years old, is already a mass means of communication. Over 6,000,000 television receivers have a place in American homes today. Within 2 or 3 years, maybe over 20,000,000 sets will be in use, with a potential audience of 80,000,000. The growth of the television industry exceeds the strides made by any other new industry in a comparable period of time.

The United States, of course, has seen a more intensive development of radio than any other country. But even allowing for other nations trailing us in television, as in radio, the potentialities of the new means of communication on an international scale excite the imagination.

TV CAN SELL DEMOCRACY OVERSEAS

Think, for instance, of the way television, extended across the seas, could sell democracy abroad. In theory, democracy begs for the ear. In action, it challenges the eye. To be believed, the American way of life must be seen as well as heard. Radio can speak about the problems democracy tackles. Television can show the answers.

This means a tremendous opportunity to follow up the great work already being done by the Voice of America in its broadcasts overseas. That service can be expanded to become the voice and vision of America.

Senator KARL E. MUNDT, in fact, recently urged congressional action for a vision of America project. He proposed that we help establish a television network in a number of countries in Europe and Asia. The project, he said, would not require the use of individual TV receiving sets but would call for community receivers like those now available and in use here.

A special advantage of such a television network system would be that it could not be easily jammed from remote areas as radio broadcasts are today by Soviet stations.

The range of television signals is at present limited. Therefore a special system would be required for sending television programs across the seas. Several methods for meeting this problem already are known. One is to equip transoceanic planes with microwave radio-relay apparatus which could operate automatically. This would pass the television signal along from one plane to another until it reached its destination. This system might be called a "radio airlift."

Another method would be to provide a coaxial cable across the ocean. Such radio-air lifts or coaxial cables could carry not only television programs but many ordinary telephone conversations, "ultrafax" or high-speed telegraph communications, and similar services. All these could be transmitted simultaneously.

While such services are not yet in existence, I have no doubt about their ultimate practicability.

International television thus is no idle dream. It is nearer than many realize. When Nation-wide radio broadcasting began, it was only 5 years before listeners overseas were picking up the broadcasts. Before long, regular international broadcasts had become an established fact. We may expect that international television will follow much the same pattern of progress.

The reward for such progress will be the greatest opportunity ever given us for creating close ties of understanding among the peoples of the world and for helping to preserve peace.

Franco's Spain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio broadcast delivered by Glen Stadler over radio station KERG, Eugene, Oreg., on Friday, December 2, 1949.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This evening I'm going to talk about one of my pet international peeves. Well, actually, it's much more than that. It's something to which I'm unalterably opposed: Totalitarian dictatorship. In this specific case, the totalitarian dictatorship of General Franco, of Madrid.

However, keeping in mind the state of our bipolarized world of power, I am going to have to point out some political realities involving Franco and Tito.

I have been rather intimately acquainted with Franco's Spain, having lived there in 1943 and 1944 as CBS correspondent. I've seen his spoils system of his Fascist party eating up the economic body of Spain. I've seen many, many Spaniards hacking at the dry, lifeless earth, trying to eke out a bare subsistence. I've seen families—5 years after the end of the Civil War there—huddled in shell-ravaged shacks, living in squalor and fear.

I didn't like what I saw. I didn't like the paradox of the very rich and the very poor. I didn't like the haunted looks on the faces of those whose lives were caught in the echo of secret police boots.

I share this following opinion of Spain: "Franco Spain remains a Fascist dictatorship, denying the basic civil rights. In Spain, there is no real freedom of speech, of religion, of the press, of politics. Franco was put into power by Dictators Hitler and Mussolini and maintains his allegiance to the Fascist-type state."

Those are the words of our Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, spoken last May. That, then, is our Government's official attitude toward Franco. Yet, actions speak louder than words. Or, should I say inaction? For, despite our harsh words of denunciation, we haven't done anything to prove to the world that we are serious in the matter.

Our ideological battle cry during the war was "down with Fascist dictatorships." We succeeded in getting rid of Mussolini and Hitler, but their progeny remains, as a symbol for them, as a black mark for us.

Why do we tolerate Franco, even though he is on the United Nations blacklist? There are several reasons, but the primary one is that Spain would be a good ally in the event of conflict with Russia. Spain is very strategically located.

It is separated from the remainder of Europe by high, rugged mountains, which, presumably, would stop the Red army, should Moscow decide to take over Europe. Spain then, would be a base of operations for the recapture of Europe from the Russians.

Presumably, Franco's 2,000,000-man army could be equipped and placed at our disposal—at a price. Franco is noted for his ability to exact a pound of flesh. We'd have to pay for his assistance.

When the question of conflict with Russia arises, and the issue of Spain comes up, another factor arises. That factor is—Tito. Why, in this stage of the cold war, should we be backing Tito, who operates a totalitarian dictatorship quite similar to Franco's—and appear to be opposing Franco?

That, I think, is a hard one for our Government to answer—without cringing. I don't think you'd hear the word "expediency" used by any of our diplomats, although they probably would point out that Tito is actively engaged in undermining Russian communism and therefore is more valuable to our cause. Franco, on the other hand, is not engaged in an active role.

Now, without involving moralities, this question must arise. If Tito has a totalitarian dictatorship, and Franco has a totalitarian dictatorship, and we are opposed to that freedomless form of government, why do we not accord each the same treatment?

If we're going to loan Tito money and send him factories, why, then, should we not do the same for Franco? Why shouldn't we loan Franco the millions he wants, and admit him into the Atlantic Pact, the Marshall plan, and the United Nations? Yugoslavia not only is a UN member, it's on the Security Council.

None of these questions can be answered without the words "cold war" being used or implied. Actually, then, our foreign policy is based on: Preservation and strengthening of our national security, and on our fear of Russia increasing her national security.

Our policy includes expediencies—going along with international blackguards if they serve our purpose. That may be necessary to survive in this atomic era. Right now I'm not arguing the merits of expedience. I am, however, saying that our foreign policy should be made consistent. We shouldn't look at something black and call it white.

As far as Franco is concerned, there might be an "out" for us. The western powers could recognize an exile regime of Spaniards who would be pledged to a United Nations supervised election. Franco could be forced out, if we really wanted to do it. And I don't think we would have to fear that Spain would go Communist. The people are just too individualistic—too proud. I have a great respect and affection for the Spanish people. I, for one, would have no fear for the outcome of a contest between democracy and communism in a free, Franco-less Spain. There's no doubt that democracy would win. Only then—as Ray Swing said the other night—could we be rid of our national shame for tolerating Franco.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it is a source of great regret that our good friend and colleague, FRANK B. KEEFE, of Wisconsin, has been obliged to retire from the United States Congress.

During his 12 years as a Member of the National House of Representatives he has rendered outstanding service to his State and to the Nation.

For much of that time I have worked shoulder to shoulder with him as a member of the House Committee on Appropriations, which carried such a tremendous and such a detailed burden during the war and postwar years.

As chairman of the subcommittee in charge of appropriations for the Labor and Federal Security Departments and as a member of the subcommittee in charge of deficiency appropriations for all departments and agencies of the Federal Government, he proved himself not only one of the most hard-working and most effective members of the committee but one of the most powerful figures on the floor of the House in my time.

He will be greatly missed by his many friends and coworkers here.

I know we all join in the hope that his health, recently impaired, may be fully restored in the near future.

General Maas and the Presentation of the Marine Corps Plaque

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, on the 22d of August of this year the Marine Corps Reserve Officers' Association, through its distinguished national president, Gen. Melvin J. Maas, presented to the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives, of which I have the honor to be a member, a Marine Corps plaque, being the symbol of that distinguished fighting organization.

General Maas' words were well chosen and were short. Like all good marines, he was concise and quick to get to the point. So fitting and so representative of the world's greatest fighting organization was his presentation, that I believe the Archives of the Nation should contain his statement.

General Maas served in two world wars with great distinction. Like all marines in time of war, Colonel Maas was at the front with his buddies. He served in the Congress of the United States for 18 years, and I was privileged to serve with him on the old Naval Affairs Committee, under the guidance of the illustrious Carl Vinson, for a great number of years.

General Maas is a real American and a member of a grand and glorious fighting organization whose heroism is reflected in every page of American progress and of history.

Under leave to extend my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I include herewith a copy of General Maas' statement to our committee on August 22, 1950:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am privileged to represent the Marine Corps Reserve Officers Association, which is a guild of Reserve officers of the Marine Corps. We are organized for the sole purpose of improving our professional value to national defense. The Marine Corps Reserve is the creation of Congress and more particularly of one of the predecessors of this committee.

The members of our association are deeply grateful to the Congress and this committee for their insistent and understanding sponsorship of the Reserve.

This committee of Congress has never failed to give us a fair hearing and it has always championed the Reserves.

The very nature of our system of government puts the major reliance for defense of our country on the citizen soldiers—civilians in uniform. As civilians with military training, we are doubly conscious of our obligations both as citizens and as part of the military. Our very loyalty to the Marine Corps insures loyalty to our country and its democratic processes, of which the Congress is the very foundation.

This committee has always shown a very deep interest in the Marine Corps and its Reserves. Therefore, as Marine Reserve, we are proud and happy to present to this committee this emblem of one of the members of the team for defense, the Marine Corps. In presenting this emblem, gentlemen, I wish to assure you that we Marine Reserves ask only one thing, that we be permitted to be ready so that we can be there when you need us.

What the Bill of Rights Means to Me

OF
HON. LEO E. ALLEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this year the Illinois Ogle County Bar Association conducted an inter-high school contest on the subject "What the Bill of Rights Means to Me." The essay committee was composed of Mr. Gerald Garard, of Oregon, Ill.; Mrs. Leo Rutkowski, of Forreston, Ill.; and Mr. Steven Helfer, of Rochelle, Ill. Cirguit Judge Leon A. Zick, of Oregon, Ill., made the award.

This contest was won by Miss Patricia Rumann, of Mount Morris High School, Mount Morris, Ill., who chose as her subject My Insurance Policy. In a thoughtful and searching manner, Miss Rumann developed the importance of the Bill of Rights as an "insurance" to the individual of his rights as an American citizen. Impressed by the clear thinking and sound reasoning of this high-school girl, I thought: "If these things be found in the green tree, for what may we look in the dry," and so long as our young people hold such fundamental truths, our country is safe.

I feel that this essay must commend itself to everyone, and I therefore request permission to insert it in the RECORD:

MY INSURANCE POLICY
(By Patricia Rumann)

Have you paid your latest insurance premium? Surely you have insurance of some kind. Statistics show that more people are purchasing insurances now than ever before. Life insurance, fire insurance, car insurance, unemployment insurance, hospital insurance, burglary insurance, and health insurance are among some of the best-selling policies. People are trying to look ahead, to save for a rainy day. They would not think of absent-mindedly forgetting to pay their premiums. They take the time to carefully fill out page after page of questionnaires to get the insurance. But the majority of American citizens don't give one thought to the greatest insurance policy of all.

Come back with me to the year 1789. The leaders of our Nation were attempting to start a new type of government. They had carefully discussed how the new government should be constructed, making sure that the majority of the people would always have their voice in the rule of our land. But they were not satisfied with this Constitution, which outlined the powers of the officers of the democracy and manifested the right of the majority. They wanted a list which outlined the rights of the individual against oppression by the Government. North Carolina considered the personal rights to be so important that they would not agree to ratification of the Constitution until the Bill of Rights was promised as the first ten amendments. This Bill of Rights restricted Congress from making it unlawful to openly and publicly criticize the Government. It permitted any man the right to bear arms, to be the ruler in his own house, to receive fair treatment at the hands of the law. This Bill of Rights, which those first great statesmen considered to be even more important that a unified democracy, is my insurance policy against the will of the majority. It is the document which gives me the same liberties as the richest millionaire or the poorest bogger in the United States.

Privileges are not granted without certain duties and responsibilities being asked in return, however. I am expected to be tolerant, to consider seriously my duty as a citizen of the United States, to be a fitting example to immigrants and foreign visitors, to put careful thought behind my marking of a ballot on election days, to do all in my power to see that the Bill of Rights will always remain the insurance policy of personal liberty.

The Eleventh Anniversary of the Attack on Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER A. CHESNEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. CHESNEY. Mr. Speaker, during the past months the free world has determinedly embarked on an offensive to preserve the institution of democracy. It is not a new campaign. The United States with her friends has waged a consistent campaign of selling freedom since the end of World War II. As world events move more rapidly, these days, selling of economic freedom has been supplemented with military high pressure power.

The actions of the Communist puppet in China and in Korea have brought the realities of communism a little closer to our everyday lives. The Korean action today reminds the world of a terrible event of 11 years ago, when on September 1, 1939, Communist forces and their evil partners, the Nazi heel-clicking militarists, used the same tactics to invade a democratic Poland. A free Poland which was a member of the League of Nations. Like the nation of Korea and Nationalist China, in the United Nations, Poland was brutally and without warning attacked. The rest is history.

What followed was only to be clearly revealed in the tragic events that are so closely paralleled today. The ghosts of Yalta and Potsdam are only too clearly reflected in every part of the world where communism and its servants are the rulers of the land.

We can see that the pattern of aggression from that date to the present time is the same. The sins of the past are only reminders that the guaranties of major powers are not always kept. We can recall that Britain gave assurances to Poland. They were what one might call first aid to prevent further deterioration in an already bad situation. But for practical purposes it was a policy of opposing bloc against bloc.

If this were recognized only a few months after the invasion of Poland, the action would have been repudiated by everyone. The fact is that it is now accepted, if not in its entirety, at least partially, where the truths remain unblemished.

The fleeting time of history shows us that the scars of the invasion have never healed. The government in control of Poland is truly dominated by Soviet puppets who have been trained and schooled in Marxist ways. The schools where once democracy was taught are now classrooms devoted to totalitarian doctrine. The farm today is a state institution. The incentive for ownership of land and property of any kind is curbed. The church is shackled by ironclad Soviet rules which can be broken at the whim of the commissar. This is the Poland of 1950.

The United States and all the countries which are members of the United Nations must keep before their eyes the sad fate of democracy as it was crushed in Poland.

The shadows which have fallen on the free people of Poland must serve as a warning to all nations to keep themselves strong. Strength which stems from the mind and hands of a freeman is the only recourse. Free people who are determined to live free can gain in strength when they fight an oppressor.

The Pole, wherever he is, is a freeman who will never give up his inherent right of freedom.

As long as there is a spark of democracy existing in this world, the Pole will gain and gain in stature in his fight for freedom and justice.

Analysis of Report of Commodity Credit Corporation for Period Ending June 30, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I have made an effort to analyze the report of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the period ending June 30. This has resulted in certain very significant and startling facts. I find that the inventory figure for cheese alone is 58,902,053 pounds as against 29,475,919 on May 31, an increase of 99.8 percent in 1 month. I find further that butter stocks increased to 161,649,213 pounds. The Government purchased 44,151,250 pounds during the month of June, thereby increasing its inventory over the May 31 figure by 37.6 percent.

This is a very discouraging development as to the increases in carrying charges on these two items alone. The total carrying charges for the fiscal year amounted to $3,167,313.63. Of this amount, $1,937,674.51 accrued after February 2, when proposals were filed here in the House authorizing the distribution of these surplus food items to people who could use them but could not afford to pay for them.

The situation is so disturbing that, although I have not had an opportunity to complete my full study of the report, I have brought these facts to the attention of the President and Secretary Brannan through letters addressed to them. I include copies of these letters:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 1, 1950.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: A copy of the report of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the period ending June 30 was sent to my office on August 29.

The analysis which I have been able to make discloses very substantial increases in certain commodities during June. It also discloses a heavy loss incurred through the payment of storage charges.

I think both of these factors will be clear if you will examine the following brief analysis as to quantities of these several food commodities:

	Inventory (pounds), May 31, 1950	Inventory (pounds), June 30, 1950	Increase in June (pounds)
Butter	117,497,963	161,649,213	44,151,250
Cheese	29,475,919	58,902,053	29,426,134
Dried milk	311,065,022	362,931,819	51,866,797
Dried eggs	87,891,563	93,918,525	6,026,962
Dried beans	949,423,400	968,710,200	19,286,800
Dried peas	85,775,300	91,225,900	5,450,600
Rice	392,600	68,996,200	68,603,600
Grain sorghum	3,771,969,200	4,127,422,400	355,453,200

As you know, I have tried to familiarize myself with the amounts of payment made for carrying charges. On June 30 the total amount on 16 food commodities was $38,700,524.59.

You will recall that legislation was proposed in the House on February 2 intended to provide for the distribution of these perishable food commodities to people who need them but cannot afford to buy them. Fortunately, upon the recommendation of the House Committee on Agriculture the House passed H. R. 9313 on August 22. If enacted into law, this will provided essentially the same solution as was suggested on February 2. Secretary Brannan also finally recommended such a solution.

It cannot be disputed that unless some definite action is taken large amounts of these food commodities will inevitably spoil. Under these circumstances I do want to urge that you insist that the situation and the House bill be made the subject of prompt action in the Senate.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. HESELTON,
Member of Congress.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 1, 1950.

Hon. CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SECRETARY BRANNAN: A copy of the report of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the period ending June 30 was sent to my office on August 29.

The analysis which I have been able to make discloses very substantial increases in certain commodities during June. It also discloses a heavy loss incurred through the payment of storage charges.

I think both of these factors will be clear if you will examine the following brief analysis as to quantities of these several food commodities:

Fortunately, upon the recommendation of the House Committee on Agriculture the House passed H. R. 9313 on August 22. If enacted into law, this will provide essentially the same solution as was suggested on February 2. Of course, this solution did meet with your final approval.

It cannot be disputed that unless some definite action is taken large amounts of these food commodities will inevitably spoil. I hope that you have brought this matter to the attention of the proper parties in the Senate and that you will do everything in your power to urge immediate action.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. HESELTON,
Member of Congress.

Lloyd Lewellyn Black

OF
HON. HENRY M. JACKSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, last week, the Nation lost one of its outstanding trial judges in the untimely passing of Lloyd L. Black, United States judge for the western district of Washington, at Seattle.

Judge Black was born in Leavenworth, Kans., on March 15, 1889, and came to Everett, Wash., as a child. He was educated in the Everett public schools. He graduated from the University of Washington, with honors, with an A. B. degree in 1910, and received his law degree in 1912. He was elected prosecuting attorney of Snohomish County, Wash., in 1916, the first Democrat to be elected to that office. He was engaged in the private practice of law until his appointment as a judge of the Superior Court of the State of Washington in January 1937. He had an extensive law practice and was considered one of the ablest members of the Washington State bar. In 1939 he was named by President Roosevelt to be United States Federal judge for the western district of Washington. He held that post continuously until his death on August 23, 1950.

It was my good fortune to have been associated with Judge Black. It was a rich experience that I shall always treasure. It was he who gave me my start in the law practice and it was he who, through his wise counsel, assisted me in getting into politics. I shall always be indebted to him for his thoughtful guidance and assistance.

Judge Black was a man of sound judgment. He was a very fair and tolerant man, always considerate of the rights of others no matter how much he might disagree with their views. He was a scholar in all things. He had a way of getting to the truth in a simple, straightforward manner. He was possessed of the best judicial temperament. He never lost his patience. He never lost his interest and desire in making sure that justice was done in all cases coming before his court.

In his passing, I have lost not just a friend but, to me, it is as though one of my own family had passed away.

Military Sea Transportation Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, fellow Members of Congress, the United States is now, practically though not technically, in a state of war. At such a time it has been considered almost sacrilegious to make criticisms of the military and its operations. I am mindful of the need for permitting free operation of our military forces in those fields where a free hand is essential for a successful prosecution of the war effort. However, at the present time certain situations and conditions prevail, and certain policies are being effectuated by one branch of the military service which do not merit the sacrosanct cloak of freedom of operations. Indeed, if permitted to continue, these conditions and policies may tend to imperil and slow down our war effort. I believe very strongly that the Members of this House and the public at large should be informed of these facts and the possible consequences if no controls are established to correct the conditions.

As Members of Congress one of the responsibilities which we have implicitly accepted is that of preserving the traditional ideas of American Government. One of the most important of those ideas is that control of the Government should remain in the hands of the civilian arm, that the public interest should be kept paramount, and that the military should be confined to its limited sphere. In these critical times it is of particular importance that we be vigilant against excessive control and unwarranted action by military agencies. We are engaged in a battle against a totalitarian, militaristic government. We are fighting to protect the idea of democratic, civilian forms of government. In World Wars I and II we sacrificed countless lives and huge sums of money to defeat the fascistic and imperial military governments of Germany and Japan. Such militarism now bears the communistic banner, and under the hammer and sickle of Russia, through her vassal state in Korea, has challenged us again. While fighting that ideology abroad we cannot let it creep into our own Government and destroy the concept laid down by the founding fathers.

In my humble thinking that very danger is presented to us by policies laid down and now being carried out by certain highly placed career officers in the Navy Department. I refer to the operations of the Military Sea Transportation Service and the high-handed manner in which its policy makers are bypassing and sidetracking the private merchant marine in the present crisis. The policies they are now following point unmistakably to an intention to perpetuate naval operation of transportation services essentially and traditionally civilian in character. I wish now to publicly and vigorously oppose those policies and to point out my grounds for opposing them.

At the outset of the Korean developments the MSTS was operating four ships of their own. They had no ships under charter. They were engaged in little deep-sea or coastwise transportation. It is true that they were, and still are, handling an excessive amount of harbor movements by barge, and of tug operations, in competition with private enterprise. Despite repeated protests they had improperly built up their business in this respect since World War II. However, when the decision was made to intervene in Korea, and in spite of the availability of the ships and facilities of private shipping operators and large pools of experienced manpower, the MSTS set in motion a program designed to secure for themselves a large portion of the supply transport, and all of the troop-transport operations, incidental to the Korean situation. What motive they can have for this policy except the desire to make use of the pretext afforded by the sudden emergency to entrench themselves for future expansion at the expense of our private merchant marine, I do not know.

The private companies have available a largely untapped reserve of berthing and docking facilities sufficient to handle our present needs. They have behind them years of experience and proven know-how. There is available to them ample manpower, operating under collective bargaining agreements. Many of them have been virtually forced out of business by the cessation of trade with the Orient resulting from the Communist-created upheavals there. In the face of these facts the MSTS has gone into competition with them and is further contributing to their difficulties.

MSTS has taken over large numbers of ships and are attempting to man them with green crews, hired from the streets and placed in temporary civil-service ratings. They do not have the necessary berthing, dock and loading facilities to expeditiously handle the cargoes they are appropriating to themselves. With inexperienced crews and dockside personnel, supplies do not get proper handling. Their ships are lying idle waiting for berths and cargo. All this, with privately owned ships and facilities unused, and with a desperate need for the most efficient possible dispatching of matériel and troops. It seems evident that MSTS has seen fit to begin building up a shipping empire of their own with the intention of perpetuating it.

This is not the whole story: The Navy's Transportation Service has now under charter a large number of foreign ships, operated by foreign crews, and engaged in logistics operations vital to the security of the United States. I have endeavored for weeks to obtain a satisfactory explanation as to why this policy is being continued. I have been told that they needed ships quickly and that they needed fast ships. This explanation does not tell me why so many foreign Liberty ships, sold at give-away prices by this Government after World War II, are included among those foreign ships on charter. Besides taking needed business and jobs away from our own operators and seamen, this foreign-ship operation has an even more serious side.

Shortly after United Nations intervention in Korea our maritime unions and private operators voluntarilly set up a program for screening every manjack boarding a ship engaged in military transport in order that Communists and subversives might be weeded out. This was a recognized necessity to protect our ships and supplies and the lives of our men. The program was approved by the Government and is operated by the Coast Guard. What becomes of that program when MSTS turns over whole vital operations to ships manned by foreign crews from countries which may be hotbeds of communism, and where no provisions are made to investigate or screen the personnel? Further, the civil service crews hired from the skidrows of our port cities undergo no screening. They not only lack experience and bungle operations, but there undoubtedly are among them planted spies and saboteurs bent on destroying us. And while this goes on our maritime hiring halls are full of loyal, unemployed Americans who know how to do the job.

The training which our career naval officers get throughout their lifetime naturally inclines them toward military controls and military types of government. That training makes them proficient at operations in the combat line. However it does not qualify them to control the highly specialized functions of marine transportation and cargo handling or personnel transport. Our maritime industry is built up of organizations remarkably proficient in that field. The people engaged in the industry have made it their life's work. It is the declared national policy to support and foster the industry's continued development. And now, when times are such that the Government can contribute to the industry and, at the same time, serve the Nation's needs, the Navy has taken the play away from the private companies. That is just the sort of tendency which this Nation must guard against and fight against.

I have in my hand a letter from Mr. Harry Lundeberg, president of the Seafarers' International Union of North America, and secretary-treasurer of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, which colorfully and thoroughly explores some of the implications surrounding this attempt by the MSTS to capture control of shipping in this country. It is only one of many such letters which have flooded my office from labor organizations and from private operators in the shipping industry, as well as from individuals and groups concerned with the problem because of its effect on the national welfare. I ask that this letter be printed in the RECORD at this point, so that all Members, and the people of the United States may have the information it contains:

SAILORS' UNION OF THE PACIFIC,
August 30, 1950.

Hon. JOHN F. SHELLEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JACK: I am in receipt of your letter dated August 24 and I appreciate the work you are doing on behalf of the American seamen in regard to the attempts of the Military Sea Transportation Service of bypassing legitimate American seamen.

I have received communications from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Kimball, and from Admiral Callaghan. Their letters, of course, are very friendly and state that it is not the intention of the MSTS to charter any more foreign ships as long as there are enough American ships available. So far so good. However, the MSTS and its head have a long-range program which they don't admit but which I know is a fact. They intend to substitute the civilian American Merchant Marine with their own set-up of so-called civil service employees. They are today operating many more ships than the old Army Transport Service did, and since the Navy took over this setup all their actions indicate they intend to build and build until they really have control of all the ships that carry supplies to the Army, Navy, or any defense posts both outside and in territorial American waters, and it is a crying shame the way they are operating at the present time.

They are advertising in the papers for sailors, firemen, and cooks all the time. They are flying them in here from other towns and they are housing them in the San Francisco YMCA. These people they are recruiting are not steady civil-service employees. Their status is civil service as long as they work for the MSTS. When they are out of work, they don't receive any benefits as a regular civil service employee. They are subject to be fired without any redress. In my opinion, it is one of the biggest threats to organized American seamen I have seen for some time. As you probably know, in order to hire out as a sailor, or a fireman, or a steward under the MSTS you do not need any certificates of efficiency or competency which all other American seamen are required to get from the United States Coast Guard before they can sail in certain ratings in the merchant marine.

For instance, in order for you to be able to sail as an able-bodied seaman you must have a certificate as such from the Coast Guard, and according to their rules and regulations you must have sailed on deck for 3 years before you can apply and then you go through a certain examination. This is what is required of our boys, but not so in the MSTS. Any old greenhorn can get himself a job and at nonunion wages, and if he is a good obedient slave to the Navy brass hats.

You, of course, have read about the recent disaster in the Golden Gate where a collision occurred between a hospital ship, the Benevolence, and the Mary Luckenbach. This particular Navy hospital ship was manned by these so-called civil-service employees and I know for a fact from one of the men who happened to be aboard that ship that a great number of them were not qualified seamen. Perhaps if and when everything is brought to light in the inquiry about this disaster the finger may point to the incompetency of the personnel on that particular ship. It certainly points that way when it is a known fact that most of the lifeboats were crated and lashed and no attempt was even made to get them out. Also, the one lifeboat which was launched was found capsized.

It seems mighty peculiar to me and to other men who have had experience that if it took the ship 20 minutes, as they say it took, before she sank, that each lifeboat was not lowered and all hands put in them. Can you imagine what would have happened at sea in a little bit of rough weather with no help around? A major disaster would have occurred—particularly, if the vessel had been loaded with wounded soldiers.

It is amazing to me that this particular incident has not received the proper attention. You realize, of course, that had it not been for the towboats and small craft around San Francisco, they would have probably lost about three or four hundred people. Is it any wonder that a disaster occurred when the ship went to the bottom with its engine full ahead? How can you expect to keep a watertight bulkhead strong enough to withhold any kind of pressure under those circumstances?

These are some of the facts regarding the sinking of this ship. Knowing your interest in maritime affairs and having had personal experience in your younger days, I thought you would be interested in knowing a little about this. If you desire, I will keep you informed of what develops because we are keeping someone down at the Coast Guard for the specific purpose of finding out what develops during the inquiry.

Aside from that, the fine hand of the MSTS is now injected in the unemployment picture insofar as seamen are concerned. The latest stunt being pulled by the unemployment bureau here in San Francisco is giving the seamen a slip to go down to the crimp hall of the MSTS, to register for a job and are threatened if they don't do this, of having their unemployment benefits cut off. Now, that is a hell of a state of affairs and, in my opinion, against the ruling of the unemployment bureau.

As I understand the law, a man does not have to take a job where his earning power is less than in the one he quit. This is one case where we are going to fight, by the way, so we expect to get that cleared up. If the unemployment bureau can get by with that, we might as well forget about the hiring hall and union conditions, because through this practice it will throw every American seaman in the hands of the fink halls.

As you know, the MSTS does not pay the union scale of wages or provide men with union conditions. I thought you would want to know these things so that when you put pressure on these people, you will know they are only giving lip service and that it is so much window dressing. They are out definitely to take over the merchant marine lock, stock, and barrel, and, of course, are hiding behind the Korean war, stating that for certain reasons they have to handle so many ships themselves, etc.—secret stuff, which is a lot of hooey. If it is secret stuff, how come they hire every Tom, Dick, and Harry to man their ships and how come that the bureaus in Washington, such as the Department of Labor and Department of Commerce, are so intent on screening American seamen, which we have no objection to? How about the screening of these so-called MSTS ships and how about the personnel sailing into Korea in foreign ships, particularly Panamanian ships, which is the dumping ground of every commie on an international scale. That is a laugh.

I thought you ought to know this, inasmuch as you are on a very important and vital committee and also knowing your interest in the American seamen and the American trade-union movement and the union standard of wages and conditions.

If there is any time that you think I can be of any use in any hearings, I will be glad to come back east.

With best wishes, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

HARRY LUNDEBERG,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Finally, I call upon the House Armed Services Committee and the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee to make a thorough investigation of the practices and policies of the military sea transportation service and their impact on the present and long-term national defense requirements for domestic and overseas water transport, national security, and the economy of the maritime industry. I suggest that these investigations be undertaken without delay in view of the serious consequences should the potentially destructive policies now being followed by the MSTS be continued. I further suggest that these committees make recommendations to correct these conditions, and that Congress act on such recommendations at the earliest practicable date.

Enact Excess-Profits Tax Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. R. GROSS

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I have signed a petition being circulated among Members of the House which calls for the imposition of an effective excess-profits tax before final adjournment of this Eighty-first Congress.

I do not like to sign a petition for this purpose and such a petition should not be necessary. But there is every evidence that unless some special action is taken there will be no worth-while legislation of this nature.

In view of the enormous profits that are being rolled up by many large corporations, and the additional billions of dollars that are being funneled into war production, I am amazed that President Truman, as well as some congressional leaders, knowing full well the necessity for additional tax revenues, should temporize for one moment on this issue. In all fairness and decency, there can be no reasonable explanation for continued excise taxes on the necessities of life and additional new taxes that fall heavily on the lower bracket of personal income unless excess profits are siphoned off.

The time for action is now—not next year.

Against a Preventive War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the appended article by Hanson W. Baldwin, the distinguished military expert of the New York Times, in today's issue, summarizes and makes clear the arguments against a preventive war—a policy which I have long contended against and which I believe to be opposed to the best interests of our country. Under leave to extend, I include the following article:

WAR OF PREVENTION—PERILS IN PROPOSED ATTACK ON SOVIET NOW ARE WEIGHED AGAINST ALLEGED ADVANTAGE

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

Fresh enemy divisions were reported massing on the Korean front yesterday as the Chinese Communists again complained that our aircraft had violated the Manchurian frontier.

Two deductions can be drawn from these facts. The first, which has needed no concentration of divisions to prove it, is that North Korea still has sizable manpower reserves within her frontiers she can utilize, if necessary, to prosecute the war.

Most of these, it is true, may be hastily conscripted and rapidly trained peasants, but they can be leavened by a hard core of veterans—Koreans, other Asiatic races—who fought in the Chinese, Russian, or Japanese Armies.

In other words, although most of North Korea's best trained units, and probably most of the trained fanatical veterans—already have been committed to the fighting front—there is still available considerable manpower from which more enemy divisions can be organized.

For this and other reasons the threatening Chinese Communist troop movements in Manchuria toward the Korean frontier and the complaints and proclamations of the Peiping government can be viewed at the moment as of more political and diplomatic importance than military significance.

LINKED TO OFFENSIVE IN UNITED NATIONS

The Chinese Communists are making troop dispositions that will enable them to intervene militarily in Korea if they wish. But those troop dispositions and the careful ground work of complaints and proclamations about Korea that Peiping has been issuing also serve as important backing for the Chinese Communists' politico-diplomatic offensive in the United Nations, and perhaps even in Moscow.

Chinese Communist military intervention in Korea may well occur, however, particularly when and if most of the available North Korean manpower has been committed, and when and if United States offensive operations threaten a North Korean defeat.

Such intervention is, therefore, a contingency that must be planned for and, if it occurs, met.

There have been some suggestions—unfortunately from responsible quarters—that, if analyzed, really advocate preventive war against the Soviet Union as a means of meeting Chinese Communist military intervention in Korea or as a counter to the start by Soviet satellites of other hot wars elsewhere in the world.

One of these stemmed not long ago from Harold E. Stassen, a member of the loyal opposition. In quite different words and far more blunt phraseology, Secretary of the Navy Francis P. Matthews, who in his brief regime has been noted more for his political loyalty than for his breadth of vision, advocated an attack upon Russia—a war for peace.

The speech by Mr. Matthews, a man always open to suggestion from his superiors, was clearly a trial balloon; the method of launching it was a favorite one of Mr. Matthews' political boss—Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defense—who has been selling the same doctrine of the preventive war in private conversations around Washington.

The Matthews deviation from the public and official party line of the Truman administration was superimposed upon Gen. Douglas MacArthur's unilateral declaration of foreign policy about Formosa.

In one sense, perhaps, these outspoken deviations should be welcome as an indication that a democracy will not build any solidly monolithic government structure in which there is no room for difference of opinion.

BASIC TENET SEEN VIOLATED

But it is to be noted that Mr. Matthews represents a military department, and that General MacArthur wears the uniform, and a basic tenet of United States constitutional philosophy is that in foreign policy the military may propose, but the civilian disposes.

In these instances the declarations of prominent officials have had the effect of dividing the country, confusing its foreign friends, and creating mass propaganda material for the Soviet Union. They have tended to put the military in the position of policy makers rather than policy executors. They accentuate the split between State Department and the Pentagon—and between the differing theories of military preparedness. It is, in the words of the old familiar saying—"a hell of a way to run a railroad."

The preventive war theory is a most heinous and dangerous doctrine—all the more so, since it seems to have won many important recruits, in and out of Government, since the Korean fighting started.

It is basically a doctrine of desperation, frustration, and negation. It puts the cart before the horse; military policy takes primacy over foreign policy. It repeats the same grievous and fundamental error we made in World War II by making victory rather than the peace after victory the aim. It sacrifices the ultimate for the immediate and it extols the expedient at the price of morality.

DANGERS OF WAR FOR PEACE

If it were to be applied specifically against the Soviet Union, in case the Chinese Communists intervene in Korea, it would mean at once the loss of western Europe and of other large areas of the world to Russia. For an attack upon Russia by us, caused by an event in the Far East, could not be localized. The Russians could not oppose us merely in the air and in the Far East and ignore our troops in Europe.

The mere fact that we struck Russia first would cut away the moral ground work of the United Nations support, which now exists in Korea. It probably would put us into war with at best confused and unwilling allies at worst, virtually alone. The Russians would sweep into western Europe and politically and psychologically we would deliver Asia to the Communists.

Nor would such a doctrine be bombing in Korea from medium altitudes—around 15,000 or 16,000 feet—optimum altitude for the type of radar bomb sight we now utilize. There has been no air opposition, very little antiaircraft. We are bombing a peninsula and fly only a few miles over enemy soil.

But the military case for a preventive war against the Soviet Union must be based upon the assumption that we can deliver atomic bombs accurately in two or three figures upon targets hundreds or thousands of miles deep in Russia—targets defended by hundreds of Russian fighters and heavy antiaircraft concentrations, that would force us to high altitudes.

The military case for a preventive war is founded upon the hopes of a quick and easy victory, that glittering and unrealistic goal that would be impossible if the Soviet Union dominated Eastern Europe and much of Asia. A preventive war would really mean a long, hard, and vicious struggle, with no holds barred, in which we would lose, by our own action, moral and psychological backing and political support, not only from the world but from our potential friends and allies among the satellites and dissident minorities in the Soviet Union.

There are scores of other reasons—political, economic, psychological, moral, and military—against this attractive fallacy, but they can be summed up thusly: Preventive war is a course of political bankruptcy and moral frustration that would be militarily ineffective and which would lose for the United States the very values we are trying to defend.

Such ideas, no matter whether advanced by the loyal opposition or the party in power, should be scotched, and quickly.

From the Halls of Montezuma to the Shores of Korea—The Marines Can Win if We Give Them a Chance

OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I have recently received correspondence from my constituents in Los Angeles commenting upon the effective use of the United States Marine Corps in combat and suggesting that in recognition of the service rendered the Nation by the Marines throughout our history, the Marine Corps be granted representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff of our Armed Forces.

This is not a new suggestion, and I am sure many Members of Congress have believed that while the Marines are officially a branch of the Navy, they are indeed entitled to some recognition on the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Congressman CARL VINSON, Democrat, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, on March 6 of this year introduced a bill, H. R. 7580, which would make the Commandant of the Marine Corps a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff but without eligibility to be appointed Chairman, and which would continue the Marine Corps as a branch of the Navy.

I received today a letter from the Commander in Chief of our Armed Services, President Harry Truman, in reply to a letter I wrote on the subject of Marine representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff which I think will be of interest to the Members of Congress as well as to my constituents.

My letter to Mr. Truman and Mr. Truman's reply follow:

AUGUST 21, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The United States Marine Corps has again on the battlefields of Korea demonstrated that it is an effective hard-hitting mobile force which can be depended upon to produce results on the battleground.

Over the past 180 years, the Marine Corps time and again have proved that they are invaluable to the defense of America and to fight the aggressors which threaten American security.

In my opinion, the United States Marine Corps is entitled to full recognition as a major branch of the armed services of the United States, and should have its own representative on the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the Department of Defense. I, therefore, sincerely urge that as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces you will grant the Marine Corps representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Very truly yours,
GORDON L. McDONOUGH,
Member of Congress.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 29, 1950.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN MCDONOUGH: I read with a lot of interest your letter in regard to the Marine Corps. For your information the Marine Corps is the Navy's police force and as long as I am President that is what it will remain. They have a propaganda machine that is almost equal to Stalin's.

Nobody desires to belittle the efforts of the Marine Corps but when the Marine Corps goes into the Army it works with and for the Army and that is the way it should be.

I am more than happy to have your expression of interest in this naval military organization. The Chief of Naval Operations is the Chief of Staff of the Navy of which the Marines are a part.

Sincerely yours,
HARRY S. TRUMAN.

I must say that the tone of Mr. Truman's reply was somewhat startling to say the least. I personally am much surprised to learn that our Marine Corps has a propaganda machine that is almost equal to Stalin's. And I dare say many marines will be equally astonished. However, if this can be true, I would certainly suggest now that Mr. Truman utilize this "propaganda machine" in the Voice of America program to penetrate behind the iron curtain in Europe and Asia. Mr. Acheson has from all reports not succeeded too well in this undertaking, and perhaps it is time for the marines to land again.

The only propaganda machine I have ever witnessed in the Marine Corps is the propaganda which was spelled out in the charging olive drab lines on Okinawa, at Wake Island, and today on the shores of Korea.

I know that every American citizen is proud of the record of all branches of our Armed Forces. Each one in the last war distinguished itself magnificently. Because of the increased importance of aerial combat and strategic bombing, the Air Force was created as a separate force, an equal partner on the defense team with the Army and the Navy; and today the Marine Corps in view of its achievements in the last war in which marine casualties numbered 88,144 out of a total strength of 650,000 is entitled to some form of representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff along with the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER NORBLAD
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include herewith an excellent editorial on the subject of universal military training written by Mr. Robert Ingalls in the Corvallis (Oreg.) Gazette-Times of August 17, 1950. It would be well worth the while of every Member to read this editorial. It follows:

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

The needs of the operation in Korea have brought many domestic questions into sharper focus. One of these is that of universal military training, which the Department of Defense is again discussing. The usefulness of such a system to the Defense Establishment needs little explanation at this point. It can readily be seen that the Korean situation could have been handled more quickly, with less strain and with less loss of life if there had existed the substantially bigger army and the pool of trained reserves that would result.

It is unfair that some of the boys who fought the last war must unwillingly go again. Many of these men already bear scars of battle on their bodies and all have sacrificed time from their otherwise normal lives. There are many new able-bodied men of military age who should be used in their place. However, because of our lack of a military training program, these new men are not trained.

Actually in the event of an all-out conflict all the Reserves and the men in the draft ages would be eligible for service. How much better it would be for the country if all this vast reserve pool of manpower were already trained. Many people who object to the idea of universal military training do not realize they are adding to the danger of the boys' lives. A trained man has a much better chance of survival in combat than one who has had only rudimentary instruction. Combat men used to say that if a new man lived the first few days, his chances from then on out were pretty good. There is only one way to increase his chances—adequate training.

Consider another viewpoint of the individual liable to military service. In the present situation he lives in constant uncertainty, not knowing when he may be called to duty. He may be taken from the middle of his education or his career, and consequently may have to back-track several years when he returns. Under a universal training program, on the other hand, the young man would know that he would enter military service at a predictable date. His educational scheme could be adjusted to it in advance and his career would not be started.

The greatly increased numbers of Reserves would make possible more detailed advance planning by the Military Establishment, so that the reservist would be able to calculate his chances of future service with greater accuracy. With every eligible man in the Reserves, the need in emergencies to call older men with established jobs and families would be greatly lessened.

It has been argued that universal training would be costly. But it could have been operated from the end of World War II until now for no more than the estimated current year's expenditures in Korea alone. If the training program had been in effect these 5 years, perhaps Korea might not have happened.

This column is now and will be in favor of a sound and intelligent universal military training program until such time as the hopes and prayers of the peoples of the world are answered with a permanent world-wide peace.

Hon. Alfred Lee Bulwinkle, of North Carolina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely regret the passing of my good friend and our beloved colleague Maj. ALFRED LEE BULWINKLE.

Although I had, of course, known the major ever since I became a Member of Congress, it was my happy privilege to become quite closely acquainted with him while we were fellow patients in 1948 at the United States Naval Hospital, Bethesda, Md. He and I had rooms immediately opposite each other and our long and close association at the time gave me an opportunity to fully appreciate his fine Christian character. I then more than ever recognized him as a great American, one who was constantly thinking first of his country and the people he represented and last of himself. During his period of hospitalization I also realized that the strain of his arduous labor was having a detrimental effect upon his health. He did not fully recover from his illness but that did not deter him from returning to his duties here in the House. Because of his continued application to his work on behalf of the people he represented from the Eleventh Congressional District of North Carolina, he has given his life as a servant of the people whom he so proudly served.

The Soviet Union and American Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted, there are printed herewith two broadcasts by Robert F. Hurleigh, director of news on radio station WGN, Chicago, one made on August 9, the other on August 10, which should be of compelling interest to all Americans. Those broadcasts are as follows:

BROADCAST OF AUGUST 9, 1950

While the Security Council of the United Nations takes a day off from the regular sessions, which have proved exasperatingly futile, we have the opportunity to consider the delaying tactics of the Soviets in another agency of the United Nations and which have had tragic consequences. The news spotlight has not been turned on the sessions of the Economic and Social Council to reveal the stalling tactics and evasions of the Soviets as publicized these past 10 days by reporters covering the Security Council. Just as we now know the Soviet delegate at the Security Council never intends to abide by any moral code, so have we had proof, time and again, that Moscow will never accede to any decision made by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations which will force Russia to abide by the articles of the UN Charter as it affects forced labor. Although the protests have been made that Russia is not living up to the articles of the UN on slave labor—or corrective labor—the general press, with very few notable exceptions, has given little attention to an appalling situation. Much of Soviet Russia's industry is geared to forced labor, and the product of Soviet slave-labor camps is being sold in this country in competition with the free American worker. This invasion of the American market by Russia results in the weakening of our own economy by destroying domestic employment and undermining prosperity, which is necessary to maintain the heavy financial burden we now carry for the world.

This trade with the cold-war enemy continues even as we have indications that the presently "contained" war in Korea may explode in literally a dozen different areas. It is now apparent that certain officials in Washington have seemed more concerned over maintaining the Soviet Government's exports to this country than in being genuinely worried over the damage these exports are doing to American industries. For the past number of years the fur farmers of this country, many of them disabled ex-GI's who were advised by the Veterans' Administration to get into the business of fur farming, have been trying to convince Washington that the importation of furs from the Soviet Union has been detrimental to the country as well as to their industry. In the first place, American fur imports have tripled since the war—and this year, according to the authoritative trade paper, Women's Wear Daily, American participation in the Russian fur sales in Leningrad have been above last year—and this at a time when the affairs between this country and Soviet Russia have been deteriorating. Close to 100 American fur buyers were able to obtain visas and journey to Leningrad for the big Russian fur sale of last month and it is probable that $50,000,000 will be deposited to the account of the Soviet Union in New York banks in payment for these Russian furs. Moscow has been willing to sell furs on the American market at almost any price in order to obtain the American dollar—and since all the industry in Russia is controlled by state socialism, the government, and not free individuals, fixes the price in competition with the American fur farmers. And the Soviet Union stands accused by no less an authority than the American Federation of Labor as running slave labor camps where millions of individuals are forced to live under conditions intolerable to freemen.

This allegation that human beings are forced into conditions of slavery is perhaps the gravest charge which could come before the United Nations—and the charge has been made, repeatedly, before the economic and social council of the UN. The protest made by the A. F. of L. underlined the fact that no country in the UN could afford to ignore the growing evidence of appalling widespread use of forced labor in the Soviet Union. For enough information has come through the thick veil of Soviet secrecy to confirm that millions—perhaps as many as 15,000,000—are forced in work camps by the Soviets and the product of their effort is being sold on the American market in competition to free American labor. According to the figures of the Department of Commerce, the imports from Soviet Russia last year totaled almost $42,500,000 while our exports to the U. S. S. R. are valued at only $6,646,000. If you wonder what happens to that dollar difference of $35,000,000 in net earnings in Communist imports, you need only to realize the vast expenditures of the Soviet Union for propaganda and espionage, and for lawyers fees to defend Communists. Fur imports alone have accounted for as much as 40 or 50 million in the years since the war and the buyers who are now on their visit to Leningrad for fur buying may be expected to make this year's purchases of Communist furs just as high as ever. The Soviets are cunning enough to make the most of the American woman's penchant for nice things, and the many furs sold in this country as luxuries are conceivably straight from a fur farm in Siberia maintained by Soviet slave labor. Thus the United States has been unable to bring about any corrections of forced labor through the United Nations, even though the A. F. of L. has made comprehensive surveys of slave labor in the Soviet Union and has demanded that the other nations compel Moscow to live up to the Charter of the UN.

And second, the American fur farmer, including those disabled GIs who went into fur farming on the advice of the Veterans' Administration, find it impossible to compete with the government-controlled forced labor of Russia, and third, the excess American dollars which Soviet Russia obtains are important in financing the subversive activities of Communists in this country. The American people are entitled to know that Communist activities and Soviet slave labor is being supported by the dollars paid for these Russian exports. And the Washington officials responsible cannot claim ignorance of the situation, for the protests have been made in Congress and to the responsible Government departments. The laws of this country, by the way, are emphatic in prohibiting the importation of goods produced by slave or forced labor. Evidence in the hands of the American Federation of Labor—and evidence which has been presented before the economic and social council of the United Nations proves conclusively that slave labor camps are a most important part of the economy of Soviet Russia. The procrastination on the part of Washington officials is certainly part and parcel of the program of those who have fashioned policy during the past number of years which would be favorable to the Soviet Union, even if at the expense of the United States.

While the Soviet Union has now made it abundantly clear that it never has had any intention of trying to live within the charter of the United Nations, it is surprising how many people have not understood that the tactics now employed by Mr. Jacob Malik in the Security Council are simply an amplification of the Soviet strategy which has been effective ever since the Russians pressed for the veto when the UN was formed in 1945. Communist and pro-Communist apologists—aided in many instances by officials of our Government who have given them stature and protection—these Communists and pro-Communists have been able to fool many Americans into believing that the United Nations was—or would—accomplish much more than has been accomplished in the past 5 years. The publicists for the United Nations, with millions available for publicity purposes, have been able to advertise the United Nations in a manner that causes the unsuspecting and uninformed to believe that great progress has been made by the UN. But in very few instances—and certainly in no major crisis—has the United Nations been able to make a single decision which might conceivably offend the Soviet Union. What is taking place in the United Nations Security Council is no accident, but is a part of a well-planned program by the men of the Kremlin to implement the Communist program which has the defeat of the United States as its prime objective.

We set forth certain facts last evening which is evidence of the Soviet attempt to hamstring the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations in much the same manner as Jacob Malik is delaying action in the Security Council. The issue, of course, is greater and emotions are higher. But the fact remains that evidence has been available for months which proves the Communist aims as aggressive and pointed toward the wrecking of the United States. One of the best methods Russia has to injure the economy of the United States—to hasten the day of demoralizing depression—one of the methods has been the use of forced labor to produce goods which is sold on the American market to compete with free American labor. Although we have laws to protect American labor and business from precisely this evil, every attempt has been made, and we know of many complaints which have been made by business and labor, every attempt to have the administration or the UN take action has been met with the procrastination and evasion. It is a known fact, and admitted by some Soviet officials, that Russia maintains slave-labor camps, where political prisoners and others who have lost favor with the Communists are forced into every conceivable line of work. Estimates of the number of men and women in these forced labor camps varies from ten to fifteen million. These human beings produce for Soviet Russia and the goods are sold in this country in direct defiance of established laws. Since the government's production cost is nil the Russian export of goods made by this forced labor affords the Kremlin the dollar advantage desired, as well as the furthering the Communist program of bleeding the United States industries and labor. To understand the thinking of officials in our Commerce Department, you need only to look back into the record to see where the chief of the Russian unit in the Commerce Department—Mr. E. C. Ropes testified before a congressional committee concerning the importation of Russian furs shortly after his return from an official visit to Russia in 1947. The subcommittee chairman, Congressman REID MURRAY, of Wisconsin, asked Mr. Ropes if he had been in Russia trying to scare up trade. Mr. Ropes replies that he was in Russia trying to buy—not to sell—and actually said that the United States had nothing to sell Russia

Mr. Ropes, of the Commerce Department, then eulogized the Communists he met in Russia, saying that he had a very favorable reception and that it was only a question of time before they would be selling as much as they could of what we need in order to buy what they need, and then some. The Commerce Department—and the State Department, too—has never seemed too concerned over the evidence which has been available for years as to forced labor in Soviet Russia competing against American industries which employ free American labor—at least not concerned enough to force a show-down on the issue. The chairman of subcommittee hearing the Commerce Department official felt compelled to refer to his trip to Russia as the second mission to Moscow. Another indication of the administration's evasiveness in dealing with the problem of imports from Russia can be found in the argument offered by officials of the State, Treasury, and Commerce Departments that Soviet fur imports, which make up more than 50 percent of the total Russian goods sold in this country, should continue to be sold because the United States was securing large amounts of manganese from Russia, which might be cut off if the United States would take any action. But in checking later, it was found that Russia has already discontinued her shipments of manganese to the United States. It was evident that the excuses given by the State Department could not be verified—yet the intolerable situation continues even today—for as we pointed out in yesterday's broadcast that the buying of Soviet furs this year will probably be increased over last year. It seems so useless to spend billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money in Marshall plan aid and ECA funds to combat communism while we supply Russia with the necessary dollars to finance her organized Communist programs in this country.

Yet, as we have pointed out, the Commerce Department officials and the State Department officials have been very evasive, and have so far avoided taking any action either through our own governmental channels, or through the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. As a matter of fact, the Soviet delegate to the UN Economic and Social Council has been able to hamstring that agency of the world organization this month. Even as Mr. Malik has been doing ever since he took over the Security Council. There is one other most important point. The Russian furs are sold to American fur buyers who went to Leningrad last month to make their purchases—and the Soviet Union, through its controlled economy, sells at a price which undermines the American market because it also controls its labor, and has millions in forced labor. The furs are fashioned in this country by the Fur Workers Union. You might wonder how an American union worker would feel about fashioning furs which conceivably have been farm grown and handled by slave labor. But the Fur Workers Union in this country is Communist infiltrated and Communist dominated. The head of the Fur Workers Union is a Communist. His name is Ben Gold. And the current issue of the Fur Workers paper carries Communist Ben Gold's most recent bold display of impudence. Communist Ben Gold has a page of the paper to insult the American intelligence and to parrot the Communist Party line. That's the top of the news as it looks from here.

AMA's $1,110,000 Ad Program Set for October

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the American Medical Association has turned over $1,110,000 to their high-priced advertising hucksters to buy up newspaper, radio, and other publicity media during the month of October, for one purpose: to kill every legislative measure to advance the Nation's health, safety, and security. Boasting of their projected plans to reach 150,000,000 Americans through newspaper advertising alone, the AMA expects to fortify its campaign by promoting tie-ins which should bring in another $19,000,000 to bolster their barrage of misrepresentation of any health legislation. Their so-called message of freedom will be broadcast at the cost of $300,000 worth of radio time, plus more tie-ins; they have told their advertising agency to spend $250,000 on magazine space. Organized medicine's program of destruction is quoted below from Editor and Publisher, August 26:

AMA'S $1,110,000 AD PROGRAM SET FOR OCTOBER

(By George A. Brandenburg)

CHICAGO.—Advertising's heavy artillery at the national and local level will boom out messages to reaffirm and solidify public faith in American enterprise through endorsement of voluntary health insurance and opposition to state socialism, according to plans announced this week by the American Medical Association.

During 2 weeks in October, the AMA Message of Freedom, together with thousands of tie-in ads, will reach 150,000,000 Americans through the greatest number of newspaper, magazine, and radio ads ever devoted to a single theme.

NEWSPAPERS HEAD LIST

Newspapers will carry the heavy load of AMA and tie-in advertising, with copy scheduled to run during the week of October 8. It was announced by Clem Whitaker and Leone Baxter, delegated to coordinate AMA's national education campaign.

The advertising budget approved by the AMA board of trustees totals $1,110,000, of which $560,000 has been allocated to newspapers, $300,000 to radio, and $250,000 to national magazines. Approximately 144,500 individual doctors, in every community in America, will share the cost of this advertising program through their dues payments to AMA.

"This, without doubt, is the broadest-coverage newspaper advertisement of the year, judged from the standpoint of the number of newspapers included in the schedule," declared Whitaker & Baxter, the husband-and-wife public relations counselors who have prepared the advertising ammunition for this mass appeal.

ELEVEN THOUSAND NEWSPAPERS SCHEDULED

The AMA's schedule will run in approximately 11,000 newspapers, including every bone-fide daily and weekly paper in the 48 States, District of Columbia, and the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska.

Every newspaper on the schedule will receive an insertion order early in September from Lockwood-Shackelford Co., Chicago advertising agency, selected to handle this business for a 70-inch 5 columns by 14 inches—black and white display ad. Full-page ads are also scheduled in Sunday newspaper supplements and national magazines. Sunday magazines are in addition to all dailies and weeklies.

AMA copy will likewise appear in business, professional trade publications 30 days ahead of general schedule to develop tie-in advertising support from allied organizations, business, and industry.

During the second and third weeks of October more than 1,000 radio stations will broadcast spot announcements, covering every State, Hawaii, and Alaska. In addition, 30 national magazines will carry full-page message concurrently.

The AMA advertising schedule is as follows:

Weekly newspapers: The week of October 8.

Daily newspapers: October 11.

Sunday newspaper supplements: October 15.

National magazines: The week of October 8 for weeklies; the November issues of monthlies, distributed in October.

Radio: Second and third weeks of October.

Sunday newspaper supplements will include American Weekly, This Week, Parade and 28 independent Sunday magazine sections, representing an estimated total circulation of over 38,000,000.

SEEK TERRIFIC IMPACT

Commenting on AMA's blanket-coverage policy, Mr. Whitaker told Editor and Publisher: "We want the terrific impact of all media hitting at once. This is a 'grass roots' advertising campaign, directed to all the people of America, whether they live in great cities, small towns, or villages, or on farms.

"Wherever there is a newspaper, there are doctors—and doctors' patients. The AMA advertising program is designed to blanket every area of medical practice. Consequently, the schedule calls for the use of advertising space in all the newspapers of America. There will be some duplication of circulation, but the added impact of that duplication is desired, so that medicine's story can be hammered home by repetition."

Newspapers will have ample tie-in possibilities, he pointed out. The Whitaker-Baxter team has prepared an advertising kit which will reach newspapers about September 1, outlining in detail 20 or more profitable tie-in promotions at the local level. These include drug stores, all types of merchants and businessmen, manufacturers, insurance companies and agencies, local health plans and hospitals.

BLUE CROSS TO COOPERATE

Local Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans will be provided with material which they can use as a part of their own institutional promotion campaigns to coincide with AMA's advertising program, Lawrence C. Wells, public relations director of Blue Cross and Blue Shield Commissions told E. and P.

These groups will advertise in newspapers, he said, to exploit Blue Cross and Blue Shield prepaid insurance programs from a "brand name" standpoint.

Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans will receive suggested newspaper ads in various sizes, including mats for larger ads up to half-page size.

In addition to specific suggested tie-ins from local business firms of all types, the AMA kit also includes a full-page "freedom roll call" layout that will permit individuals, or their organizations, to be identified with the program.

In order that national advertisers may avail themselves of the opportunity to tie in with the campaign, letters, signed by Dr. Elmer L. Henderson, AMA president, and Dr. Louis H. Bauer, chairman of the AMA board of trustees, are going out this month to the presidents of 25,000 big firms, telling of the campaign's objectives, and why their respective firms should participate.

HAVE NRDGA SUPPORT

Another letter is going to the 7,000 members of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, urging retailers to join in the program at the local level. Whitaker and Baxter also indicated they expect cooperation from unrelated groups, such as the railroads and power companies.

To develop tie-in advertising support from allied organizations and business generally, special AMA copy will be used early in September in business, medical, drug, advertising, and publishing publications. The latter will include Editor and Publisher, Publishers' Auxiliary, American Press, National Publisher, Publishers' Tab, and all State press association publications in United States.

Our Domestic Mineral Resources Should Be Used

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the present grave international situation calls for governmental action in the development of our vast, potential mineral resources in Colorado and the West. The Korean conflict points this up. Our Nation must be self-sufficient. If our supply of strategic materials is cut off, like our supply of rubber was during the last war, the safety of the Nation is jeopardized.

The attitude of the Government toward the development of our basic mineral resources in the past is disgraceful. Instead of helping, it has turned its back on the rich resources lying in the mountains and ground across the country. While discouraging domestic mining development, ultimately closing and ruining many of our mines, on the other hand, it has poured billions into foreign countries for the opening of new mines and industrial activity in direct competition to ours. For example, on August 24 it was reported that the Government was planning a loan of $35,000,000 for mining manganese in Brazil.

I have consistently fought this stupid policy and have urged a progressive domestic program for mining and conserving our natural resources. Last fall I backed a bill to encourage tin mining in the United States, but to no avail. Later when we asked for an appropriation to keep our mines going and to stockpile strategic materials, what happened. The bill was defeated but another appropriation was approved sending millions to Africa and South America for mining projects.

There are approximately 350 useful minerals in Colorado, including molybdenum, essential to industrial and war purposes.

For instance, approximately 75 percent of the world's supply of molybdenum is produced in my State. Is it not imperative that this production be encouraged and protected then?

Tungsten, uranium, vanadium, tin, and fluorospar are other important metals mined in Colorado. They are all essential to the manufacturing of electrical equipment, tools and dies, and aircraft production. Without these minerals no modern nation can survive. Colorado produces 88 percent of the supply of vanadium.

Reliable sources say Colorado has sufficient coal stored in the ground to supply world demands for hundreds of years. An excellent grade of oil can be made from coal shale. Should not our Nation be developing this rich resource? War machinery rolls on oil. Domestic and industrial uses for all are steadily increasing.

Reports say that about $3,000,000,000 worth of precious and industrial metals have been taken from the Rocky Mountains since the gold rush of 1859. There is as much or more still there which can be removed and used. This will mean jobs, an expanding economy, and security for us, if the Government will lend a hand. Today's emergency and common sense call for action in utilizing our mineral resources for the good of the country.

The Truth About Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the seriousness of the threat of world war III demands that the people of the United States be told the truth about Korea. With the facts, they can force our leaders to adopt corrective measures to prevent future mistakes that might inevitably lead to a world war.

No one should, for political purposes, distort the truth in pinning the blame for our unwise far-eastern policies. We must face the facts. Then we can go about the tough business of strengthening our military effort and save unnecessary loss of blood and treasure in winning the battle for peace.

Despite reports of the Democratic congressional committee the truth is that our military assistance to Korea prior to June 25, 1950, totalled only $57,000,000. This is the official record, according to House Report No. 2495, issued July 11, 1950, under the sponsorship of Representative JOHN KEE, Democrat, of West Virginia, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Of this $57,000,000, the facts are that $56,000,000 was small arms and equipment of constabulary nature left behind by American forces when they were withdrawn from South Korea in 1949. Is it any wonder our boys were fighting powerful Russian tanks with rifles when the Communists invaded below the thirty-eighth parallel? This withdrawal was protested by Republican members of the committee in an official document issued July 26, 1949, as occurring "at the very instant when logic and common sense both demand no retreat from the realities of the situation."

The Democratic congressional committee attempts to argue that the so-called Korean Aid Bill which was rejected by the House January 19, 1950, then passed after revision by the House Foreign Affairs Committee on February 9, 1950, is a measurement of the congressional attitude toward blocking Soviet expansion in Asia.

Let us look at the record. The Republicans for 5 long years have been in total and complete opposition to the policy laid down by the Truman administration appeasing Russia in Asia which resulted in the fall of Manchuria, China, and North Korea without a battle. This appeasement policy dates from the Yalta conference, where Alger Hiss was a State Department adviser, in February 1945, and it continued until June 27, 1950, when Truman reversed the American position. Under this policy, President Truman on December 15, 1945, told China that unless Communists were admitted to the Chinese Government, the United States would supply no further aid.

The administration abandoned Asia to the Russian wolves on January 12, 1950. Secretary of State Acheson declared then that our "defensive perimeter runs along the Aleutians to Japan and then goes to the Ryukyus," in other words, telling the world we would not intervene to halt Communist aggression in China, Formosa, or Korea, all lying above that perimeter.

One week after Acheson's statement, on January 19, 1950, a majority of the House Republicans joined 61 Democrats in rejecting the so-called Korean-aid bill which contained only economic assistance, warning the administration that without military aid to Korea and appropriate assistance to other critical areas in Asia, the proposed $150,000,000 in economic aid would not only be useless but would be a prize dangled before the Communist aggressors.

In opposing the appeasement of communism in Asia, the Republicans, both in and out of Congress, protested the policy, which, in the words of Owen Lattimore who helped shape it, provided, not military assistance, but economic assistance so that China and Korea would be allowed "to fall without making it look as if the United States had pushed them."

The people also should know that the Democratic-controlled Eighty-first Congress and the Democratic-controlled House Foreign Affairs Committee approved the so-called Korean-aid bill on July 26, 1949, and the House Rules Committee, also Democratic-controlled, approved it September 27, but it was not called up for House action during the remaining months of the first session. Is it not obvious that the Administration was insincere in wanting to help Korea?

None of the economic assistance voted to South Korea in February of this year had been supplied when she was attacked 4 months later. Of the $10,500,000 made available for military aid last October, only $200 in signal corps wire had reached the Korean forces when the boom fell June 25, 8 months later.

There is the record. Our Government bowed to communism in Asia and deserted helpless South Korea, which our State Department had set up as an independent state after the war.

We must have a foreign policy for the future, not only to "save face" in the Far East, but to show our friends that we are sincerely striving to protect the world and free peoples from aggression and totalitarianism.

Subversive Activities Control and Communist Registration Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, the measure before us today is as much of a defense measure as any bill we have ever passed to increase the size of our Armed Forces or for appropriations for armament. For years the Members of this House who have seen the insiduous danger of the cancerous Communist ideology creeping through our country have asked the Congress for legislation which would arrest it. Three years ago the House passed such legislation, but it took the impact of a war to bring its need into bold relief. We have sent billions of dollars to Europe to contain communism, and have failed to contain it within our own shores. That is what this legislation is designed to do.

It is no longer 5 minutes of 12. Already the first gong of the hour is being struck in Korea. The danger from an alien-directed force designed to wreck the freedom and liberty we were born to defend is clear and present. I, personally, could not face the sturdy Americans I have the honor to represent if I did not support this bill wholeheartedly.

Let's Save Our Country—John 3: 16 to 21

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Dear Mr. JENSEN: I very much appreciated your nice letter of information a few months ago and the speech enclosures which were to the point.

Very much is my desire to get the enclosed missle as far as it can possibly go. Do I need make another copy and address elsewhere? I trust you will let me know.

Very sincerely,
MRS ETHEL IRWIN,
Sidney, Iowa.

TO OUR CONGRESSMAN—MR. JENSEN:

We, as a group of church ladies, professing and believing on the Lord Jesus, the Christ, and the power of His might, send you these lines in His name:

We and our families as life-long residents of this great America feel that we have a right to a better introduction into the great intricate powers of our Government.

Our wonderful country was first settled by those who came a long way for the privilege of the freedom to worship God. If anything is to succeed, it must go ahead. It must progress. It must grow in goodness.

In the estimation of the peoples, where does the one stand who is giver of all?

Ours is the only land which has as its motto: "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people." Also "that it shall not perish from the earth."

We desire a report on the spending of the millions of dollars that our Government asked for and received in the past 5 years. We realize it takes lots of money to maintain a government, but these unsurmountable amounts?

Every time a crisis arises in some distant land, our boys are sent to face a cruel death. The torture they undergo while on duty, other unknown tortures they receive, the many deaths, and the great number who are sent back to hospitals and other institutions, the endless grief of their loved ones who also must help bear the heavy burden of taxation they must pay to help pay for the essence which robbed the loved ones of their health or life. These healthy boys have a right to life and liberty.

We stand for the right, but did not raise our sons to go to war year after year. They dare not evade the draft call, yet Communist bands are allowed to formulate and carry on in our own county. These and other forms of underhand functioning all around us—watching, learning, and in a few hours carry our great Nation's standing to jealous and war-loving nations.

Where does our money go? What does the Bible say about those with greed as their goal?

On entering office are not anyone and everyone under oath? Do they not vow—under God—"I shall carry on * * * best interests of my country's Government * * *."

Something is wrong. At this rate we will not have a country of freedom very long.

Every form of amusement is patronized to the utmost. Why is it that every Sunday morning finds the greatest number of people at any place but at the church house? Going backward?

A great spiritual awakening is our country's call. Our earnest prayer is that such will invade every hall of our Nation's Capital and that each of us and each one we have elected to our Government force will deeply feel the strength to be gained thereby. Certain officials have the privilege of talking directly to all nations. Encourage this in every address in Congress—every speaker, and pass it on to all nations. Let us save our country. John 3:16–21.

Please, may we hear from you?

General Appropriation Act, 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
Washington, D. C., August 30, 1950.

Hon. FREDERICK J. LAWTON,
Director, Bureau of the Budget,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DIRECTOR: The General Appropriation Act for 1951 includes section 1214, which reads:

"Appropriations, reappropriations, contract authorizations, and reauthorizations made by this act for departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government shall, without impairing national defense, be reduced in the amount of not less than $550,000,000 through the apportionment procedure provided for in section 1211 of this act."

Under the provisions of this section it will be necessary for you, as the official empowered to make apportionments under subsection (d) of section 3679, as amended, to place in reserve and withhold from expenditure not less than $550,000,000 of the amounts provided in the general appropriation bill. In view of the fact that there has been some discussion as to how this reduction would be applied to the various items in the budget it occurs to me that I should call your attention to a few of the considerations in the legislative history of the act for your guidance in making the fund reserves contemplated.

You will recall that an amendment was offered on the floor of the House by Mr. THOMAS, of Texas, requiring the President to impound $500,000,000 of funds appropriated in the bill with certain restrictions as to the amount by which single items might be reduced and also exempting items related to the national defense. As a substitute Mr. TABER, of New York, offered an amendment to make reductions totaling $600,000,000 and proceeding to specify percentage reductions in the standard budget classifications such as personal services, travel, etc. The proposal of Mr. TABER applied to every item in the budget but specifically reduced those amounts chargeable to budget classifications 1 to 9, inclusive.

Also the House adopted the so-called Jensen amendment which would have frozen 90 percent of the vacancies occurring in Federal employment during the fiscal year excepting certain exempted categories such as law-enforcement officers, hospital personnel, and so forth.

During the consideration of the bill in the Senate the Taber-Thomas and Jensen amendments were stricken from the bill and there was substituted therefor the so-called Byrd-Bridges amendment (Senate amendment No. 508) which reduced by 10 percent all appropriations in the bill except certain specified items.

The conference between the Houses was confronted with the Taber-Thomas, Jensen and Byrd-Bridges amendments, all of which were subject to inclusion, in either original or revised form, in the bill or exclusion from the bill by the conferees. After considerable discussion the conferees determined upon the language which now appears in section 1214 of the appropriation act.

I recite all this rather obvious and well-known history for the purpose of demonstrating that it is the clear intent of the Congress that the reduction imposed by section 1214 is intended to apply generally to the items in the Act. Any other interpretation would not be supported by the facts. The specific phraseology of the statute is that reduction shall be accomplished "without impairing national defense." That phrase does not necessarily mean that all items appearing in the national defense chapter of the budget are untouchable. It does mean that any item in either the national defense chapter or any other chapter of the bill which is related to the national defense shall not be reduced to the point where such reduction would impair national defense and, further, that any item in either the national defense or other chapters of the bill which can be reduced must be reduced. Every effort that has been made during the consideration of the bill in both the House and the Senate and in conference has been to obtain general reduction in the nondefense portions of the budget.

Opponents of the theory of section 1214 have stated—and I do not agree with their reasoning—that the Director of the Budget has been granted plenary powers to impose reductions wherever he may please and, in so doing, thwart the will of Congress. The Director of the Budget in discharging his responsibilities under the law is restricted in several ways. He is restricted by the law in two specific provisions. In the first place he is required by section 3679, as amended, to apportion funds in such a manner as to avoid deficiency or supplemental appropriations except in those special cases meeting the tests of other provisions of the law and therefore beyond his control. Secondly, he is required to so apportion the funds as to achieve the most effective and economical use thereof. He is also very pointedly restricted by the force of circumstances surrounding the adoption of section 1214. It seems obvious that he must give consideration to a general revision of the nondefense portions of the budget. To fail to do so would result in failure to recognize the clear intent of Congress in enacting the legislation as every proposal for a general reduction in the budget applied across the board to every item. The only difference between section 1214 and the Taber-Thomas and Byrd-Bridges and Jensen amendments is to leave to the Director of the Budget a degree of discretion in applying the reduction so as adequately to maintain essential services of the Government. It has also been stated that the Director of the Budget can defeat the purpose of the law by deferring meeting obligations until a later date or by paper savings such as postponement of essential items which will not affect the actual expenditure of funds. To accomplish the reduction in such manner would be such an obvious violation of the spirit of the statute that no responsible official would think of it. I mention it here only because the possibility has been suggested and I want to make it clear that while technically such action might be possible it is entirely without the realm of reason when the legislative history of the law is considered.

There is an important part of the language in section 1214 which has been obscured in the publicity regarding it. The section has been generally stated to be a reduction of $550,000,000 whereas the reduction reads "not less than $550,000,000." I want to particularly call your attention to this phraseology and to point out to you that this wording places the burden on the Director of the Budget to impose reductions above and beyond $550,000,000 to such a degree as is possible without impairing national defense. The clear intent of the section is to secure as large a reduction as possible in nondefense activities and $550,000,000 is only a minimum figure. In view of the radical change in conditions since the original budget was prepared there is no alternative.

In order that the committee may be fully advised in the matter I shall appreciate it if you will send me a report showing the reserves established.

I have known you personally for a number of years and I know your personal integrity and devotion to duty so well that I realize the lack of necessity of writing this letter to you but I thought it well to record the legislative history and atmosphere surrounding the item in order that there may be no misunderstanding in the future.

Sincerely yours,

CLARENCE CANNON,
Chairman.

Letter From Irwin Koropas, of Grand Rapids, Mich.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, several days ago, I received a letter from a constituent which expressed a point of view that all of us might well pursue in the critical months ahead. The future security of our country is vastly more important than partisanship and I have assured Mr. Koropas that it is my intention to refrain from criticism that can be construed to be on the political level. However, at the same time I strongly believe it important to examine the records of the past and point out our previous errors so that the same mistakes will not reoccur hereafter. For the information of the Members, Mr. Koropas' letter follows:

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.,
August 26, 1950.

Representative FORD:

First of all let us understand each other—I did not vote for you, for I happen to be a Democrat as far as my political views are concerned, but right now I am burning.

Burning because it does not seem possible, that we have both Democrats and Republicans in Congress who think more of their own political ambitions, selfishness, and greed, over the welfare of our country.

I, as a Navy veteran, think it is downright rotten and think it is about time both the Democrats and Republicans got off their proverbial high horse and got down to the serious business of preserving our great country. I love this country, fought for it, and hope to live in it a few more years until our good Lord feels I have served his purpose and calls me.

No, I am not a religious fanatic, but honestly believe in God and feel that He is doing everything in His power to wake us up to the dangers of communism.

Strange, we always have to learn the hard way, through tears, blood, and sweat, but I think it will be ever thus until we think more of our fellowmen, instead of our own personal gain, political ambitions, selfishness, and greed.

Please read this to Congress if you got the guts, which I think you have.

Sincerely,

IRWIN KOROPAS,
Grand Rapids, Mich.

Petition Calling for Reimposition of the Excess-Profits Tax Before Adjournment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER B. HUBER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, since the outbreak of the Korean crisis I have urged the immediate reimposition of the excess-profits tax which was suspended at the end of World War II. I have made a number of statesments to this body on the economic, fiscal, and moral justification for an excess-profits tax on the tremendous profits realized by corporations since the outbreak of hostilities.

Two days ago I announced that I had drawn up a petition for the reimposition of the excess-profits tax before adjournment. I have been most gratified by the spontaneous reaction of the Members of this body to this petition. I appeal to the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. DOUGHTON, and to his outstanding committee, to take under immediate consideration the need for an excess-profits tax now.

I wish to include in the RECORD at this time a copy of the petition which I drew up 2 days ago and the names of the 101 Members who have signed this petition:

We, the undersigned, are unwilling to adjourn until action is taken to reimpose the excess profits tax which was suspended in 1945. The excess profits tax should be applicable to income earned after July 1, 1950.

It should be imposed now for it is now that men are dying on the battlefield; it is now that expenditures for war are being accelerated; it is now that inflationary price increases are reducing the buying power of the dollar; and it is now that unprecedented corporate profits are being realized. To wait until next year would forever relieve these excessive profits accumulated during the last half of calendar 1950 from proper taxation.

The excess profits tax should be imposed now to help prevent inflation and to help pay for the war as we go. We cannot ask the workingman to pay more taxes, to have his real income further diminished by inflation and to refrain from requests for increased wages as long as corporate profits are not curbed by excess profits taxation. Furthermore, the pending tax bill, falling heavily on small and moderate-sized personal incomes, is pitifully inadequate to meet the needs of the day.

We are confident that a workable excess profits tax can be enacted at this time. The technical difficulties of reimposing the excess profits tax now are infinitesimal compared with the difficulties of moving men and material to the battle lines in Korea.

Communist Rule in Shanghai and Tientsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter I have received from Abe Schnee, of New York, along with the enclosure he mentions in his letter. I agree with Mr. Schnee that the letter to Lester Shingle should be read by many people.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: I thought you would be interested to read the letter attached, copies of which I am sending also to some of your fellow Members.

A. C. SCHNEE.

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 28, 1950.

DEAR KIWANIAN: When I read a copy of the attached letter, the realization of what can happen to people under a communistic form of government was so shocking that I felt every person should read it, especially my fellow Kiwanians.

I have had a reprint of the letter made and I am taking the liberty of sending you a copy. I know that I need not tell you we must all do whatever we can individually and as a unit to destroy the communistic threat to our free and democratic existence without which life would not be worth while.

Sincerely,

"ABE" SCHNEE.

TRINITY WORKS,
Manchester, July 25, 1950

Mr. LESTER SHINGLE,
The Shingle Leather Co.,
Camden, N. J.

DEAR MR. LESTER SHINGLE: Yesterday I spent an hour here with an old friend of this company, who represented our interests in the Far East for many years.

He has just returned to England after 2 years' experience of Communist rule in Shanghai and Tientsin.

His story was so cold-bloodedly enthralling and his comments on Korea of sufficient interest that I think you would like to hear the gist of it all.

George Beswick is a typical old school tie Englishman now in his late fifties who has spent 35 years of his life in the Far East, who now finds himself back in England with a life's work confiscated or destroyed looking for a new start. What he had to tell me and his answers to my questions were expressed in the matter of fact way with marked understatement that is typical of his type.

When Communist Chinese soldiery entered into Shanghai they took over the city with orderly discipline that was beyond reproach. Their attitude to everybody was one of cold, formal courtesy. There was no pilferage, no unseemliness, nothing but an awe-inspiring cold efficiency. In so much that for a week or so of wishful thinking European and American business interests in Shanghai thought there was a possibility of trade revival.

During his 18 months he never saw any Russian soldiers except odd parties bent entirely on technical duties.

Within a month, however, thousands of civilian-clad Russian bureaucrats quietly and with ruthless efficiency took command of the life of the city, commerce, and personal freedom.

Every man received his instructions, was told what he could do when and where. There was no appeal, nothing but cold impersonal refusal to discuss anything outside the limits of the directive the state official was enforcing.

The control was so detailed that it was necessary for a citizen to go to any post office and find out which film he was permitted to see, which theaters were open, which places of entertainment he could use.

All children over 4 years of age were directed through their parents to certain schools and within a year the corroding infiltration of Communist doctrine was so installed into the minds of these young people that they were foreign to their parents.

You can imagine what all this has meant to the highly developed individualism of a freedom-loving Chinaman, who as Beswick repeated, are still dazed under the influence that has settled upon them.

To quote Beswick further, "the gift of speech was no longer necessary. It was sufficient to be able to read and obey without question. There was no one to question and it was most unwise to try and find anybody."

Europeans and American citizens were just ignored at first. Later on their personal bank balances were frozen and they were compelled to make a statement of all their personal property.

Within a few days they were advised of the amount of taxation they had to pay within 3 days. If this was not paid within 3 days—and how could it be with their bank accounts frozen except for a very meager weekly drawing for living expenses—the amount of tax was doubled. At the end of 6 days it was doubled again and so on until the amount of tax was more than the value of the property when it was seized for debt.

It was decided that the use of a motorcar was a dangerous thing in the hands of an ordinary citizen, but there was no seizure. The price of petrol was lifted overnight to a prohibitive figure and simultaneously a car tax imposed equivalent to $50 of your money per week. No further action was necessary.

You will agree with me that the matter of fact statements of such men as Beswick should be widely circulated. As he concluded on this subject, "for 18 months I have been governed by the most evil, insidious and horrible things that man has ever devised with which to punish himself."

Korea came as a great surprise to him. Apparently it was the view of the foreign opinion in Shanghai that an excuse would be trumped up to enable Communist China to invade Indochina and so overrun Burma and eventually Malaya.

His theory is that communism has the effect on a nation that maggots have in a cheese. They burrow under the surface and multiply until by sheer force of numbers and activity they are forced out into the open and erupt. He thinks North Korea erupted, perhaps even before Moscow was aware. Secondly, as it had erupted it was decided to use it as a test of what the Western World and particularly your country's action would be.

Nevertheless as he continued—"but who knows what is in the mind of Moscow? Even under Hitler you did see a man who occasionally came before the people and addressed them, but under communism nobody knows from whom the order has come or when an order will come—not even members of their own party until the order is in their hands."

After his experience, Beswick is preaching the need for the utmost vigilance even in countries such as mine and yours which we do not think can become breeding grounds for the communistic maggots. He says who knows until the enemy strikes. In every country so far there has been underground growth that has come suddenly to the surface; each man trained and ready to do the job allotted to him.

All this I hope you have found at least interesting.

Yours sincerely,

FRANK.

Texas Youth Recommended for Life-Saving Award

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the editor of the Calvert Tribune, Mr. Joe H. Fietsam, has called my attention to a recent incident in his city in which a 21-year-old youth was responsible for saving the life of a 10-month-old child. The latter had been bitten by a large copperhead snake and it was only through the prompt action of this young man that the child's life was saved.

The youth referred to is Mr. John R. Rhodes, of Hearne, Tex., and a recommendation has been forwarded to the American Red Cross that he be considered for a lifesaving award by reason of his heroic action on August 9.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the news article that appeared in the Calvert Tribune on August 17 describing the near-tragic incident which resulted in a typical American youth demonstrating the alert and lifesaving action that we know our young people are capable of. The article follows:

HEARNE YOUTH HELPS PREVENT TRAGEDY

Prompt and efficient first aid, administered by John R. Rhodes, 21-year-old Hearne youth, last week, Wednesday, was the prime factor in saving the life of 10-month-old Mickey Wiley, who had been bitten by a large copperhead snake at the home of his grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Lander, who live near Calvert on the Bremond highway.

The story, as it was received here, goes something like this: The mother, Mrs. Sue Wiley, was sitting in a chair on the lawn near the flower beds, while her mother, Mrs. A. L. Lander, connected the garden hose and prepared to water the flower beds, passing within 3 feet of the snake, unaware of its presence. The baby, meanwhile, had toddled into the same place, only closer, and stepped on the coiled snake, which bit him on the leg. At his first cry it was thought that he had been stung by a wasp, but on closer examination, the four teeth marks of the reptile were discovered. The ladies picked up the baby and rushed to the highway nearby to flag a passing car, as they were without a car and no telephone handy. About this time J. R. Rhodes happened to be passing by, and sensing that the ladies were in need of help, he stopped. He was asked to give first aid to the baby and with a razor blade he quickly made the incisions and sucked the blood and poison from the wounds.

Noticing the commotion, a neighbor, Frank Mocek, came over and took the ladies and child to Bremond where Dr. Sanders gave further first aid. The baby was then rushed to a Marlin hospital for treatment.

Mr. Wiley came for his family on Friday of last week and took them to their home in Bay City, where the little fellow is recuperating. From reports received this week he is well on the road to recovery.

The unselfish action of the Hearne youth, John R. Rhodes, is very commendable and we cannot praise him too much for his noble deed. It goes to prove that there are many things a person can do when put to the test. He is a son of Mr. and Mrs. C. T. Rhodes, of Hearne.

Eliminating Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAY J. MADDEN

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, every informed person realizes that the heads of organized labor in America are doing a great work in their effort to curb and eliminate the progress of Communists and communism within their ranks. We realize that the strategy of the Communist is to first infiltrate labor organizations so as to hamper not only production in peacetime, but especially in wartime.

All patriotic Americans owe a debt of gratitude to American labor leaders for their organized campaign against Communists and communism.

The following statement from Philip Murray is very illuminating as to the anti-Communist campaign made by the CIO labor union:

PHILIP MURRAY SAYS TRADE-UNIONS MAKE IT TOUGH GOING FOR REDS

American trade-unionists are devoting a lot of time and effort these days to the task of making democracy work better.

Believe me, it is a big job—a hard, complicated job. There is nothing simple about it.

It would be easy, as some groups have found, to say that democratic ideals are wonderful, that everybody should believe in them—and then let it go at that.

We in the CIO have learned, however, that there are many persons in our country who would like to have a Nation operated by the "chosen few," with the many merely trailing along behind.

Some of these are Communists—men and women who would, if they could, impose on us the same type of totalitarian rule that has abolished freedom and made life miserable for millions in the so-called Soviet satellites.

Free trade-unions have been giving the Communists a rough time at home and abroad. The CIO is now in the midst of a house-cleaning that is rapidly destroying one of the most important bases of operations ever obtained by the Communist Party in the United States.

I have an idea that most Americans by now are aware of the menace of communism, but I am not so sure they are fully aware of other forces which undermine the foundations of our democracy.

One important group which stands in the way of democracy's working as it should is composed of those who fight the expansion of civil rights.

This group, by and large, believes in white supremacy and advocates second-class citizenship for a large segment of our population. It discriminates against men and women because of their race, creed, and color.

The most adamant of those who fight civil rights legislation actually advocate a "master race."

We in the CIO are now fighting vigorously to win Nation-wide recognition of the idea that all men are created equal and that they must be provided equality of opportunity.

We believe that only by providing such equality can we have the type of democracy which will appeal to all men everywhere. To achieve it we must eliminate racial and religious discrimination and do away with voting restrictions which prohibit full use of the ballot.

Occasionally I read newspaper stories quoting politicians who say that labor has learned through experience that the Taft-Hartley Act is not as bad as union leaders pictured it and that the unions really aren't anxious to have Taft-Hartley repealed. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Experience has shown that the Taft-Hartley Act is loaded heavily on the side of those who fight unions, that it is restrictive, that it interferes seriously with the right to organize and bargain collectively, and that it should be abolished and replaced by legislation that is fair to both labor and management.

And, despite what some of the "experts" say, the Taft-Hartley Act will be a real issue in the 1950 congressional elections. That's because we believe that unfair curbs on labor weaken our democracy.

The major segments of American labor are very active this year in the field of political action because unionists want to block efforts to wipe out social and economic gains that have been achieved under the Roosevelt and Truman administrations.

Our Nation, the world's richest, can well afford to provide its people with greater security against economic hazards, with better educational facilities, with improved health services, and with guaranties against discrimination based on race, creed, and color.

It was because of problems such as those mentioned here that I recently proposed close cooperation among all democratic union groups in the country and the establishment of a committee to help coordinate our efforts and work toward eventual organic unity of the American labor movement.

And it is because of such problems that I urge all Americans to participate fully in this year's elections.

One way to make democracy work better is for all the people to express their views where they count—at the polls.

Reporting on Ninth Fact-Finding Tour of Europe Since Start of World War II—Bruce Thomas Writes Letter for His Congressman's Information

OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues, with the permission of the writer thereof, I am privileged to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for your information and guidance of what I termed to be a very valuable factual statement. I say "valuable" because it comes from a distinguished correspondent and a lecturer, Bruce Thomas, who resides in the important city of Compton, Calif., which is in the great Eighteenth Congressional District, which I have now had the honor to represent two terms in this Congress. Knowing that he had a background of many years of experience of foreign correspondence in Europe and Asia, and knowing that he had made approximately a dozen fact-finding tours on his own to Europe since the beginning of World War II in order to study and report on Washington and economic conditions as well as political trends and having personally observed his desire to contribute whatever possible to the progress of our great Nation, I felt it was no imposition upon his unselfish attitude to ask that he send to me as soon as possible upon his return a letter giving me, as his Representative in Congress, his down-to-date observations. So, I am pleased to be able to pass it on to you.

COMPTON, CALIF., September 1, 1950.
Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CLYDE: This letter is written after my return from a 3-month fact-finding tour of nine western European countries; my ninth visit to Europe since the start of World War II.

As a free-lance correspondent and writer, I work on the basis that "facts operate; they do not threaten." I have no ax to grind. I am not paid to say what I am going to say nor do I say it to gain favor with those who want it said. Probably as good an example is the fact that I am a dyed-in-the-wool Republican, but I voted for you in the last election.

If you were one of the 275,000 Americans who were in Europe last summer, you could not help but notice the thousands of examples of "El Marshall Plan" or "Het Marshall Plan" or "Den Marshall" or "Il Piano Marshall" or just plain "The Marshall Plan"—the European Recovery Plan. You would have seen thousands of ERP signs in any one of the sixteen participating western European nations.

They have started the third of the promised 4 years of assistance from the United States. Starting in 1948, to end in 1952, the Marshall plan has given food, clothing, new opportunities, security and hope to millions of human beings. Once again whole communities are on the road to recovery and normal living. No one in western Europe is faced with starvation or freezing this year. Life is worth living again because men are at work. Millions include America and the people of our country in their prayers. I know because I have talked with hundreds of people in all walks of life in those countries. "God Bless America" is the theme song in thousands of homes today.

I have watched the Marshall plan at work for 3 years. I have seen ERP operate in eleven of the sixteen participating European nations, most of which would have come under the hammer and sickle, had we not stepped in and given the necessary and timely life-giving help.

South Ireland, Portugal, Switzerland, Denmark and Sweden, all neutral countries, which were believed to be prosperous because they stayed neutral during the war, actually suffered great economic losses. Imports and exports were curtailed. Tourism, one of their main crops, was nonexistent. They are now finding their way back to normal under the ERP banner. If the above five countries felt the 6 years of conflict without bombs dropping on their cities, imagine what this greatest humanitarian movement of all times meant to England, Netherlands, France, Turkey, Denmark, and Italy.

I have placed Italy last in this group because the Italians were really low men on the European totem pole. This is a country of 48,000,000, people crowded together in an area smaller than the State of California. As our enemy we gave her a thorough going-over from the air, sea, and land. German armies finished the job of devastation in their retreat through Italy to the north. Scores of villages were razed to the ground, thousands of Italian peasants were shot for reasons known only to the Germans. Most bridges, railroad trestles and tunnels were destroyed. Hundreds of miles of railroad right-of-way were torn up and dynamited. Engines and rolling stock of all kinds were damaged beyond repair. Power plants, dams, factories, in fact everything the Germans knew we could use in our occupation were levelled. Thousands of farm buildings were torn up. Practically every horse, cow, sheep, and oxen had disappeared. If not butchered for food, the animals were slaughtered, as part of the German plan of retreat. They did everything but poison the soil. Plows, rakes, harrows, farm equipment of all kinds were either destroyed or taken into Germany. Thousands of acres of land in the Pontine marshes to the south of Rome were inundated. This undid the work of generations.

We have been intelligently selfish in our all-out aid to this poverty-stricken country. The Communists were more sure of taking over Italy as another satellite than you are sure that the red flag will never fly over America. Had Italy disappeared behind the iron curtain, Spain, France, Greece and Turkey without a question of doubt would have followed. Millions were on the political fence in these countries watching Italy as their standard of comparison.

Probably one of the most interesting projects in all of western Europe is now being contemplated on the island of Sardinia. Approximately the same size as Vermont or New Hampshire, this island has laid as a wild barren terrain for more than 3,000 years. Archeologists know that from two to three million people once inhabited this island. Farming was their means of support. It was then a fertile farming country. During the next 5 years, if present plans mature, there will be a migration of over 1,000,000 people transplanted from overcrowded Italy to Sardinia. Thousands of acres of brush and small forest growth will be cleared away. Plans for great pumping plants, drainage canals, and aqueducts are already in the making. Vast arid acres in southern Italy are actually undergoing the same treatment. Eventually millions of people will inhabit these new farm areas. Here is one answer to Italy's serious overpopulation problem.

During the last year it was estimated that interest in communism dropped from 10 percent to as high as 50 percent in some areas. Many feel that if there were to be an election in Italy tomorrow, that more than half the Communist senators would lose their seats.

There are some Americans who feel that we should let these people pull out of their own mess. Let's take an honest, an unbiased look. The Marshall Plan is but 13 percent of your yearly tax total. Isn't that good insurance and a good investment when you consider the following: Had we pulled out of Europe and let these people stew in their own juice, we could have saved an immediate $15,000,000,000. That Spain, France, western Germany, Turkey, Greece, Italy, and other western European countries would be Russian satellites today there is absolutely no doubt. Our isolationists and pacifists would see their dream come true. We would be isolated in our own little Western Hemisphere with the world on fire—good red fire, on both sides of us. And don't ever doubt that we wouldn't be marked as the next in line. And within a few years from now it would take 50 percent of our national income for defense and life wouldn't be worth living in America.

I liken many of us to the man who is out in his back yard fighting a fire in his trash pile with his little water pistol or flit gun. The trash pile is made up of many little hates, now running rampant through America: the colored question, the Jewish problem, the Catholic situation, and "those Protestants, because they are in the majority, think they can run everything" and anti this and anti that. He is so busy with his petty thinking that he can't hear the crackle of red flames nor hear his children screaming for help, trapped on the second floor of his burning home.

God save America. God save the world through America. God save America through us.

Sincerely yours,

BRUCE THOMAS.

The General MacArthur Military Faux Pas

OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that President Truman had stated that General MacArthur's VFW press release had been withdrawn and was now a closed matter, and most noncantankerous persons had fallen into line with the President's pronouncement, yet many noncooperatives, for the past several days now, have been in a high dither about the contents of General MacArthur's statement concerning the importance of Formosa from the standpoint of military strategy, and the military necessity that the United States go all out in the defense of Formosa, and these reactionary Republicans have boldly declared that it is not a closed matter at all—at least not for them.

These reactionary Republicans were never, to my knowledge during my approximately 2 years as a Member of the House of Representatives, more wild-eyed or a more wild-talking group. They were simply communistically frantic in the claim that President Truman, our Commander in Chief, had gagged or muzzled General MacArthur. Of course, this most manifest political frenzy was intensified when the reactionary Republican press of the Nation applied the journalistic blowtorch to their sensitive bottoms by headlining the whole MacArthur verbal episode with the dumb, unthinking headline words, "Truman's gag on MacArthur is GOP issue."

If I may be permitted to make my own humble observations concerning this matter, I will say that if that is the real GOP issue in the impending campaign, then the GOP—meaning the Gouging Old Party—is terribly at a loss for an issue. Just how one can make a telling issue out of insubordination on the part of a high military official to his Commander in Chief is beyond my understanding.

General MacArthur, it must be remembered, is a member of the military forces of the United States, holding a high position under our Nation and the United Nations in Japan and the Far East. Please remember that he is not only the supreme commander of the armed forces of the United Nations but is also a most high-ranking general of the United States Army and is initially functioning under our Commander in Chief, Harry S. Truman. Such an unthinkable act on the part of General MacArthur to endeavor intentionally or otherwise to usurp the power of his Commander in Chief, the President, and the functions of the State Department and of the United Nations would be a hard thing to make a real issue about. Of course, it must be remembered that every issue that the Republican Party has had for the last 3 years has been a phony one, and I guess we Democrats are expecting perhaps entirely too much now of these old-time unfitted-to-lead group. May I interject here now that I think that it would be difficult for a person to forgive General MacArthur's conduct.

Continuing now the main discussion, I say that if the reactionary Republican Party desires to make a national issue out of the utter thoughtlessness and insubordination of General MacArthur, as they threatened to do, then surely Republicanism as a political institution has hit an all-time low, and the real Americanism to be found in both of the two great major parties will never support, I am sure, such a miserable, dastardly issue.

No, gentleman, lack of amenability to duly constituted authority and vocal insubordination could never be a worthwhile issue to foist upon the present-day thinking and real patriotic citizenship of our land.

It really makes one laugh to see so many reactionary Republicans endeavoring to become patriotic by association. I presume they got this idea of trying to attach themselves to a military star from the old shyster prosecutor's notebook, that people could become guilty by association and therefore great and patriotic by association. This seems to have been the situation, as far as one of my colleagues at least, is concerned. I gather that once upon a time General MacArthur answered one of his letters, and since that time he has run up and down the hills of his district, and every place else he had access to, showing a letter that General MacArthur wrote to him. I cannot vouch for its credibility, but it has been told to me that he has shown that letter to every white-faced bull in the sandhill country. My advice to General MacArthur is not to write to these people any more because they are using his private correspondence only for their own purposes—purposes which will not add to his, General MacArthur's, luster or his glory at all.

Now, the thought might occur that perhaps General MacArthur had not been advised that he could not express himself as an individual citizen and divorce himself from his United States command and his supreme authority as commander of the forces of the United Nations in the East and Far East. Gen. Douglas MacArthur as an old-time tried and true soldier had no right to make an individual expression on any subject which might cause discordance, dissension, and disunity in this or any other hour. He had no right to take over the duties of the Chief Executive or the branch of our Government which has the sole duty to formulate policies in the Far East and elsewhere or the United Nations. He had been advised specifically, I have learned, not to do the very thing which he did—to release his so-called statement as an individual citizen or as a soldier.

I wish to quote the following from the Washington Post of September 1, 1950:

MACARTHUR WAS BRIEFED ON POLICY

(By Drew Pearson)

Here is a play-by-play account of what went on behind the scenes in the now historic rebuke of General MacArthur by President Truman.

First inkling that MacArthur had sent a message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars on the delicate question of Formosa came on Thursday, August 24, when Carlton Kent of the Chicago Sun-Times queried Roger Tubby, State Department press relations office, as to whether the MacArthur statement had been cleared by the State Department.

Tubby passed the query on to the White House and the Defense Department, found that neither had either seen or heard of the MacArthur statement. It had been sent direct to newspapers in a personal letter on August 21 with a release date of August 28. This was in direct violation of the White House directive laid down during the famous Henry Wallace-Jimmie Byrnes row, after which it was decreed that no statement on foreign policy could be published by any official without clearance.

President Truman himself did not see the MacArthur statement until Saturday, August 26, during a conference scheduled to hear the report of Navy chief, Admiral Forrest Sherman, and Army chief, Gen. Joe Collins, following their return from Tokyo.

At this conference Averell Harriman handed the President a copy of the MacArthur statement. Harriman, who is part owner of Newsweek magazine, had obtained a copy of the press release.

POLICY WAS EXPLAINED

Harriman told Truman that he had carefully explained American policy to MacArthur during his recent visit to Tokyo and that there was no reason for his misunderstanding it. Actually Harriman's trip was largely inspired by MacArthur's urge to occupy Formosa with American troops and his much-publicized hand-kissing visit to Mme. Chiang Kai-shek. It was felt that Harriman could diplomatically explain that the United States must work through the United Nations in regard to Formosa and that if the United States got embroiled in any conflict with China the Korean war would then last indefinitely.

Truman read the MacArthur statement and hit the ceiling. Without asking Secretary Acheson or any others present for their opinion, he directed Secretary of Defense Johnson to order MacArthur to withdraw his statement.

The President said that he was charged by the Constitution with the sole responsibility for the conduct of our foreign policy, that there can only be one voice of authority in expressing that policy, and that we can't have 2, or 3, or 10 people acting as official spokesmen.

He pointed out that in the case of Formosa we cannot act unilaterally but must continue our efforts through the United Nations.

He warned that if we let the MacArthur message go unchallenged every diplomat throughout the world will believe—despite our denials—that MacArthur was really speaking for the White House and that the diplomats will be convinced we're floating a trial balloon.

CABLE TO MAC ARTHUR

The cable which Secretary Johnson immediately dispatched to MacArthur read pretty much as follows: "The President of the United States directs that you immediately recall your statement addressed to the Veterans of Foreign Wars containing your views regarding Formosa. Your statement is not in accord with the established foreign policy of the United States as enunciated by the President."

Though Secretary Johnson has agreed with MacArthur on Formosa and once worked backstage to overrule the State Department on Formosa, other high military men in the Pentagon Building now take a different view. This holds true of many in both the Army and Navy.

In fact, Navy strategists are now recalling that during 1944 the Navy wanted MacArthur to occupy Formosa as a step toward bombing Japan and that MacArthur was vigorously opposed.

Plans for taking over Formosa were worked out in great detail by Admiral Nimitz in 1944 and approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in Washington. But MacArthur, who was determined to liberate his old love, the Philippines, overruled them.

Chief reason, however, that United States military men disagree with MacArthur on Formosa is that the Joint Chiefs of Staff are now among the people in Washington most eager to avoid any conflict which would cause Chinese troops to be sent into Korea.

If Chinese troops stay out of Korea, there seems to be a pretty good chance the war will be over easily this winter. But if the Chinese pour their vast hordes into Korea, the war could last almost indefinitely.

The following articles from the Christian Science Monitor of August 31 last gives a very accurate picture, I am sure, of how this General MacArthur message to the VFW was concealed from the proper sources and by-passed cunningly into the publicity it has received.

It may be said to the great credit of the Christian Science Monitor that unlike some other newspapers of the United States, it refused to publicize in its news columns, this alleged General MacArthur message which most certainly exhibits again the true spirit of journalism and a true patriotism and obedience to proper authority.

These articles are as follows:

MACARTHUR MYSTERY: HOW NOTE TO VFW ELUDED PRESIDENT

IN CAPITAL

(By Neal Stanford)

WASHINGTON.—Incredible as it may sound, Gen. Douglas MacArthur's message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars was received at the Pentagon without any official knowing about it several days before the White House knew it existed.

It happened in this manner:

General MacArthur in Tokyo had a choice of sending the personal message he had framed for the VFW gathering in Chicago via private cable or the Army's Signal Corps telecommunications. He chose to use the Army service.

The message first went from Tokyo to San Francisco to Chicago, without passing through the signal center in the Pentagon. It was a service message, a private communication from General MacArthur to Clyde Lewis, VFW commander in chief. At it was directed to Mr. Lewis in Chicago, San Francisco routed it direct to Chicago.

But in Chicago, United States Fifth Army headquarters, which received it, tried to deliver it to Mr. Lewis, only to be told he was not there yet. Then Tokyo was advised that the message was undeliverable.

Sent as private message

The next day, Tokyo repeated the message, but this time sent it to Washington for delivery to Mr. Lewis at VFW headquarters there. It again was sent as a service message—or private letter—from General MacArthur to Mr. Lewis. The signal center in Washington delivered it to VFW headquarters here just as Fifth Army headquarters had done in Chicago without questioning its contents.

It had been sent as a private message, and the signal center at the Pentagon treated it as such. There was no notice preceding, accompanying, or following it asking that its contents be called to the attention of any civilian or military official. Therefore no copies were made of it and sent to responsible authorities.

Meanwhile, General MacArthur's efficient publicity staff in Tokyo saw to it that copies of the speech, with a covering personal letter from the general, went to leading publishers in the United States.

No copy to Truman

But no copy went to President Truman, Defense Secretary Louis Johnson, Army Secretary Frank Pace, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the President's personal coordinator of policy, W. Averell Harriman, or to Secretary of State Dean Acheson—all of whom had a vital interest in its contents. In neither the first message via Army signal service telecommunications, which went direct to Chicago, nor the second one that passed through the Pentagon did General MacArthur ask that copies go to anyone. In both cases it was sent and treated as a private personal communication.

One of the most fantastic features of this incident is that while most of the press knew about the message and its contents, responsible officials in Washington knew nothing about it until August 25 and 26.

"New policy" question

President Truman first heard of it the morning of August 26 after a member of the press had asked a member of the White House staff about Washington's new policy on Formosa. Following the morning military briefing at the White House conducted by Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the President read the copy of the MacArthur message that had been provided by a member of the press. That was the first that General Bradley, Secretary Johnson, or Secretary Acheson had heard of it. It also was unknown before that Saturday to Secretary Pace and Deputy Secretary of Defense Stephen T. Early, according to their subsequent testimony.

After reading it to his startled audience, the President, without asking for advice or reactions, said quietly and evenly to Mr. Johnson: "Louis, I want you to direct General MacArthur to withdraw that statement." The only discussion was whether the general should be notified by telephone or writing. The President decided it should be put in writing.

Technically, then, it can be said that the message did pass through the Pentagon several days before the storm broke. But in that period no one in the Pentagon saw it except the clerk in the signal center who took it off the wire for delivery to VFW headquarters. And to him it was just another private communique to be treated as a Western Union office would treat a private telegram.

Messrs. Johnson, Early, Pace, and General Bradley did not sit on it: They had no knowledge that it existed. They did not ignore it, for they did not know of it.

Why General MacArthur took such pains to get the speech circulated among the press, but passed up every opportunity to circulate it among his superiors in Washington, is still unanswered here.

IN CHICAGO

(By Max K. Gilstrap, Chief of the Central News Bureau of the Christian Science Monitor)

CHICAGO.—President Truman's belated knowledge of and action on withholding Gen. Douglas MacArthur's message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars has accentuated interest in the question:

Exactly how long was General MacArthur's message in the hands of the Defense Department before the President knew about it?

The VFW public-relations chief informer reported here on August 28 that the MacArthur message has been received via the Fifth Army at VFW headquarters, Hotel Sherman, Chicago, on August 19.

Received August 22

It is learned now that the message was received on August 22. An original copy of the MacArthur cable examined by this reporter bears no clear date. It was attached to a letter from a Fifth Army lieutenant requesting that the VFW sign a receipt for the cable because "the general has contacted me no less than three times from Tokyo requesting some word on the disposition of subject message."

VFW public-relations officials say the cable was sent directly from Tokyo to the Fifth Army headquarters here. To pinpoint the exact date the MacArthur message was received in Washington, we contacted Omar B. Ketchum, director, national legislative service of the VFW. Mr. Ketchum first heard of the message, he said, "a week from last Tuesday morning" (August 22) at VFW headquarters in Washington.

Received from Pentagon

The Pentagon communications officer, he said, phoned him that morning that a message was coming in from General MacArthur for Clyde A. Lewis, commander in chief of the VFW. Mr. Ketchum was told that he could get the message about 3 p. m. that day after he assured the Pentagon that he was authorized to receive it.

The Pentagon, according to Mr. Ketchum, phoned him again the afternoon of August 22, and told him he could get it the next morning at 9 a. m. at which time he sent a messenger for it. Upon receiving the message, he contacted VFW headquarters at the Sherman Hotel in Chicago. He found that Chicago headquarters already had been notified of the message by the Fifth Army which was supplying the VFW with a copy.

Thus, according to VFW officials, the Defense Department in Washington and Fifth Army headquarters in Chicago had the MacArthur message on the Tuesday morning preceding the Saturday morning President Truman first heard of it.

On receipt of the MacArthur communication from the Fifth Army, the VFW office prepared copies and dispatched them to the wire services and to about 100 newspapers with the stipulation that the release date August 28 be observed.

Should We Let Our Physical Plant Deteriorate?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, it is from the good earth that all wealth must come. To a great degree our future standard of living and the strength of our Nation depends upon the earth and the resources that it holds. Each generation has an obligation to conserve our vital resources for the benefit of those that follow.

To some people the idea of saving our soil, of preventing it from being washed away by ravaging floods constitutes a program that may be desirable at some time when everything is just right. To the victim of a flood it is something different. To the alert student and to the thoughtful citizen such programs are a must. We cannot fulfill our obligations in the world today or in the immediate future if we allow all of our productive facilities to deteriorate. This applies to the soil especially.

In recent months the State of Nebraska has been in the news because of storms of all kinds. Torrential rains have descended in several parts of the State. The lives of our citizens have been taken, homes have been flooded, bridges and highways destroyed, railroads and industrial plants damaged and one of the greatest damages suffered is the loss of our soil Buildings can be rebuilt but soil erosion is a loss that requires years and years to overcome.

It is my privilege to represent in this Congress the southern part of Nebraska. Nebraska slopes from the northwest to the southeast. There is at least one point in Nebraska which is approximately a mile high, yet the southeast corner of the State is only 850 feet. All of our streams run in that direction. Our underground water moves in that direction. Consequently, the greater share of all the flood damage that has been suffered has occurred in this congressional district.

This year devastating floods have occurred on the Big Nemaha and the Little Nemaha Rivers and all the creeks and streams that flow into them, as well as on Salt Creek in the vicinity of Lincoln, Nebr., and the Little Blue and the Big Blue Rivers and their tributaries. Eleven people lost their lives. Some destructive floods have occurred this year in the much-flooded Republican Valley.

These floods are not just occasional floods. These things have been happening time and time again. A number of floods have been experienced on each of these streams in the last 5 or 10 years, but it goes back much further than that.

In my work here in Congress the past 12 years a considerable portion of my duties have been in connection with the Republican River development program. So many times have we called attention to the flood of 1935, which took 110 lives. I recall that in studying the history of the Republican River I learned that long before the white man came, or about in 1835, a flood equal to the 1935 flood occurred. The residents of the valley have experienced many very severe floods since 1935 during many different years, including the disastrous loss of 13 or 14 lives at Cambridge in 1947.

Today the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation have a great program under way in the Republican Valley. As the original sponsor of this program in Washington and the one upon whom the responsibility of getting the legislation and appropriations through the House of Representatives has fallen, I have been very close to the problems involved. It is my opinion that this development in the Republican Valley would have never become a reality if it had not been for the perseverance, faith, stick-to-it-iveness, and dogged persistence of the sturdy men and women living in that valley. Today the Army engineers are building the Harlan County Dam. They have completed local protective works at Bartley and Indianola. The Bureau of Reclamation is building Enders Dam on the Frenchman which flows into the Republican. They have completed the Medicine Creek Dam north of Cambridge. They are building the Bonney Reservoir on the south fork of the Republican on the Kansas-Colorado line and they have recently awarded the contract for the completion of the 1½-mile-long, 145-foot-high Trenton Dam on the main stem of the Republican River near Trenton. The Bureau is also constructing the Bostwick irrigation project, which will take the water from Harlan County Dam.

It has taken a good many years of work to advance this Republican River program. Such projects must start out with surveys and reports from the engineers. Then the Congress must authorize the project. These authorization laws approve the engineers' plans and provide that money may be appropriated. Then at a later time there must be appropriation bills.

In June 1944, after conferring with the local people in regard to their flood problem, I introduced the necessary resolutions which called upon the Army engineers to make an investigation and bring in a report and a plan for flood control for Salt Creek and the Big and Little Nemaha Rivers. These resolutions were approved by the House Committee on flood control on the 21st day of June 1944, and the Army engineers were assigned the job of formulating a flood-control program for these areas.

Pursuant to these resolutions passed by the flood-control committee of the House of Representatives, the Army engineers have made investigations and conducted studies. The investigations on Salt Creek are in progress and are well-advanced. The information that I received from the Army engineers is that their studies are being reexamined in light of the 1950 floods. It is estimated that their report will be submitted late in 1950.

On the Nemaha River, the Army engineers have made their studies and submitted the same to Washington. These plans have not yet been transmitted to Congress. The plans include seven small dams on tributaries of the Nemaha River and levee and channel improvements in four instances. The status of the flood-control plans for the Little Nemaha are the same as for the Nemaha River. These plans include four small dams and reservoirs on the tributaries of the Little Nemaha River and two levee and channel improvements.

The Army engineers have also completed their studies and a plan has been submitted to Congress for local protection work at Hubbell, Nebr., on Rose Creek which flows into the Big Blue River. This is a small project consisting of a levee and channel improvements on Rose Creek.

Likewise, the Army engineers has submitted a plan for local protection work at Beatrice, Nebr., where Indian Creek joins the Big Blue River. The plan calls for levee and channel improvements on the Big Blue River and on Indian Creek and the removal of a low dam on the Big Blue River, which seriously reduces the channel capacity at that point.

Valuable as the work of the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army Engineers is, their program alone is not a complete answer to the problem. They build the larger reservoirs and water-retarding structures. There is a job to be done with the control of smaller water courses and a job to be done on every farm. It is a soil-saving job.

The soil conservation program is making great strides in Nebraska. The entire State is organized into soil conservation districts. They can do and are doing an excellent piece of work. Their program is enabling the farmer not only to hold the soil and prevent water and wind erosion but to hold the water right where it falls. This work is indispensable.

However, there should not be a gap between the work of the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation and the individual work carried on by the farmer in his soil conservation district. These programs should merge. Consequently, I definitely feel that there is a great need for flood control to be carried on by the Department of Agriculture. They are doing that work now. They have had marked success in several watersheds. They construct smaller water-retarding structures. They bring about changes in land use that go beyond the scope and ability of the local soil conservation district. The Department of Agriculture can make a basin-wide approach which the individual soil conservation districts cannot do.

In southern Nebraska we need the flood control that is and will be provided by the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation, but we also need an agricultural soil conservation and flood-control program.

With this in mind a number of us have for several years advocated an agricultural flood control and soil conservation program for the entire Missouri River Basin. Such a program was formulated in the field and was sent to Washington. It remained in the Department for a number of months. It is now before the Congress as a part of House Document 373 of the Eighty-first Congress, first session. This House document includes recommendations for a great number of things pertaining to agriculture other than flood control and soil saving. Whether or not those other programs should be undertaken constitute questions to be answered by the Congress when a detailed study is made. I do favor an agricultural flood-control program for the Missouri River Basin. We need it in that part of Nebraska which I have the honor to represent.

With these problems in mind and the feeling that an over-all basin-wide program would take considerable time, Congressman STEFAN and I have introduced and secured passage of a resolution by the Subcommittee on Flood Control of the Public Works Committee and by the full Public Works Committee which directs the Department of Agriculture to bring in a flood-control program for the Salt Creek-Wahoo Creek basin.

This move was hastened by reason and activity of the organization of the residents of this Salt Creek area under the leadership of Raymond A. McConnell, Jr., and Otto Liebers. Leading citizens have been concerned about the flood problem and they are diligently seeking an answer to it. It is expected that the Department of Agriculture will have their report within 4 or 6 months.

Many thoughtful people are speaking out on this most important problem of conserving our greatest of all resources and protecting the people and their property from floods. I would like to include the following editorial by Raymond A. McConnell, Jr., in the Lincoln Journal, June 13, 1950:

In our continuing discussion and interpretation of Missouri basin development, we have been insisting for a long time on the principle that in an over-all program of water conservation and flood control on river dams and channel improvement alone are not enough, but must be coordinated with a program of conservation on the land—to hold as much water as possible where it falls and to retard damaging runoff at every possible point, beginning on the land and in the smaller upper tributaries.

The program to do this in the Missouri basin as a whole is called the Young plan (it was the Journal that dubbed it that after Gladwin Young of Lincoln who had a large hand in its preparation and the label has caught on). Not yet authorized by Congress, the Young plan proposes to supplement the Pick-Sloan program of work on the rivers which was begun in 1944.

In the Missouri basin as a whole, the Army and Bureau of Reclamation (Pick and Sloan) got started before there was widespread awareness of the broader concept of flood control as part of a larger problem integrally related with the lands of the watershed.

The result is that the Missouri basin project is 6 years and many hundreds of millions of dollars along, on the rivers, and the job under the Young plan, if and when it can be authorized and appropriated for, will be a mighty one of catching up.

But in our six-county Salt-Wahoo watershed, nothing has been authorized or started by any Federal agency, other than an Army engineers' survey which is still under way and won't be completed until fall.

Our opportunity locally, therefore, is not only to apply the over-all principle of flood control as a job to be planned from the standpoint of the watershed as a whole, but to apply this principle—based on the best of today's knowledge and techniques—virtually from the start. It is an opportunity both to demonstrate the validity of the over-all approach, beginning at the beginning, and to protect ourselves against flood and erosion damages in our area averaging as high as a million dollars annually.

Since the plans of the Army engineers for the Salt and Wahoo Creeks are still in the formative stage, our first problem is to get authorization for an agricultural plan for the watershed, its lands, and upper tributaries, that can be correlated, before work begins, with the Army's plans for the main channels.

There is a job to be done in flood control by the Department of Agriculture in all of the smaller watersheds. On those streams where either the Army engineers or the Bureau of Reclamation are building a major reservoir, the up-stream work of agriculture is very necessary. The holding of the soil above the reservoir prevents silting and determines the life and usefulness of the reservoir. An agricultural flood-control program for the upper portions of Medicine Creek is a case in point. Then there are other streams such as Beaver Creek, emptying into the Republican, where the flood problem is great, yet the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army engineers have not constructed any larger dams. An Agriculture Department program is very much needed in such watersheds as the Beaver Valley.

It must also be borne in mind that while the larger structures are necessary in many instances, they are costly and they take out of production some very fine land. If the flood problem can be handled by the Department of Agriculture in its treatment of the smaller watersheds and the upper tributaries, it is a better conservation program. Leading citizens have pointed out to me that in the case of the recent damaging flood at DeWitt, Nebr., that a huge dam on the Blue River would not have prevented the flood. The great damage was done because of the water coming down Walnut Creek. The Agriculture Department's program is the one that can cope with such a situation. A somewhat similar situation existed also at Crete. An Army engineer's dam on the Blue north of Crete appears not to be the answer and the local people are vigorously opposed to it.

A plan for an agricultural flood-control plan should be carried out for the watershed of the Big Blue River, the Little Blue River, the Big Nemaha River, and the Little Nemaha River and all of their tributaries. Individual farmers through their soil conservation district should first carry out their program; then the Department of Agriculture should be called on to build the small, less expensive dams and reservoirs and the other water-retarding structures in all of these watersheds in southeast Nebraska.

The Department of Agriculture can also bring about programs of land uses. Changes in land management together with the structures that the Department would construct would do a great deal toward preventing flood damages and erosion of the land. In all of these floods, the greatest dollar damage has been to the land. Such a loss is irreplaceable.

The need for protection against floods and the saving of our soil and the utilization of our water for agricultural purposes has long been the theme of Mr. Harry Strunk, editor of the McCook Daily Gazette. I wish to include an editorial written by him and appearing in that paper on July 11, 1950:

The floods in southeast Nebraska tonight are as ridiculous as the third world war in Korea—with lives lost and millions of dollars of our natural resources gone in torrents of waste water rushing down canyons, dry streams, creeks, and rivers—it is unbelievable that such a great State as Nebraska (the white spot) could be so dumb as to permit such a catastrophe.

But it is surely true, hundreds of families are evacuated from their homes, many have lost their savings and earnings stretching over years, and too many have lost their lives, because of what?

Because of a lack of understanding on the part of the people, such things happen. Because of a sense of security of which they never had. Only Mother Nature can tell us when it's going to rain, and how much; only Providence can tell us what the price will be; but good common sense can, or should, guide us on a program of at least self-preservation.

The history of Nebraska does not show that we have used any of these facilities too wisely. We have rested on our oars, trusting that Old Man Time and somebody else would take care of us. They have pretty much up until now * * * and then all hell breaks loose through the best part of the State, with torrential rains, high waters, death and destruction. Certainly, this disaster is no credit to the great State of Nebraska.

There are those in this State of some importance who knew 10 years ago, that the Bureau of Reclamation "had been invited to stay out of the State of Nebraska," but no one could find out definitely just who the fellow was, who had committed Nebraska to such an agreement. As a result, Nebraska is again paying the price—in lives, in loss of property, and destruction.

Southwest Nebraska has seen its share of this sort of folly and has taken some action to see that it never occurs again. The waste waters are being stopped at their source, and utilized for the benefits of the greatest number of people. Never again will the fine community of Cambridge see a 12-foot wall of water rush through its homes and business district and this is merely the beginning of a program which will stop forever such catastrophes as are happening in eastern and southeastern Nebraska today and tonight.

With all this as the background, there can be no logical criticism of either State or Federal agencies, or our representatives—it all comes back home—to a lack of understanding of our own responsibilities and a real appreciation of our firesides and the part we have to play on this great stage of probably the greatest show which has ever been produced—and that, probably is, self-preservation.

Every governmental program must take into account the Korean war situation and the heavy military demands placed upon this Government. This troubled international situation will be a definite factor in determining the timetable of any program undertaken. First things must come first. We should not lose sight of the fact, however, that agriculture, too, will go to war. The President is being given authority to ration food. We must think of our agriculture production potential not only now, but what it will be 5, 10, 50 or more years from now. Efforts to prevent America's physical plant from deteriorating can hardly be described as a welfare-state program. Conservation is always essential.

I always feel highly complimented when someone calls me a conservative. I want to conserve for the people now and for our children and our children's children the good things that have been handed to us. Foremost among those things which we should pass on intact are: the faith of our fathers, our representative Government, a solvent America, and a soil that is a little better and more productive at the close of our generation than it was at the beginning.

Loan to Mexico Is Finally Granted by Export-Import Bank—Justice Prevails at Last

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the decision of the Export-Import Bank to extend a United States loan of $150,000,000 to Mexico, as announced today by President Miguel Aleman of Mexico, in his annual "State of the Nation" address to the Mexican Congress, brings to a happy conclusion a long and bitterly fought battle against big interests in the United States who have opposed any loan of any kind or character. Justice has finally prevailed.

The effect of this action in promoting good will and a better understanding between our neighbor below the border, and ourselves, cannot be overestimated. The mutual benefits to be derived will have lasting results that will prove highly beneficial to both countries. Nothing could have been done by the Government of the United States that would show more certainly a desire upon our part to be friendly and helpful to a nation that has shown a loyalty to the same principles of democracy for which we stand. I am, likewise, certain that the ties of friendship that have bound us together in the past have been strengthened by this act upon the part of the United States.

The United States loan made by the Export-Import Bank to Mexico's Government Finance Corporation, Nacional Financiera, will be used, according to the announcement by President Aleman, to develop highways, railways, communications, irrigation, and electric power. Consequently, the loan will free Mexico's own income for other purposes, such as oil development. In this way, the United States will not directly finance the oil program, but will make it possible by freeing other revenues which would otherwise have had to go into road building and other domestic projects if the United States funds had not been made available.

The matter of a loan to Mexico has been a subject that has had considerable attention upon the part of those who have felt that an injustice was being done to Mexico. The delaying tactics that have been utilized by certain persons in our Government gave rise to rumors that it was done in an effort to obtain settlement of the notorious Sabalo claim. The Supreme Court of Mexico recently decided against the validity of the alleged claim and took occasion to refer to certain documents, that had been presented to support the claim, as being of doubtful validity. The impression was left that they might have been forgeries. At any rate, this smelly claim of $200,000,000 to $400,000,000, the exact amount never could be ascertained, nor the names of all the interested parties, was finally disposed of by an adverse decision of the highest court of Mexico.

It is unfortunate that nearly 2 years of valuable time was permitted to pass without direct action being taken upon the loan. It illustrates how powerful were the forces that were arrayed against it. It would take a book, rather than this brief speech, if I attempted to set forth in detail all the devious ways that were pursued by the interests who fought the granting of the loan, and the efforts that were made to make payment of the Sabalo claim a condition precedent to the granting of any loan. But, this is now all passed and there is no need of going into details that otherwise would have been an appropriate subject of inquiry.

The Export-Import Bank, regardless of the collateral issues or circumstances that some interested parties sought to surround the matter with these many months, has rendered a decision that is based upon the purpose and intent of the law that created the bank, and, in full accord with good banking principles. Its decision in effect has set at naught those who for personal reasons sought to preclude favorable action by the bank. The action of the Export-Import Bank not only creates new and additional reasons for confidence in its judgment and good intent, but, also gives assurances of a willingness to do its part in sustaining the effort of President Truman to strengthen the good neighbor policy by rendering financial assistance when justified by the economic condition of the applying nation.

The recognition by the Export-Import Bank that this is a bankable loan, based upon a sound economic condition in Mexico, and, a government that is politically stable, should be a source of gratification to the Mexican Government, and, to its great president, Miguel Aleman, who since he assumed the office of president has worked indefatigably to strengthen the financial and economic structure of his Government and thereby promote its stability as well as the welfare of the people of Mexico.

If time permitted I would be pleased to make detailed reference to the tremendous strides that have been made in Mexico within the last few years, in the expansion of industry, agriculture, manufacturing, and mining, under the leadership of President Aleman and those associated with him.

In no particular has this been more apparent than the almost unbelievable advances that have been made in the petroleum industry, under the administration of Senator Antonio J. Bermudez, director general of Petroleos Mexicanos, a man of the highest integrity, ability, and sincerity of purpose.

In support of my statement as to the progress that has been made, I submit the following letter, dated June 17, 1950, addressed to Export-Import Bank of Washington, by Senator Bermudez, upon payment in advance of the last installment of its $10,000,000 loan from the Export-Import Bank:

JUNE 17, 1950.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF WASHINGTON,
Washington 25, D. C.

(Attention: Mr. Herbert Gaston, President.)

GENTLEMEN: We write to express our gratitude for the credit of $10,000,000 which, in May 1944, you kindly granted Petroleos Mexicanos and on which we have today had the pleasure of making the last payment for capital and interest by check delivered to the Nacional Financiera, in the sum of $1,017,944.44.

This final payment was due and payable until August 1, 1950, but we are very pleased to have been able to fully settle this obligation several weeks ahead of its expiration date, as we find no other more practical symbol to acknowledge our gratefulness to the Government of the United States of America and to the Export-Import Bank for their timely cooperation, which enabled us to erect a refinery of 50,000 barrels daily output, in Mexico City, among other purposes, for the manufacture of high-octane aviation fuel.

It will, no doubt, be a source of satisfaction to you to know that the objectives for which this loan was extended have been fulfilled, as the Mexico City refinery supplies, with the highest quality of oil products, the heavily populated and industrialized areas of Central Mexico and practically all national requirements of commercial and military aviation gasoline, formerly 100 percent imported from the United States.

As we assume it will be of interest to you we are giving herein below the following three items of information:

I. The total cost of the Mexico City refinery and necessary complementary installations at the Poza Rico oil field was $32,200,000, the credit of $10,000,000 granted us by the Export-Import Bank, representing, therefore, 31 percent of this total investment.

II. Consumption of oil products in 1943 in the area to be supplied by the projected refinery was 24,000 barrels daily. Today it amounts to 55,000 barrels daily, which has required the construction of an additional refinery at Salamanca, 200 miles northwest of Mexico City, to supply some of the outlying areas, now served from Mexico City, and other additional areas as well. This new installation, commenced in 1945 and now completed in full, has a capacity of 30,000 barrels daily throughout and had a cost including a 280-mile pipeline from the Poza Rica oil field of $30,000,000 which fortunately we were able to provide without outside financing and solely with the income from our daily sales.

III. Simultaneously with the capital outlays necessary to fully settle for the $10,000,000 loan to which this letter principally refers and the more important sums required to supplement this loan in the building of the Mexico City refinery, and to construct the new Salamanca refinery and its pipeline, a still greater capital expenditure had to be defrayed to actively continue drilling operations for the exploration and exploitation of the petroleum resources of Mexico, with the very satisfying result that, within the last 2½ years, production has increased over 60,000 barrels daily and proven reserves have been augmented by 500,000,000 barrels, to a present total, including natural gas, of over 1,500,000 barrels.

With the deep satisfaction of duty accomplished, we write this letter to you in order that you may share our contentment at the results obtained and in which your cooperation has so effectively helped us.

Yours very truly,

PETROLEOS MEXICANOS.

Original signed by:

Senator ANTONIO J. BERMUDEZ.

This letter of Senator Bermudez is evidence of the fidelity and integrity that characterizes the conduct of the present Mexican Government in all of its dealings. It is of a kind that gives confidence in present commitments and their future fulfillment.

On December 31, 1948, as chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I submitted on behalf of that committee a detailed report of a study made by it of economic conditions prevailing at that time in Mexico. That report with the detailed information it contains, and knowledge of subsequent events, justifies in every particular the favorable action that is now taken by the Export-Import Bank in making a loan of $150,000,000 to Mexico for industrial and agricultural expansion.

I look with confidence into the future. I see the continued development and expansion of Mexico's industry, agriculture, and mining. A land with great natural resources it has the promise of a great future in which the welfare of its people will progress as the Nation progresses.

I rejoice in the knowledge that our two great countries are friends and I trust that the bonds of friendship will grow even stronger with the passing of each succeeding year.

Address by Hon. Clinton P. Anderson, of New Mexico, at Vandalia and Hillsboro, Ill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address delivered by the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] at Vandalia, Ill., on August 31, 1950. This address by the distinguished former Secretary of Agriculture pays well-deserved tribute to the work of our illustrious colleague, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]. It is a great pleasure to me to join in that tribute to my dear friend and colleague, the Senator from Illinois, SCOTT W. LUCAS.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a great pleasure being with you today. It is a privilege, first, because it gives me a chance to talk about something I would rather talk about more than anything else—agriculture; and, second, I am happy because I know the vast majority of you are either farmers or closely linked in some way to the good rich earth of the great State of Illinois. We talk the same language.

Because we talk the same language, I would like to discuss with you a bit of what we have been doing in Washington the last few years to try to develop a sound, reasonable, long-range farm program to backstop the farmer without tying him up in the red tape of complicated controls.

No one can make farmers or anyone else automatically prosperous. That is up to their own individual efforts. What we are trying to do is to soften the shock of matters over which the farmers, the workingman, and the businessman have little or no control. For the farmer that means things like the weather, the corn borer, the world market, and so forth.

I have been fortunate in having had pretty good ringside seats in Washington during the past 10 years to watch what was going on from all angles.

I was in the House of Representatives from just before the war until shortly after the surrender in Europe. Then I served as Secretary of Agriculture until I resigned to run for the Senate in 1948. Since then I have been up there in the Senate alongside SCOTT LUCAS.

From these vantage points I have had an exceptionally good opportunity to watch the work of SCOTT LUCAS. He has been on the Agriculture Committee, first in the House and then in the Senate, since shortly after he entered Congress in 1935. His career in Congress seems to be woven through the history of most of the major farm legislation that has been enacted since then.

Few people realize it because he is not a man inclined to toot his own horn, but he was one of the originators of the idea of flexible price supports, the principle which we have at last firmly established in our farm laws.

Back in 1938 SCOTT LUCAS introduced, fought for, and finally won passage of a mandatory corn law with flexible price supports which was the granddaddy of the law that we have today. Ever since then he has been unwavering in support of that principle. That is why he fought so hard during the past year to keep the theory of production payments out of the basic farm law. SCOTT LUCAS knows well that you cannot have a healthy farm economy if you straitjacket farmers with controls.

It was this kind of philosophy which motivated Senator LUCAS in driving for the enactment of farm legislation in the Eighty-first Congress. As majority leader of the Senate and as a high-ranking member of the Senate Agriculture Committee, he probably did more than any other man in Congress to restore balance to the Nation's farm program.

Looking back over the past 2 years, I would say that the Eighty-first Congress under LUCAS' leadership in the Senate enacted six major pieces of farm legislation in addition to a number of other important but less significant measures.

These include the 1949 general price support law, and the measures for crop storage, increase of the Commodity Credit Corporation lending authority, cotton marketing quotas, rural telephones and appropriations.

Senator LUCAS and I would be the last to contend that the 1949 general farm law is a perfect piece of legislation. We were on the firing line together in the conference committee with House Members who were determined to get high rigid supports.

The House conferees originally wanted a bill which called for rigid price supports at 90 percent of parity on virtually all commodities for 5 years. Senator LUCAS and I and some of the others knew that 5 years would either destroy all possibility of our maintaining an agricultural program or would fix 90 percent as a permanent program for years to come.

Well, finally after interminable conferences night and day, we won agreement to a compromise which provided for flexible supports although full application of the flexible provisions will be delayed until 1952. We also won a modernized parity formula, but again had to agree to delay in putting it into full effect. If Senator LUCAS and I had not been able to prevail upon one other Senator to change his vote, the fight would have been lost. It was that close.

However, we got the principle of flexible supports firmly established and that is what counts. Another important matter written into the law was the authority given to the Secretary of Agriculture to dispose of surplus commodities in danger of spoiling to public and private welfare programs at home and abroad.

I don't have to elaborate on the crop storage measure. The thousands of bins full of corn all over the Illinois landscape tell that story. The Republican Eightieth Congress in 1948, under pressure from the grain interests, eliminated the provision for providing additional storage from the Commodity Credit Corporation charter. Farmers had a big crop in 1948 and no place to put it in order to get crop loans. They had to sell off their surplus, sometimes considerably below the support price, to keep it from rotting. The Democratic Eighty-first Congress took care of that in a hurry and bins rose as if my magic all over the State last year. What a godsend that storage will be if the Nation is forced to take preventive action in many places in order to keep peace in the world. SCOTT LUCAS was one of the original sponsors of the bill to provide adequate crop storage.

Then there was the increase in the lending authority for the Commodity Credit Corporation. A lot of people who haven't bothered with the facts have been railing about the amounts of money the Government has been loaning on crops.

They conveniently forget that even after the war we pushed farmers for increased production to help relieve the suffering in many parts of the world. Today the farm economy has just reached the readjustment point which many other industries reached shortly after the war. The Government spent billions of dollars liquidating war contracts with industry. Is there anything scandalous about spending some funds—a very much smaller amount—to help agriculture adjust itself? Of course not.

Actually less than $500,000,000 have been lost on price-support operations since 1933, with potatoes accounting for $355,000,000 of the amount lost. There was only a $141,000,000 deficit on all the other commodities over the 17 years. Insofar as the basic storable commodities were concerned, the Government actually made money. In all, loans and purchases totaling nearly $10,000,000,000 were made.

As a matter of fact, this question of surpluses has been blown up out of all proportion. Our present supply of corn exceeds a normal supply by only enough to last our population for 67 days.

Our cotton supply exceeds normal by only enough to meet our domestic and export needs for 93 days. Our wheat stocks are above normal by only enough to meet our needs for 112 days.

Reasonable reserves of storable farm commodities are the best insurance consumers can have against shortages and unreasonable prices, because the prices of farm products skyrocket when supplies fall short of needs.

A single year of the kind of weather we had in 1947 would wipe out our present reserve stocks of corn. The short 1947 corn crop caught us without adequate reserves. I am sure that everyone can remember the resulting difficulties. We had a feed conservation program. Even so the production of meat and other livestock products went down and prices went up. We had meatless days and poultryless days in 1948. Both farmers and consumers suffered. This was only two brief years ago. Some people's memories are short, aren't they? Again, I can't help but reiterate how important reserves are as we face the very uncertain future before us.

SCOTT LUCAS, as majority leader, pushed the CCC lending increase bill through the Senate. The final vote came at 1 o'clock in the morning after a 13-hour session. The key vote was on a motion to send it back to committee for further study. It was defeated by a vote of 21 to 30, in which 25 Democrats and 5 Republicans triumphed over 20 Republicans and 1 Democrat. Previously the Democrats had voted down a Republican motion to adjourn at midnight. On the final vote almost all the Republicans climbed on the band wagon. The matter in which the Democrats in the Senate held together, voting down every attempted amendment, was a great tribute to SCOTT LUCAS' leadership.

SCOTT LUCAS was right in there pitching on other farm bills also. Under his leadership, the cotton people agreed to marketing quotas under the same referendum procedures that you know so well. Senator LUCAS emphasized time and again that overproduction of any price-supported crop is a threat to the entire farm program. He fought hard to get marketing quotas similarly on the 1950 potato crop in order to save the taxpayers approximately $60,000,000. He was unsuccessful in this, but his agreement had much to do with the fact that Congress voted that no price supports would be placed on 1951 potatoes if they were not under marketing quotas.

The effect of the cotton legislation certainly showed the wisdom of Senator LUCAS' thinking. Last year's crop was 19,000,000 bales. This year it will be just a little more than half, estimated at about 10,000,000 bales, and already there has been some buying from Government stocks. Illinois corn and wheat farmers concerned with the general health on the farm program can breathe a big sigh of relief that cotton was not allowed to upset the farm price applecart.

The rural telephone bill was another great achievement of the Democratic Eighty-first Congress. SCOTT LUCAS shepherded this, too, through the Senate.

Finally, there was the question of adequate appropriations to carry on the fundamental Government programs for assistance to agriculture. The Eighty-first Congress provided adequate but not extravagant amounts. The 1951 appropriations call for less than was spent in either 1949 or 1950. On the other hand, a far cry from those of 1948 when the farm program was severely threatened by the ruthless attacks of Republican hatchet men in the House.

Let's go back for a minute to 1947 when the Republicans won control of the House and the Senate for the first time in 16 years.

Senator LUCAS' present opponent became chairman of the Agriculture Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee. He was the leader of the hatchet men. I remember well because I, as Secretary of Agriculture, prepared the budget that he went to work on.

The gentleman from Pekin wielded his meat ax far and wide, but his most flagrant attack was on soil conservation. This was at a time when the soil of farms in Illinois and all throughout America was still heavily depleted from 5 years of the most intensive cultivation stimulated by extraordinary war demands. Farmers had given unstintingly of themselves and their good earth to achieve undreamed of farm production, one of the vital elements in the winning of the war. Despite this, the gentleman from Pekin—who has aptly termed himself a "paved street farmer"—recommended that soil-conservation payments be cut in half for 1947 and eliminated completely in 1948.

He tried to do the same thing with Rural Electrification Administration funds for loans and for salaries and expenses. In testimony before the committee I pointed out that the cut proposed by the gentleman from Pekin in salaries and expenses alone would so cripple the staff of REA that about 135,000 farm families would have to wait an extra year to receive service.

The same kind of slashing was proposed for the funds for agricultural research, for the school-lunch program, for crop insurance, and for other well-recognized programs. The gentleman from Pekin was so persistent and persuasive that he got the House to approve the cuts, but the Senate would not hold still for all of them. The Senators managed to get part of the slash restored. The attempt to wreck soil conservation and hold back REA brought instant reaction from all over the Nation. Republicans realized how false was the kind of economy advocated by the gentleman from Pekin. In 1948 their appropriation bill for 1949 restored the cuts and added some more funds to the agriculture budget. By so doing the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress completely repudiated the unsound and ridiculous economy drive led by the gentleman from Pekin. They hoped the people of America would forget. But the people did not forget. They swept the Republicans out of control of both the House and the Senate in the elections of 1948. The Republicans can thank the gentleman from Pekin for his contribution to their defeat.

What makes the gentleman from Pekin act as he does? I don't know. It has always baffled me. Possibly we can get a clue from something Representative CLARE HOFFMAN of Michigan, one of the most anti-New Deal Republicans in the House, told the gentleman from Pekin during debate over a farm bill back in 1943. Representative HOFFMAN noted there was a big whisky industry in the Peoria area and said:

"You say the price of corn is going up if we adopt this bill, do you not? That makes the distillers in your district pay more for grain. * * * I wish the gentleman would employ his—what shall I call them, superhuman?—talents to aid the actual dirt farmers, even when their interest comes in conflict with that of the distillers." So said Representative CLARE HOFFMAN of Michigan to his Republican colleague the gentleman from Pekin.

Whatever it is that makes that gentleman tick, it isn't only the farmers that feel the effect. I remember very well the campaign he waged his last 8 years in Congress to liquidate the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. He wanted to turn back the juicy mortgages to the bankers, and leave the Government holding the bag with those which didn't look so good. I remember clearly because I fought bitterly against his move in the House.

You recall how things were back in 1933, I am sure. Mortgages were being foreclosed at the rate of 1,000 a day throughout the Nation. People just didn't have jobs to keep up the payments on their homes. Well, the Government stepped in, set up HOLC, and literally gave more than 1,000,000 home owners a new lease on life with long-term, low-interest liens. HOLC backed the mortgages on about 70,000 homes right here in Illinois.

In 1941, the gentleman from Pekin, who somewhere along the line acquired a great affinity for the mortgage bankers and building and loan people, began his campaign to liquidate the very agency that had bailed the banks and building and loan associations out of bankruptcy back in 1933. These groups obviously wanted the cream of the mortgage business back in their hands again. Condemning the proposal made by the gentleman from Pekin, I spoke out on the House floor in 1943. I said:

"Who wants this? Well, there is a trust company in Cleveland that says this ought to be turned back. That very company took $22,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in exchange for bad paper it had. It took $19,000,000 from the HOLC in exchange for additional bad paper. Now, with money in its till, it wants to grab off some of this prime paper that now belongs to the Home Owners Loan Corporation."

Well, history has proven just how wrong the gentleman from Pekin was. He always contended that HOLC was an expensive agency that had outlived its usefulness. Now, the HOLC has just about wound up its operations a little ahead of the schedule called for when it was set up. The 20-year period is about over. Instead of the deficit that the gentleman from Pekin was always predicting, HOLC will close out with a net surplus of several million dollars. It did its job well. It held foreclosures to a minimum and it played fair with the home owners in maintaining the original terms and interest. That is something that could not have been guaranteed under the proposals made by the gentleman from Pekin.

After comparison of the records of these two men, you can easily see why it is that I am here today urging the reelection of SCOTT W. LUCAS to the United States Senate. This is not a partisan matter. The Nation's farm program is above partisan politics.

Farmers all over the Nation as well as you here in Illinois need SCOTT LUCAS' experience and wisdom on agricultural legislation in Washington.

He has been clearly consistent down through the years in his vision of the kind of long-range farm program that the Nation should have to keep the American economy in good balance. He has keyed this to an intelligent world view that recognized from the beginning that the United States must play its part in the family of nations. In his position as majority leader of the United States Senate few men in the country can speak out with greater authority. SCOTT LUCAS stands for peace with honor and for an equitable distribution of some of the good things of life for all, without one iota of surrender of the fine tradition of individual initiative that has made America what it is. I know the people of Illinois will return SCOTT LUCAS to the United States Senate in November.

As 1960 Sees Us

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, the second of two, a very well thought-out editorial from the August 5, 1950, issue of the Saturday Review of Literature, describing how the people of 1960 may look at us.

The first of the features is entitled "The Repudiation of Man." This guess is painfully pessimistic. The second is reasonably hopeful, even heartening. It sets forth a brighter mood in 1960 if we, with courage meet the issues of today. This second editorial is entitled "The Age of Valor."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE AGE OF VALOR

AUGUST 6, 1960.—The world is at peace. It is not a Utopian peace, but at least the world has been made safe for its differences. It will be many years before the peoples of the world develop a true sense of world community or world citizenship, but at least they are moving in that direction.

Democracy and totalitarianism in 1960 vie with each other, as they have for many years. There is, however, this difference: The competition between the two is now kept within bounds. Totalitarianism, deprived of its traditional dynamic and aggressive drives, is changing from within and has not been in the ascendancy for almost 10 years. The world is still beset by economic ills and by the problems of population pressure and conservation of natural resources, but for the first time in human history, a world organization is in being which is attacking these matters and is able to show progress. For the United Nations has undergone a vast development in the past 10 years. Despite too-frequent stumblings and failings, it has been able to operate effectively in the field of a common world security. What its long-range character will be it is too early to tell.

If we survey the history since the end of the Second World War for the single event or turning point which did most to save the peace, we go back 10 years to the late summer and fall of 1950. That was the summer when the world skirted the raw edge of atomic catastrophe. But that was also the year when America came into its own in terms of affirmative and effective world leadership.

The attack on South Korea in 1950 spotlighted a weakness in America that twice before had almost cost this country its freedom. That weakness was that America had been unable to develop a faculty for the anticipation of crisis. Its foreign policy failed to take into account long-range historical forces.

Constitutionally the President was charged with the primary responsibility for shaping foreign policy, but this meant that he should have been able to assess the movement of historical forces years before they asserted themselves. It meant, too, that he would have to go before the country to propose an immediate program to forestall a crisis that might occur 6, 8, or even 10 years later. This meant, too, that the Congress and the people themselves would have to think and act in long-range terms.

The time to have saved the League of Nations was not after Ethiopia was attacked, but in 1920, when the question of participation came before the American people. The time to have faced up to the threat of Pearl Harbor was at least 9 years before December 7, 1941, and the place was in Manchuria. The time to have stopped Nazi Germany was in 1934 and the place was on the Rhine. The time to have met squarely the danger of a third world war was in 1945 and the place was San Francisco.

All this was in the mind of the President when the news of the attack on South Korea was flashed to the White House on June 25, 1950. He realized that American democracy could not once again afford the luxury of a protracted period of waiting and indecision. If the challenge were not met immediately, it would fan out across the world. Decisive action had to be taken. This action might or might not lead to the outbreak of a third world war, but world war most certainly could not be averted without it.

The President summoned his Cabinet officials and a decision was made to commit American forces. Even more important, it was decided to place the issue before the Security Council of the United Nations. This decision was of historic consequence, for it gave the United Nations the type of responsibility it needed if it was to survive as a world body. More important still, it dramatized basic weaknesses in the structure and operation of the United Nations that would have to be repaired if the organization were suddenly to be confronted with a major threat by a major nation. For the United Nations was in the awkward position of having to ask the nations to send volunteers, instead of having an adequate force already at its disposal. Besides, each nation volunteering help could make its own determination as to what that help would be, and the time and circumstances of its delivery. Obviously, modern war could neither be prevented nor waged on such a basis. Yet a symbolic start, at least, toward a world police force had been made by the UN in Korea. The important thing was to build from there.

In the anxious days that followed, the President reviewed in his mind the events since the end of the Second World War. In the light of what was happening in Korea, he found it necessary to reexamine all the aspects of American foreign policy. He went back to 1945 for an inventory of basic facts bearing on the peace.

The first fact about 1945 that now seemed clear pertained to the world's peoples, taken as a whole. All peoples everywhere, regardless of color or political systems, came out of the war linked by the need for adequate representation on a world scale—representation that would be charged with the responsibility for averting war, promoting the general welfare, and enlarging the conditions favorable to human progress.

The second fact about 1945 was that two mighty nations emerged from the Second World War under circumstances which in the past had invariably involved war. More important even than the ideological differences separating the two was the lack of any real security system of which both were a part. This would inevitably lead to a race for strength—and strength was to be measured in many ways: control of other vital territories and peoples; by strategic bases all over the world; by superiority in armaments; by any measures that would weaken the potential enemy.

The third fact was that new weapons of mass extermination had been devised. It could not have been expected that these weapons could be monopolized by any single nation; they were ideally suited to an aggressor's designs and were most effective against countries with concentrated population and industry.

The fourth fact about 1945 was that any new world organization would have to be invested with as much authority beyond that given to the League of Nations as atomic energy went beyond the existing sources of power.

The fifth and final fact that was now clear was that there could be no leisurely timetable by which the United Nations could evolve into an effective organization. Time worked against peace. Time spurred the volatile race for superior arsenals and the command of strategic bases. Each day that passed brought the world closer to the end of the atomic monopoly and the beginning of the atomic stockpiles.

In retrospect it seemed hardly credible that America should have discouraged efforts to invest the United Nations with the powers of government. The President recalled that America supported the veto at San Francisco—and 4 years later was still unwilling to abolish it, not out of concern for the Soviet reaction necessarily, but because it didn't want to surrender sovereignty to a world body.

This reluctance to support the move to strengthen the United Nations into a functioning government now seemed all the more inexplicable in view of the expansionist and infiltration activities of Soviet Russia.

For Russia had been operating on three separate though related levels. The first level was the nationalist one. Her objectives on this level were historical rather than purely ideological, going back to the nationalist aspirations of the Czars: control of the Baltic and the Black Sea; a shock absorber or military cushion running through central Europe, and a senior partnership with China. The second level was that of the Comintern and the Cominform, involving world revolution and infiltration. The third level was that of opportunism and exploitation, waiting for and accelerating and reaping the benefits of depression in the west, or making use of native populations, as in Berlin or Korea, to commit forces of her opponents without committing any of her own.

It was apparent that Russian strategy against the United States was to cut her off from the nonwhite peoples of the world, or the preponderance of mankind. She recognized that no side could win either the war or the peace unless it could attract or control most of the world's 2,000,000,000 people.

This strategy represented a multiedged sword against America.

Economically, it was designed to weaken America by detaching her from vital sources of raw materials, as well as to rob her of her markets and outlets for industrial investments.

Militarily, it was designed to pit her against nations on which the atomic bomb would not be decisive—nations that were predominantly agricultural rather than industrial, and against which all the vaunted American technology would be of little avail without armed manpower that would have to be measured in tens of millions.

Ideologically, it was designed to identify America with feudalism and against long-overdue land reform and social reform. The purpose here was to discredit democracy as a doctrine that could advance and champion rights and aspirations of underprivileged peoples.

The reasons behind Russian strategy seemed clear. The world had become a single geographic unit and was fast becoming a single economic unit. But economics cannot be separated from politics. And Russia could not deny the pulling power of democracy wherever it had actually made itself felt. Hence she lost no time in appropriating the word "democracy" for her own use, even as she concocted opprobrious terms to convince the world that America represented not democracy but reactionary imperialism—a combination of words that held a specially bitter meaning for the world's colonial peoples in general and the people of southeast Asia and the Near East in particular.

So far as the United Nations was concerned, Russian policy was to keep it as weak as possible—just short of killing it, for which she was anxious to avoid responsibility.

In line with this policy, Russia served notice that she would resist all efforts to limit her sovereignty. This was to be expected, for only a strong United Nations could have coped with Russia's trilevel strategical approach to a dominant position in the world. It is possible, too, that Russia realized that it would be difficult for her to remain outside of a truly integrated world community. Hence, she preferred to stay inside a weak UN, using secession as a threat to block efforts at revision. She was anxious to avoid being confronted with the unhappy choice of becoming part of an organization having the powers to block her expansion, or pulling out of the UN and cutting herself off from the rest of the world—thus jeopardizing the three levels of her strategy.

Reviewing and assessing all these facts, the President decided that the time had come for a redefinition of the foreign policy of the United States. It would have to be a long-range policy, one which fully measured up to the challenge and the shaping of historical forces. In keeping with tradition, he presented his views to the American people in the early fall of 1950. It was a speech that gave heart and hope to people everywhere. This is part of what he said:

"I have drawn up new instructions for the American delegates to the United Nations. These instructions I now submit to Congress and to the American people for their approval.

"These instructions have taken into account the happenings in Korea. In a larger sense, they have also taken into account the events of the past 5 years, as well as our hopes and plans for the years ahead.

"Briefly stated, the instructions direct the American delegates to the United Nations to propose at once a Revision Conference of the United Nations under articles 108 and 109. These articles provide that a conference may be called for the purpose of altering the structure of the United Nations if two-thirds of the nations wish to do so. Such a call is not subject to the veto.

"The American purpose in proposing such a conference is to give the greatest possible strength to the United Nations in the shortest possible time.

"By all possible strength, I am thinking of the power of world law. This would most certainly include law-making, law-enforcing, and law-interpreting agencies.

"It would mean that the United Nations would have at its disposal a police force or army of substantial numbers. Such an army would be well equipped and sufficiently large and strategically dispersed in order to prevent aggression, as well as to enforce world law.

"Americans have been deeply shocked by the events in Korea. The struggle to put down aggression in that country has been on a scale that hardly seemed possible only a few months ago. We were deprived of the advantage we had in the First and Second World Wars, when allies held the field until we could mobilize and direct our strength.

"It is no secret that the aggressor in modern warfare possesses a tremendous advantage. He can choose the time and place of attack, counting on surprise to attain the objective before the victim can defend himself or rally support.

"No one nation can be expected to police the entire world against this type of aggression. The threat is against the world, and the world must organize to defend itself.

"I am asking the American delegates to make our proposal in all good faith. We seek nothing from a strengthened United Nations that would not be available to all nations, large and small.

"Here is a chance for the world to wipe the slate clean of the mistakes of the past 5 years. The benefits of participation are equally available to all. And when I say 'all,' I mean 'all.' Any nation sincerely interested in security and the common welfare of the world's peoples should have no hesitation in joining with the rest.

"But let there be no mistake about it. There are benefits but there are also obligations and responsibilities. The durable, meaningful peace to which humanity is entitled cannot be obtained without sacrifice.

"Unlimited national sovereignty cannot be retained—if we sincerely want peace.

"No nation can be a law unto itself in the common affairs of the world community—if we sincerely want peace.

"No nation can expect to retain sole jurisdiction over the size and nature of its arsenals—if we sincerely want peace.

"These are some of the basic principles which must go into the making of a system of law and order. And, again I say, any nation sincerely interested in security, any nation that does not covet other territory, should have no hesitation in accepting these duties as a member of a world community.

"The aim of such a strengthened United Nations would be universal membership. The conditions for membership can be clearly stated: respect for the rules of the game, respect for the rights of the individual members, prompt fulfillment of obligations, recognition of the fact that the human community enjoys precedence over the national community in those specific matters related to a common world security.

"So much for the form of a workable world organization. The instructions to the American delegates to the United Nations are also concerned with the substance that would go into the making of such a body.

"In spirit, the United Nations must become the protector and spokesman for humanity-at-large. It must transform itself from a forum of the nations into a Congress of the peoples. It must serve a higher purpose than the mere projection of the foreign policies of the individual nations.

"Because of this, the American delegates should be free to consider every issue or question coming before the councils of the United Nations according to this simple test: does it help or harm human welfare?

"I am sure all Americans will agree with me when I say that our delegates can best represent the American people by regarding themselves as representatives of the human community.

"It is inconceivable that there should ever be any real conflict between the general welfare of humanity and the welfare of the American people. If such a conflict does arise, then American democracy will have lost its meaning as we know it.

"We hope our delegates and the delegates of all nations will vote as individuals on each issue according to their consciences and best judgment, and not as members of national blocs.

"I am therefore proposing that the delegates from each nation be elected by popular vote. This will make the United Nations a truly representative body of the world's peoples. The method of elections and the size of the various representations should be left to the determination of the revision conference.

"Participation in the building of such a responsible world body is the greatest challenge and privilege for America in its history. It is a summons to greatness.

"We are called upon to make a complete commitment—moral, physical, spiritual—to the cause of human progress and welfare. We will oppose imperialism to no less an extent than aggression. We will support and associate ourselves with the struggle for freedom and human rights. Humanity is now one and we propose to be at one with humanity.

"No one knows whether this total American commitment to the cause of a strong and just United Nations and to a free world will succeed. No one knows whether it can come in time to prevent world-wide atomic war. But if this madness is to be; if there is nothing that any of us, acting with heart and might, can do to stop it—then at least we can answer to our consciences. At least it can be said we spoke for man.

"Surely, there can be no greater purpose or mission for a democratic people than this, to stand before the world as humanity's champion.

"And even if the war is averted, the years ahead will not be easy. Charting an even course for human destiny will require anguish, disappointment, sacrifice. But it will be known in history as the Age of Valor. No struggle in history will have had a more towering dedication."

National Home Week Starts September 10—Homes Are the Foundations of Our Conduct and Our Destiny

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to remind you and my colleagues that Home Week begins September 10. Of course, you at once think of a house, a building, a roof and porch and garden about it, or, a flat; an apartment; a dingy back alley shack; a tumble-down hut. Well, these are but the symbols of where people live. It is the people who make a shack a home. A mansion without folks within it who live with affection and patience and loyalty is still not an honest-to-God home.

But, of course, Mr. Speaker, this week, beginning September 10, is to again remind us and to have us all join in placing the American home on the pinnacle of pride of possession which it deserves.

Individually owned homes add so much more to America's future. Every time I see a huge tenement in our largest cities, it makes me hope and hope and hope, that some day the folks who are now forced to live in crowded quarters, may be blessed with individual roofs over possessed homes and gardens.

Yes, I know it is a dream. But it does me good to dream.

Then, there are the millions of homes being built annually for individual ownership all over America.

And, in my own great Eighteenth Congressional District of my native State of California is a home enterprise I want you and my colleagues to know about. I asked my friend to write me about it briefly so that you might quickly read of this marvelous home enterprise. I give you the telegram which just came to me when I asked about this history-making home-building plan, right in my very own community. It reads:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., September 1, 1950.
Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
Congress, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Am happy to reply to your request by supplying the following facts and comments concerning Lakewood Park. The largest community housing development in history, Lakewood Park lies in the heart of the district with the greatest growth and expansion potential in the Nation. It is situated close to many of the industries which are so important to the national defense program. Lakewood Park, more than 17,000 new homes, will house workers of many of the aircraft factories, steel plants, refineries, and other defense industries in this vital area. Their children will attend new schools, worship in new churches, and play in new parks and playgrounds. Lakewood Park will have 133 miles of paved streets, lined with 5,000 modern street lights, and it is the world's first garbage-free city, for every dwelling is equipped with a garbage pulverator.

On February 24 of this year the first foundation was poured; since then more than 7,000 homes have been completed or are in various stages of completion, with new families moving in at the rate of 50 a day. In less than 2 years Lakewood Park's population is expected to reach between sixty and seventy thousand persons, larger than 76 percent of all United States cities. We see in Lakewood Park, not only the birth of a city, but a graphic example of the healthy growth of our mighty Nation as well. It shows we are building for peace as well as defense. It is only fitting that our Nation place emphasis on the importance of our homes. We can do this by giving our full support to national home week, which starts September 10.

DON ROCHLEN,
Director, Community and Public Relations.

Turning Point

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Turning Point," written by Frances Spatz and published in the American Weekly of August 27, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

TURNING POINT—LITTLE THINGS, LIKE A MUDDY ROAD, AN ORATORICAL CONTEST, AND A $10 JOB, WERE STEPPING STONES TO HIGH GOVERNMENT POSTS

(By Frances Spatz)

When they offered him the chairmanship of the money-losing Pawnee County Fair, the young country lawyer thought he was on the right road to success. He charged into his duties like a lion, determined to give Pawnee County the biggest fair Nebraska had ever seen.

He got the United States Cavalry to put on a show, hired animal acts, even lady aerialists. He was all set—and then it rained.

It rained so hard the roads were a quagmire. When he got out of his jalopy to tack the posters to the poles he was ankle deep in mud. The roads became impassable, and the farmers couldn't come to the fair.

That dripping fiasco was what put the young lawyer, KENNETH WHERRY, in politics. On the platform of better roads he ran for the State legislature and was elected. He went on from there to become United States Senator.

"I guess," the Senator told the American Weekly recently, "that if it hadn't rained and if I had gotten over the roads, I wouldn't be here today. Odd how little things shape your career."

In a small community in Utah, Reva Beck, tall, stately, with flaming red hair, was asked by a desperate theatrical troupe to fill in for an ill player. The high school girl played the role with artistry. The town was pleased and Reva's future seemed assured. She majored in dramatics at college and, with a successful professional appearance to her credit, Reva thought nothing of entering the college oratorical contest.

Suddenly then Reva realized that this time she had to write her own lines, not just memorize somebody else's. She prepared her talk, choosing temperance as her subject and won. Strangely she found more thrill in having created the subject matter than in delivering the speech so well.

Reva Beck changed her direction, from dramatics to public service. She went to law school, graduated, married, and eventually became judge of traffic court in Salt Lake City. She was especially praised for her work with juvenile delinquents and alcoholics.

From there Mrs. REVA BECK BOSONE went on to become a Member of Congress from Utah.

The turning point in the life of JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., minority leader of the House of Representatives, came at the age of 16, he recounted recently. At that time he had the choice of being sent to college with all expenses paid by a group of townspeople or of going to work as a cub reporter at $10 a week. He thought of his hard-working father, his seven brothers and sisters, and he chose work. In 5 years he owned the paper and went into politics. He has been a Congressman since 1924.

Over 50 years ago a 12-year-old boy in Texas heard that a nationally famous orator was to speak at the nearest town. The boy had no chance of going. One of 11 children of a poor farmer, he had to work on the farm.

When the day came, however, so did a downpour. Work on the farm was impossible and his parents permitted him to ride 12 miles through the rain to hear the politician.

Young SAM RAYBURN, spellbound, decided that one day he would enter politics. Today he is Speaker of the House of Representatives.

In contrast to RAYBURN, Richard W. Hoffman was a wealthy and established Chicago businessman when his turning point came. A group of neighbors asked him to help in the job of cleaning up the local school system. He was elected to the school board, became its chairman and then found out the deep satisfaction of public service.

He, too, became a Member of the House of Representatives.

When J. Howard McGrath was 5 years old he heard someone say that a good lawyer could be anything he wanted to be. He doesn't remember who said those words, but he never forgot their import. He became an attorney, then Governor of Rhode Island and eventually Attorney General of the United States.

One of his employees, when a small boy, wanted to be a minister. The boy had to go to work to aid in the support of his mother. The job he found just happened to be in the Library of Congress and the boy became interested in law. He worked his way through law school and got a job with the Department of Justice. Today J. Edgar Hoover is head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Another man who had to change his mind because of finances is John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury. Young Snyder wanted to be an electrical engineer, but had to go to work in his uncle's bank. He found he liked banking and stuck with it.

Twenty years ago Mrs. MARGARET CHASE SMITH was treasurer of a woolen mill in Skowhegan, Maine, and rather proud of her success.

Her employer asked her to do him a favor. He was backing Wallace White for Senator—would she help him put White over? Mrs. SMITH agreed just to be accommodating. From that start in politics she went on to succeed Senator White and is now the only woman United States Senator.

Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower almost became a sailor. He took competitive exams for both Annapolis and West Point and placed first in the Navy, second in the Army. Then he found that the maximum age limit at Annapolis was 21—and he would be 22 when he entered.

West Point's age limit, however, was 22. The man ahead of Eisenhower became ill and forfeited his place. Thanks to that combination of circumstances, young Eisenhower entered West Point. Only this year the age for both Annapolis and West Point was made the same, 21.

Origin of Labor Day and Its Significance—Congressional Library Gives It to California Congressman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, Monday next is a national holiday. It is Labor Day. All honest labor is dignified and of enduring value. It is appropriate that our great Nation, which is so blessed by a high and patriotic quality of manual workers and craftsmen, should again observe this as a national holiday.

I asked the Congressional Library to give me its report. I am pleased to herewith give it to you for further knowledge.

ORIGIN OF LABOR DAY

Although there has been some controversy in the past as to whether the Knights of Labor in New York City or the New York City Central Labor Union originated Labor Day, it has been confirmed through investigation that the Knights of Labor had nothing to do officially with the declaration of such a holiday. The idea of a day to be set apart for labor was first made public by a resolution offered at a meeting of the Central Labor Union held on May 8, 1882, by Peter J. McGuire, at that time the general secretary of the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners and later the vice president of the American Federation of Labor. Mr. McGuire suggested that the first Monday in September be made the day for paying public tribute to American industry, "as it would come at the most pleasant season of the year, nearly midway between the Fourth of July and Thanksgiving, and would fill a wide gap in the chronology of legal holidays."

The resolution was passed and a committee was appointed to prepare for the celebration. However, the first Labor Day observance was held, not on the first Monday, but on Tuesday, September 5, 1882. About 10,000 union members marched up Broadway, after which they and their families and friends spent the rest of the day on the picnic grounds in Elm Park, where all sorts of amusements were provided. From a platform which had been erected on the grounds, the crowds were addressed by numerous labor leaders from 2:30 in the afternoon until nightfall. This first celebration was a great success and led to the establishment of the annual observance of Labor Day by which the American people, in the words of Mr. McGuire, "honor the toilers of the earth, and pay homage to those who from rude nature have delved and carved all the comfort and grandeur we behold."

The second Labor Day was celebrated Wednesday, September 5, 1883, and the parade on that occasion was reported as an "imposing demonstration of the Central Labor Union." In 1884, it was decided by the Central Labor Union to hold the celebration on the first Monday in September, which was the first of the month, and the central labor bodies in other cities were urged to celebrate that day as "a universal holiday for workingmen."

On October 7, 1884, a resolution was unanimously adopted by the American Federation of Labor convention to the effect that "the first Monday in September of each year be set apart as a laborers' national holiday, and we recommend its observance by all wage workers, irrespective of sex, calling, or nationality."

During the next few years, Labor Day became officially recognized in scattered localities through municipal ordinances. State legislative recognition was developed as a result of a campaign conducted by organized labor, and by the end of 1893, 23 States had enacted Labor Day laws. Oregon was the first State to pass such legislation by the enactment of a law in 1887 designating the first Saturday in June as Labor Day. This act was amended in 1893 to conform to the general plan of observing the first Monday in September as Labor Day, which by that time was widely accepted.

The increasing interest in setting aside a day for honoring the workers of America, and the efforts of the American Federation of Labor to get national recognition for such a day resulted in the passage of a bill, known as the Kyle bill, by the Congress of the United States which made Labor Day a legal holiday for public employees. The bill was passed with very little discussion; the only objection raised was that, for the sake of symmetry in national holidays, Labor Day should be fixed for the first day of September instead of the first Monday. However, since the holiday was being created by Congress and not by an event, it was thought better to make it the first Monday to conform to the prevailing practice.

On June 28, 1894, President Cleveland signed the act and it became law. It reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first Monday in September of each year, being the day known and celebrated as labor's holiday, is hereby made a legal public holiday, to all intents and purposes, in the same manner as Christmas, the 1st day of January, the 22d of February, the 30th of May, and the 4th day of July are now by law made public holidays.

The recognition thus accorded Labor Day by the action of the Congress and the Executive added to the significance of the movement and the prestige of the holiday. The act was acclaimed as establishing Labor Day as a national holiday, although it actually applied only to Federal employees.

By 1900 Labor Day had been officially recognized by most of the States, but it was not until February 1923, that the 48th State—Wyoming—fell into line. Most of the States in their original acts set the first Monday in September as the holiday. The following States, however, originally fixed other days, but later changed their laws:

California: First Monday in October (act of May 23, 1893); amended by act of February 23, 1897.

Louisiana: November 25 (act of July 7, 1892, affecting parish of New Orleans only); amended by act of July 8, 1912, and made applicable to State.

North Carolina: First Thursday in September (act of March 6, 1899); amended by act of January 23, 1901.

Oregon: First Saturday in June (act of February 21, 1887); amended by act of February 21, 1893.

Pennsylvania: Originally the first Monday in September was designated by act of April 25, 1889. This was changed to the first Saturday in September by act of May 31, 1893, but by act of June 23, 1897, the original date was restored.

In Wisconsin and Wyoming, Labor Day is set by the governors, but in practice, of course, they designate the first Monday in September for the observance.

There is no source available to indicate why the above States changed their laws, but presumably they were so changed so as to create uniformity in observing legal holidays. A search of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD indexes does not disclose that at any time the question of changing the day of observing Labor Day has been raised or discussed in the Congress. Through tradition and practice, the first Monday in September has become the accepted time for acknowledging the part that American workers have played in the economic growth of the Nation. Since this holiday was created by concerted action and not by any fixed event, a change in the day of celebration could be undertaken, but such a change would be complicated by the fact that the Federal law and each individual State law would have to be amended, since each jurisdiction is separately controlled by independent legislation on this subject.

HISTORY AND SIGNIFICANCE OF LABOR DAY

(By Estelle Stewart)

ORIGIN OF HOLIDAY

Labor Day, the holiday dedicated to the American worker, is a comparatively recent achievement of the American labor movement. It grew out of the dream of one of the pioneer trade-unionists, Peter J. McGuire, of New York, to symbolize the industrial spirit—the great, vital force of every nation—in somewhat the same manner as other public holidays symbolize the religious, civil, or military spirit. In 1882, the newly-formed Central Labor Union of New York City voted to translate that dream into action. It appointed a committee to plan a demonstration which, as McGuire pictured it, "would publicly show the strength and esprit de corps of the trade and labor organizations."

The first Labor Day celebration occurred on Tuesday, September 5, 1882, in New York City. As reported in the New York World of September 6, 1882:

"The great labor demonstration and picnic yesterday under the auspices of the Central Labor Union, composed of the various trade and labor organizations of New York City and neighborhood, was very successful."

The idea spread rapidly and by 1885 Labor Day was celebrated in many of the industrial centers of the country.

LABOR DAY LEGISLATION

The first official recognition of Labor Day as a legal holiday came through municipal ordinances that were passed during 1885 and 1886. The first law establishing Labor Day as a State holiday was passed by the Oregon Legislature on February 21, 1887. During that year four other States—Colorado, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and New York—created the Labor Day holiday by legislative enactment. By the end of the decade Connecticut, Nebraska, and Pennsylvania had joined their ranks. Iowa and Ohio followed in 1890, and Kansas in 1891.

At the 1890 convention of the American Federation of Labor, President Gompers reported that the first Monday in September, the day set apart by several States as Labor Day, had been more generally observed than ever before. He recommended that efforts be made to have all the States enact a similar law.

On June 23, 1894, Congress passed an act making the first Monday in September of each year a legal holiday in the District of Columbia and the Territories. The recognition accorded Labor Day by act of Congress added materially to the growth of the movement and to the prestige of the holiday itself. By 1900 most of the States had recognized Labor Day officially, and the forty-eighth State, Wyoming, fell into line as recently as 1923.

LABOR DAY OBSERVANCES

The form that the observances and celebration of the first Labor Day holiday took—a street parade to exhibit to the public the strength of organized labor, followed by a festival for the recreation and amusement of the workers and their families—became the general pattern for the celebration of Labor Day. Addresses by prominent men were introduced later, as more emphasis was placed upon the economic and civics significance of the holiday. Still later the Sunday preceding Labor Day was adopted as Labor Sunday, dedicated to the spiritual and educational aspects of the labor movement.

In recent years the character of Labor Day celebrations has been undergoing change, especially in large industrial centers where mass displays such as huge parades are impractical. Other more up-to-date methods are used to direct public attention to the workers, their organizations, their aims, ideals, and achievements. Labor Day messages from public officials and men and women prominent in labor and social and civic affairs appear not only in the labor papers but in the general press. Labor Day addresses of leading union officials, industrialists, educators, and clergymen are given a wide hearing over the radio. Many churches devote Labor Sunday to sermons on labor and its problems, and the spokesmen of organized labor not infrequently occupy the pulpits on those occasions.

Antimerger Legislation Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 1 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very forceful article setting forth the urgent necessity of amending section 7 of the Clayton Act to plug the loophole which is enabling many monopolies to be formed with immunity. The article was written by Edward Wimmer, president, Forward American Publishing Guild, and vice president of the National Federation of Independent Business, Inc.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sharon (Ohio) Press of August 25, 1950]

PASS ANTIMERGER BILL NOW—KEEP AMERICA INDEPENDENT

(By Edward Wimmer, president, Forward American Publishing Guild; vice president, National Federation of Independent Business, Inc.)

Last week I discussed with you the creation and development of the National Dairy Co., giant of the dairy products industry, and told you how this company had put together some 500 separate enterprises that gave National a virtual monopoly on the sale of milk, butter, cheese (Kraft), and ice cream in hundreds of American towns and cities.

This week I am going to give you some background information on how our Anti-trust Laws have been bypassed, and why such combines as National Dairy Co. have been permitted to take over in many fields of business enterprise.

It was in 1914 that the Congress decided that the practice of buying control of one's competitors to get rid of competition was a practice that could very well lead to disaster. In this thought Congress passed the Clayton Act, forbidding any corporation from buying the stocks of any other corporation wherever such purchase might lessen competition. This proviso was contained in section 7 of the act, but Congress left a loophole in the legislation, in that a corporation was not prohibited from buying up the assets of its competitors. The result was that in a few months the greatest merger movement in the history of the world was gotten under way, and has progressed until today some 113 giant corporations own or control approximately 50 percent of all the assets of all the corporations in the manufacturing field. This same process of liquidation of independent enterprise is taking place in the distribution field, as witnessed on any Main Street in America.

I think it is only fair to state at this time that outstanding Members of both the House and the Senate have made vigorous attempts to plug the loophole in section 7 of the Clayton Act, and fine support has come from every President and from such agencies of the Government as the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission.

It was soon after the Clayton Act was passed that Woodrow Wilson described the giants as "economic states," and Hebbert

Hoover referred to them as "a building up of a kind of economic autocracy." Franklin D. Roosevelt said, in his famous monopoly message, that our industrial life had come under the domination of a "cluster of collectivisms," and even Wendell Willkie predicted "disaster to our Republic" if no solution to the problem was found.

Space does not permit any elaboration on these provocative statements at this writing, but we will get to that in later columns. What we are interested in right now is passage of an act known as H. R. 2834, the intent of which is to close the loophole in section 7 of the Clayton Act and thus curb if not halt any further mergers of competing corporations. H. R. 2734 was originally introduced in the House by Congressman ESTES KEFAUVER (now a distinguished Member of the Senate), and was sponsored in the Senate by Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming. Last year, following a stormy debate on the issue, the House Judiciary Committee sent H. R. 2734 to the House for a vote. Under the able sponsorship of Congressman EMANUEL CELLER, the bill was passed by an overwhelming majority.

The next step in the consideration of H. R. 2734 was the hearings held by the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which highly respected HERBERT O'CONOR, of Maryland, was chairman. After extensive hearings (it was my privilege to testify before the House and Senate Judiciary Committees), the committee voted favorably on the measure and it was sent to the Senate where it awaits final action. President Truman's signature to H. R. 2734 is considered a foregone conclusion.

Speaking of the need for adoption of H. R. 2734, Senator O'MAHONEY said, "If we continue to lose our economic independence to giant corporate combines, the loss of political independence is inevitable." Senator KEFAUVER stated emphatically, "If the combines are not stopped, America will not long survive the trends to communism and socialism," and Congressman CELLER declared, "I don't want my children or your children to be confronted with signs which read 'verboten'—forbidden, you can't enter this or that business because there is an oligopoly of a big three or a big four—an absolute control."

Mr. and Mrs. America, it is later than you think.

Defense Procurement Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM L. DAWSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Expenditures, I have given a great deal of thought to the problems involved in the greatly enlarged defense procurement program resulting from events in Korea. All Americans remember the important work done during World War II by a Senate committee, whose chairman, Harry S. Truman, is now President of the United States. It is clear that the House has a responsibility to see to it that the vast new appropriations soon to be expended for our defense should be handled in the most efficient and economical fashion. Our committee is assigned such responsibility by the Legislative Reorganization Act.

At first it seemed to me that it might be wise to appoint a special subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to handle this important field. However, after discussion with many Members it seemed to me that a standing subcommittee of the full committee had proved by its work during this Congress its ability to handle the job. I speak of the Subcommittee on Government Operations, whose chairman is the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, the Honorable PORTER HARDY. This subcommittee has worked very hard during the Eighty-first Congress and has brought about in a workmanlike manner many important improvements in Government operations. This subcommittee has proved by its past actions that its members, both Democrats and Republicans, are interested in getting a job done and not in grabbing headlines. We, therefore, decided that this important assignment would be given to Chairman HARDY and his Subcommittee on Government Operations. The other members of that committee are Congressmen BOLTON of Maryland; BURNSIDE, of West Virginia; BOLLING, of Missouri; SHELLEY, of California; HOFFMAN of Michigan; RIEHLMAN, of New York; and LOVRE, of South Dakota.

We have every confidence that Chairman HARDY and his able subcommittee will accomplish much in the pursuit of this assignment.

Defense Procurement Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PORTER HARDY, JR.
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, Chairman DAWSON has just called to the attention of the House his assignment to my Subcommittee on Government Operations of responsibility to look into the procurement program which will result from the appropriations bills which this Congress has recently passed.

Obviously, when such great amounts of money are to be expended in relatively short periods of time, there is an unusual impact upon the economy of the United States. Additionally, there is an unusual likelihood that wastefulness and extravagance may occur. These considerations make it especially urgent that this subcommittee give its attention to the responsibilities conferred upon it by the Legislative Reorganization Act. I am delighted, therefore, that the chairman of our committee has assigned to me, together with my able colleagues who serve with me on the Government Operations Subcommittee, the responsibility for looking into this program of spending and seeking to achieve maximum returns for the funds spent.

The specific activities which we shall pursue have not yet been determined and we shall decide upon them after careful study of the problems at hand and with due consideration to their relative urgency and importance. We shall not act hastily but with deliberation, and we shall conduct our inquiries in a manner to avoid impeding any procurement activity of the Defense Establishment.

This matter of defense procurement comes within the purview of the Committee on Armed Services also. I have discussed it with Chairman VINSON, of that committee, and can assure the Members of the House that there will be full coordination and collaboration between us in order that there may be no duplication of effort and a maximum of accomplishment. Such coordination will be facilitated because I serve under Mr. VINSON as a member of the Armed Services Committee.

During the Eighty-first Congress the Subcommittee on Government Operations has been an active committee. We have conducted several important inquiries and have issued reports of considerable significance. I believe that we have made something of a record in that every action which has been taken by the subcommittee has been an unanimous action. This is a noteworthy indication of cooperation and whatever has been accomplished by my subcommittee can be attributed to the splendid attitude and the determination to do a job well on the part of every member of my subcommittee. I know that each of those men can be counted upon to carry forward this assignment with credit not only to themselves but to the House and that we will discharge well this specific responsibility which Chairman DAWSON has assigned to us.

Again the Question Is Asked, Why Do We Permit Critical or Strategic Material To Be Exported to Russia and Its Satellites?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, since I introduced on August 29 of this year a resolution for an investigation to determine the extent to which material and instruments of war have been or are being exported from the United States, either directly or through other countries, to Russia or those countries whose possession of such materials and instruments of war is inimical to the national defense and security of the United States, I have received many encouraging communications from different parts of the country. Likewise, there has been considerable interest displayed by newspapers and radio commentators.

As illustrative of the interest aroused in the subject, I include as part of my remarks a letter received by me from E. Dean Maitlen, Lafayette, Ind., as follows:

LAFAYETTE, IND., August 30, 1950.

Honorable WOLVERTON AND CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE.

DEAR SIR: It has been called to my attention that this country is allowing the shipment of essential war materials to our enemies directly and indirectly. Is this not an open act of treason? We advocate punishment for those that support and advocate the overthrowing of the Government by force. Is there any difference here? It would appear that the pouring of essential war materials to our enemies would be a direct act of advocating the overthrow of the Government by force.

Upon whose shoulders does this dastardly act fall? Does this action fall upon the shoulders of the State Department or is this the sole responsibility of the Commerce Department? Could this fall upon the shoulders of both Departments?

In behalf of the servicemen who are giving their lives for a cause that is still clouded to most of them, I would demand this act of treason be investigated and the guilty party or parties be subject to maximum punishment for their un-American activities.

An investigation should be carried out to its fullest extent and to obtain all the facts as to who is responsible for this unpardonable act and make public its findings. The committee should not have its hands tied by political pressure or by Big Johnny Dollar. An investigation should be made at the earliest possible moment while the blood still stains the hands of those that are involved in giving aid to our enemies, for the evidence would be much easier to obtain while the hands of those are still stained from wringing the blood from the cash they received in turn for war materials they furnished.

Has Big Johnny Dollar tied the hands of our Commerce and State Departments or is the selling of those war materials done by the Departments of their own free will?

At present we are trying to enact a law to control subversives but are we doing anything to prevent underhanded and dastardly dealings such as this?

It seems to me this act happened in World War II and was anything done about it? "H" no, for Big Johnny Dollar and Big Political Vice had things all tied up as usual. In this war as last war our boys will again trade their blood, brains and guts for Big Johnny Dollar's illicit profits.

Again let me repeat my desire in behalf of our fighting men, let's have a full investigation as soon as possible on the selling of war materials from this country to our enemies directly or indirectly for this is not strictly classified as un-American activity?

Sincerely,

E. DEAN MAITLEN.

The National Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "The National Guard—America's Minute Men," which I delivered at Camp Haven, near Sheboygan, Wis., on August 31, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL GUARD—AMERICA'S MINUTE MEN—A PLEA FOR TOTAL PREPAREDNESS, ADEQUATE CIVIL DEFENSE, WEEDING OUT OF POOR LEADERSHIP

It is a profound joy and thrill for me to be here today with your distinguished visitors, with the friends and dear ones of the men in training here at Camp Haven.

I am particularly grateful to have been invited with so renowned a group of Americans, including his excellency, the Honorable Adlai E. Stevenson, commander in chief of the Illinois National Guard, a distinguished veteran and able public executive. I do wish that there might be time to pay well-deserved tribute to men like Major General Smykal, commanding general of the Illinois Guard, and to the other famed officers and civilian leaders who have also been invited to this assemblage. Taken together, these men represent not only a tremendous number of years in the honored uniform of their country, but a vast number of years in public service.

It is an inspiring thing indeed that men who in many instances have fought political wars against one another on both sides of the fence, so to speak, join together in defense of America's soil and liberty, close ranks, unite when the bugle sounds and the drums roll for American patriots to rally as one.

But my heart goes out particularly to you men of the ranks today and to your loved ones. As I anticipated this occasion, I asked myself what I could say by way of sincerest tribute and encouragement to your distinguished officers, to you, the men of the National Guard, and to those who love you who are here today physically or in spirit.

WE PRAY THIRD WAR WILL NOT COME

The answer is truly that there are no words which can measure up to the deeds that you men and your buddies are performing and have performed for your country. In the Book of Books, in Ecclesiastes, we read that there is a time of war and a time of peace. We pray to Almighty God that today is not a time for all-out war. We pray that it may turn out to be a time for enduring peace. But if this should prove a time for war, then we know you will be adequate, and there will be no words in the English or any other language that could express to you the heartfelt gratitude of the great State of Illinois, yes, the States of Kansas or Missouri, or any other State, for the faith that you men have shown in joining up and remaining with your National Guard units, in taking time out from your daily lives to prepare yourself for the emergency which is now at hand.

WE ARE PROUD OF MIDWEST'S RECORD

We of the Middle West are proud of these our sons of the Middle West who are in training today. In both world wars (as in previous conflicts) sons of the midwestern heart of this Nation—principally volunteers—have contributed more than their share of glory to the sagas of American heroism.

THE EAST-WEST BATTLEFIELD IS EVERYWHERE

We have learned that the world battlefield is in a sense one—it is indivisible. Here in the Midwest in Camp Haven is a battlefield, so to speak, because here you men are preparing as earnestly as if you were getting last minute training outside the beleaguered port of Pusan.

At Lake Success, N. Y., where Security Council President Jacob Malik is proving himself to be the master of the Red monkey wrench—that, too, is one critical flank of the battlefield.

All corners of the globe, wherever we are fighting to win the minds and hearts of men, yes, those, too, are almost as much a part of the battlefield as are Taegu and Pohang and the Naktong River. Blood is spilled on the front lines, but victories or defeats can be sealed in the rear as well.

SUMMARY OF MY MAJOR POINTS

I do not want to trespass on time that is all too brief for these days' many features, so let me state my points as these:

1. You are the Minute Men of 1950.

2. You men symbolize here today the real test of an American.

3. The great commanding officer of the One Hundred and Ninth Antiaircraft Brigade symbolizes in his own right the best sterling qualities of an American leader.

4. Our statesmen must be as adequate as the men in our Armed Forces have always been.

5. If we must err, we must err on the side of being too well prepared rather than being too little prepared.

6. The total defense of the American continent must be accelerated.

CONGRATULATIONS ON EXCELLENT MARKSMANSHIP

Yes, first, gentlemen, I want to salute you, the Minute Men of 1950. Like the marksmen of colonial times, you have achieved brilliant records. You of the One Hundred and Ninth were rated superior last year and now again in 1950, you have really been blasting the aerial sleeves out of the sky. Congratulations, indeed.

THE ONLY STANDARD: IS A MAN A TRUE AMERICAN?

Second, you men here today symbolize the fact that in our country the only real distinction should be this: Is a man a sincere, true American or is he not? The distinctions should not be: Was a man born in a foreign land, or is he a native blue-blood, or were his parents born abroad; Is a man a Gentile, a Jew, a Negro, or white? A rank-and-file unionist or a manager?

The only real question is: Is he a devoted American or is he not? Is he devoted to the tradition of 175 years of American liberty, the tradition of our constitutional Republic or has he sold his soul to an alien allegiance like the Hisses, the Coplons, Fuchs, etc.?

TRIBUTES TO BRIG. GEN. JULIUS KLEIN FROM MAC ARTHUR AND OTHERS

Now, third, I would be remiss indeed if I allowed this opportunity to pass without paying tribute to the distinguished commanding officer of the One Hundred and Ninth Antiaircraft Artillery Brigade of the Illinois National Guard, my dear friend, Brig. Gen. Julius Klein. The very mention of his name brings to mind some of the unforgettable tributes which have been paid to him by the outstanding leaders of America's Armed Forces and of civilian life. I wish that there could be time to cite some of these messages which it has been my pleasure to see and hear, because I know that you men are happy to serve under so great a leader. I think, particularly, however, of messages that have come from General Klein's magnificent wartime chief, Gen. Douglas MacArthur in well-justified praise of the many honors that have been bestowed on this citizen-soldier-statesman-journalist. Douglas MacArthur—a Milwaukeean whose illustrious personal and family name will glow throughout the pages of world history—speaks superbly where praise is well justified—as in this instance—speaks boldly where criticism in policy is due. A faithful soldier, loyal to the core, MacArthur will nevertheless not flinch where duty calls him to warn his countrymen. America will heed his counsel, because it recalls its bitter folly when his brilliant warnings were ignored.

Now, friends, the men who have served under General Klein know him as the GI's general, a man who while maintaining the necessary discipline and esprit of his troops, brings to his post a sense of humility, of warm comradeship, of deep personal feeling for every last individual serving with him, that is so befitting the leader of a citizen contingent. In two world wars the general, like his men, has proved not only his military skill and daring but his absolute devotion to the flag of his country. In peacetime, he has received great recognition in his chosen profession of public relations. He is a source of pride to the State of Illinois, to his Nation, to the members of his ancient faith, and to all lovers of freedom. These, I assure you, are not just words, but are more than borne out by the record of service he has compiled as a brigadier general, as a veteran, as the first midwesterner who was elected national commander of the Jewish War Veterans, as a dauntless foe of communism, and in many other capacities.

WE NEED SUPERIOR STATESMANSHIP

Fourth, you men know that in this and all other National Guard units, there is constantly a weeding-out process of men who prove incompetent to hold posts of importance. I say, my friends, that the time is overdue for the Federal Government in Washington to follow a similar policy of weeding out its incompetents. I say that—believe me in a nonpartisan way—to both major political parties. When a man goes into battle he needs and must have officers of proven leadership, men with nerves of steel, men of superior merit. We need the same type of men in Washington—in diplomacy, in administration; yes, in legislation. We have had too many square pegs in round holes. I repeat, I say this not in a partisan way, not in carping criticism, not with anything at heart but the welfare of my beloved country, just as you men are similarly devoted.

Fifth, ladies and gentlemen, it is obvious that we must have total preparedness—in stockpiling strategic materials, in an unbeatable intelligence set-up, in balanced armed services, in peerless military and scientific research, in civil defense.

COLD WAR WILL CONTINUE INDEFINITELY

Korea has taught us that we are in this show with the Russians for keeps. There is no miracle that is going to solve the problems between us overnight or automatically. We are not going to wake up tomorrow morning and blissfully find that we can live happily ever after with Joe Stalin and company. We may wake up tomorrow morning and find that things have grown worse, but the chances are that we will not find that they have grown any better.

The Red strategy is a diabolic long-range plan for the absolute domination of the world. The cold war will be continued indefinitely. We must live as if in a garrison, practically indefinitely. This does not mean that we must be panicked or hysterical or pessimistic or that we must abandon entirely our former traditions. On the contrary, we must maintain that faith which we are told moves mountains, faith that we can avoid war, but we must be sternly realistic.

America's policy has always been to do as little as we could get away with in unpreparedness, to have as few men and as little material in our Army, in our Navy, and in our Air Force. "Give the National Guard boys old armories, obsolete weapons; it'll be O. K." That's been the attitude but now the entire policy of America must be changed. If we must err in the future, let us err on the side of having too many trained men, too much modern material and facilities and too much modern equipment for our regulars, our reservists and our guardsmen. After all, the very life of America will be at stake if a third world war should come and with our life, the entire life of western civilization. We are, in Lincoln's words, "the last best hope of earth."

OUR CIVIL DEFENSE IS A TRAGIC FARCE

The fact that I am addressing an antiaircraft brigade brings to mind this fact: Aside from military defenses, America's civil defense thus far, speaking very objectively, is a terrible dud. It is a farce, a tragic comedy of errors. We have been told that if war came, 50,000,000 Americans in our leading cities could be the possible subject of mass extermination in a matter of days—or hours. Against that fact I must regretably report that civil defense exists principally in a few sugary press releases, a few highly technical booklets, a few hopes and a few fat-chewing round tables. The Russians cannot be very impressed; nor are we. Civil defense delays comprise a shocking situation which could out-Pearl Harbor Pearl Harbor if the worst came to worst. We must act and act now to be adequately prepared.

CONCLUSION

That, then, friends, is my message to you today. I am grateful for your kind attention.

I repeat that if it should be your fate to be called to active duty, I know that you will carry on in the inspiring tradition of the great National Guard record which you have compiled in the past. You are the minute men, and thank God, the minute men who have sprung to America's defense have always been worthy of our faith. Good luck, and Godspeed, to your officers and to you men. And may you and your loved ones know that satisfaction of a job well done, for a peerless country to whom we can never give too much.

May the skies hold for you and for all America not missiles of death and destruction, not enemy aircraft, but wings of peace, or mercy, of prosperity for us and for all mankind.

Thank you.

Origin of the Fourteenth Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE R. HOEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, a very illuminating editorial from Monday's Washington Post on the Origin of the Fourteenth Amendment.

This editorial discusses the conclusive historical findings of both Prof. Stanley Morrison and Prof. Charles Fairman of Stanford University, that the fourteenth amendment was never intended to have, and does not in fact have, any binding effect upon the States with reference to requiring them to enforce the Bill of Rights.

Justice Black, writing a dissenting opinion in Adamson against California, 3 years ago tried to establish this contention on behalf of himself and Justices Douglas, Murphy, and Rutledge, but the majority of the Court refused to accept that doctrine and adhered to the established interpretation which has been recognized for the past 80 years. The findings of these historians fully sustain the decision of the Court and rebut the contention of the dissenters.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORIGIN OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

To what extent is the fourteenth amendment a guaranty of civil rights? For more than four score years judges, lawyers, and scholars have been debating this question without bringing forth any complete or definite answer. Because of the importance of the fourteenth amendment in this respect, we may assume that the debate will go on indefinitely. But it is significant that able scholars, digging into the background out of which this amendment grew, are coming up with detailed answers to some of the questions on which judges, writers, and commentators have gone astray in the past.

Nearly 3 years ago four justices of the Supreme Court came out with a flat affirmation, in Adamson v. California, that a major purpose of the fourteenth amendment was to make the Bill of Rights applicable to the States. One more vote would have made that view the law of the land. And that would have actually undermined our Federal system; for the fourteenth amendment gives Congress sweeping power to make its terms effective by legislation. Presumably Congress would have suddenly acquired power to legislate for the States on any matter covered in the Bill of Rights. The consequences, according to Prof. Stanley Morrison of Stanford University, would have been drastic and would have required a major readjustment in the processes of State government.

In defending the position taken by himself and Justices Douglas, Murphy, and Rutledge, Justice Black attached to his dissent a résumé of the history of the amendment. "In my judgment," he wrote, "that history conclusively demonstrates that the language of the first section of the fourteenth amendment, taken as a whole, was thought by those responsible for its submission to the people, and by those who opposed its submission, sufficiently explicit to guarantee that thereafter no State would deprive its citizens of the privileges and protections of the Bill of Rights."

This appeal to history—history which the Supreme Court is accused of having previously ignored for nearly a century—stimulated at least one scholar into action. Charles Fairman, professor of law and political science at Stanford University, examined all the debates on the fourteenth amendment in the House and Senate; the debates on related bills in those two bodies; the debates in the State legislatures which ratified the amendment; and a large number of the speeches made and editorials written about the amendment in 1866-68. He gave the public the benefit of his research in the December 1949 issue of the Stanford Law Review, and the effect was to leave the justices who claimed to have resorted to history with only flimsy shreds of fact to stand on.

The finding that stands out most prominently from Professor Fairman's research is that the people did not know precisely what they were doing when they amended the Constitution to say: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States * * *." At no time was there any agreement as to what those privileges and immunities are. Before Congress accepted the fourteenth amendment it had passed the Civil Rights Act. This act assured to the recently freed slaves the right to contract, to sue, to testify, to buy, hold, and sell property, and to enjoy the full and equal benefit of the laws for the security of person and property. Many had thought that it was unconstitutional for Congress to pass such an act. Consequently, the debate in the House reiterated, again and again, that the purpose of the fourteenth amendment was to make permanent and secure the rights enumerated in the Civil Rights Act. No one went over the guaranties of the Bill of Rights—freedom of speech and of the press, religious liberty, freedom of assembly, etc—to claim that they were included among the "privileges and immunities" referred to.

In presenting the resolution to the Senate, Senator Jacob M. Howard did say positively that the phrase was meant to include the "personal rights guaranteed and secured by the first eight amendments of the Constitution." But this attracted little attention and was contrary to what most of the other Senators said. The Senate amended the resolution, and when it went back to the House nothing was said about the Federal Bill of Rights. Some of the opponents of the resolution insisted that it was intended to transfer all power affecting the rights of citizens from the States to the Federal Government, but this was hotly contradicted by the sponsors. The examination of many speeches, articles, and editorials about the amendment, Professor Fairman concludes, also "counts heavily against the theory of incorporation."

Turning to the ratification of the amendment in the State legislatures, Professor Fairman found almost no mention of the Bill of Rights in the messages and debates. On the contrary, several States having in their own constitutions provisions out of line with the Federal Bill of Rights adopted the amendment with no mention of the possibility that it would impinge upon their own basic laws. Five years after passage of the amendment Representative Bingham, its sponsor in the House, did say in the heat of a debate over a bill aimed at klan outrages in the South that the privileges and immunities clause was designed to embrace the Bill of Rights. But this contradicted what he had said when the amendment was under consideration, and a colleagnue reminded him that he could make but could not unmake history.

Professor Fairman concludes from a wealth of detail that history is "overwhelmingly against" Justice Black's thesis, which was supposed to have been based on history, and the professor cites chapter and verse to the extent of 135 pages. Professor Morrison reaches the same conclusion from a survey of court opinions and arguments involving the fourteenth amendment. Regardless of how desirable it might be to have the full Bill of Rights in effect as against State action, there is no justification for misreading history or for changing the meaning of the amendment by judicial action.

Of course, the principles of the first amendment and some other parts of the Bill of Rights are now recognized as binding upon the States by reason of the fourteenth amendment. But this is because the fourteenth amendment prohibits the States from depriving any person of "life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Since the guaranties of the first amendment applicable to the Federal Government are concerned directly with "liberty," they fit neatly into the requirement of the fourteenth amendment that the States shall respect every person's "liberty." But this is a very different matter from saying that the entire Bill of Rights is taken over under the vague "privileges and immunities" clause. Since the lack of historical warrant for that thesis has now been amply demonstrated, the danger of such a distortion of the amendment has probably passed. But it is not a comforting thought that four members of the court were ready to overturn the long-established view of the amendment on historical grounds without a thorough historical analysis.

It Is Time for the United States To Stop Importation of Russian Goods Made by Slave Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, one of the most revealing statements concerning the present policy of our Government officials in permitting goods, the product of Russia's concentration labor camps, to enter our country in competition with the free labor of America, was made by Robert P. Burleigh, over the Mutual Broadcasting System, August 10, 1950. It challenges every American to demand that this official policy be changed. The workers of America see the danger as was evidenced last week when the stevedores union in New York city refused to unload a ship arriving with a cargo of Russian furs.

The statement to which I have referred is as follows:

While the Soviet Union has now made it abundantly clear that it never has had any intention of trying to live within the Charter of the United Nations, it is surprising how many people have not understood that the tactics now employed by Mr. Jacob Malik in the Security Council are simply an amplification of the Soviet strategy which has been effective ever since the Russians pressed for the veto when the UN was formed in 1945. Communist and pro-Communist apologists, aided in many instances by officials of our Government who have given them stature and protection, these Communists and pro-Communists have been able to fool many Americans into believing that the United Nations was or would accomplish much more than has been accomplished in the past 5 years.

The publicists for the United Nations, with millions available for publicity purposes, have been able to advertise the United Nations in a manner that causes the unsuspecting and uninformed to believe that great progress has been made by the UN. But in very few instances, and certainly in no major crisis, has the United Nations been able to make a single decision which might conceivably offend the Soviet Union. What is taking place in the United Nations Security Council is no accident, but is a part of a well-planned program by the men of the Kremlin to implement the Communist program which has the defeat of the United States as its prime objective. We set forth certain facts last evening which is evidence of the Soviet attempt to hamstring the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations in much the same manner as Jacob Malik is delaying action in the Security Council. The issue, of course, is greater and emotions are higher. But the fact remains that evidence has been available for months which proves the Communist aims as aggressive and pointed toward the wrecking of the United States.

One of the best methods Russia has to injure the economy of the United States, to hasten the day of a demoralizing depression, one of the methods has been the use of forced labor to produce goods which are sold on the American market to compete with free American labor. Although we have laws to protect American labor and business from precisely this evil, every attempt has been made, and we know of many complaints which have been made by business and labor, every attempt to have the administration or the UN take action has been met with procrastination and evasion.

It is a known fact, and admitted by some Soviet officials, that Russia maintains slave labor camps, where political prisoners and others who have lost favor with the Communists are forced into every conceivable line of work. Estimates of the number of men and women in these forced labor camps varies from ten to fifteen million. These human beings produce for Soviet Russia and the goods are sold in this country in direct defiance of established laws. Since the Government's production cost is nil, the Russian export of goods made by this forced labor affords the Kremlin the dollar advantage desired, as well as the furthering the Communist program of bleeding the United States industries and labor.

To understand the thinking of officials in our Commerce Department you need only to look back into the record to see where the Chief of the Russian Unit in the Commerce Department, Mr. E. C. Ropes, testified before a congressional committee concerning the importation of Russian furs shortly after his return from an official visit to Russia in 1947. The subcommittee chairman, Congressman REID MURRAY of Wisconsin, asked Mr. Ropes if he had been in Russia trying to scare up trade. Mr. Ropes replied that he was in Russia trying to buy—not to sell—and actually said that the United States had nothing to sell Russia. Mr. Ropes, of the Commerce Department, then eulogized the Communists he met in Russia, saying that he had a very favorable reception and that it was only a question of time before they would be selling as much as they could of what we need in order to buy what they need—and then some.

The Commerce Department—and the State Department, too—has never seemed too concerned over the evidence which has been available for years as to forced labor in Soviet Russia competing against American industries which employ free American labor—at least not concerned enough to force a show-down on the issue. The chairman of the subcommittee hearing the Commerce Department official felt compelled to refer to his trip to Russia as the second Mission to Moscow.

Another indication of the administration's evasiveness in dealing with the problem of imports from Russia can be found in the argument offered by officials of the State, Treasury, and Commerce Departments that Soviet fur imports, which make up more than 50 percent of the total Russian goods sold in this country should continue to be sold because the United States was securing large amounts of manganese from Russia, which might be cut off if the United States would take any action. But in checking later it was found that Russia has already discontinued most of her shipments of manganese to the United States. It was evident that the excuses given by the State Department could not be verified—yet the intolerable situation continues even today—for, as we pointed out in yesterday's broadcast, that the buying of Soviet furs this year will probably be increased over last year.

It seems so useless to spend billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money in Marshall plan aid and ECA funds to combat communism while we supply Russia with the necessary dollars to finance her organized Communist programs in this country. Yet, as we have pointed out, the Commerce Department officials and the State Department officials have been very evasive, and have so far avoided taking any action either through our own governmental channels or through the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. As a matter of fact, the Soviet delegate to the UN Economic and Social Council has been able to hamstring that agency of the world organization this month. Even as Mr. Malik has been doing ever since he took over the Security Council.

There is one other most important point. The Russian furs are sold to American fur buyers who went to Leningrad last month to make their purchases—and the Soviet Union, through its controlled economy, sells at a price which undermines the American market because it also controls its labor—and has millions in forced labor. The furs are fashioned in this country by the Fur Workers Union. You might wonder how an American union worker would feel about fashioning furs which conceivably have been farm grown and handled by slave labor. But the Fur Workers Union in this country is Communist infiltrated and Communist dominated. The head of the Fur Workers Union is a Communist. His name is Ben Gold. And the current issue of the fur workers paper carries Communist Ben Gold's most recent bold display of impudence. Communist Ben Gold has a page of the paper to insult the American intelligence and to parrot the Communist Party line. That's the top of the news as it looks from here.

Manufacture of the Hydrogen Bomb

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. WILLIAMS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Sometimes 'Too Big' Is Just Right," which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of September 2, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOMETIMES "TOO BIG" IS JUST RIGHT

The Atomic Energy Commission has picked the du Pont Co. for experimentation with and, if possible, manufacture of the hydrogen bomb. The Commission must have thought that du Pont was big enough to tackle such an enormous assignment.

In the meantime, the Government's suit against du Pont, based on the general theory that the company is too big, still stands. The average citizen must ask himself what would have happened if the Government had pushed its suit a little harder, started it a little sooner and perhaps by this time succeeded in splitting du Pont into fractions. Would any of the constituent parts have been big enough to make a hydrogen bomb?

Alleged Socialistic Nature of Columbia Valley Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ZALES N. ECTON

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Is CVA Socialistic?" published in the Olympia (Wash.) Olympian of July 26, 1950; also an editorial entitled "Is CVA Socialistic?" published in the Bellingham (Wash.) Herald of August 2, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Olympia (Wash.) Olympian of July 26, 1950]

IS CVA SOCIALISTIC?

A recently developed Fair Deal strategy is found in the attempt to rid certain highly controversial proposals of the socialist label. Such schemes as the Columbia Valley Administration, spokesmen argue, aren't really socialistic at all and are so branded only by reactionaries and greedy capitalists.

In a case of this sort, expert opinion is desirable, and on the subject of socialism Norman Thomas, six-time Socialist Party candidate for the office of President, is certainly an expert. Mr. Thomas has come out strongly for CVA, and he obviously regards it as consonant with socialist principle. Years ago, in this connection, Mr. Thomas said that TVA, which forms the basic pattern for all proposed valley authorities, is a fine example of socialism in action.

Mr. Thomas is a highly regarded citizen, and he enjoys the respect of many persons who disagree violently with his views. This is partly true because of his evident ability and sincerity, and also because he does not hide under camouflage. He is a Socialist by conviction and he is proud of it. But what are we to say of lesser men who, pretending to believe in free enterprise, and pretending to be anti-Socialist, are trying to sell the country on measures which represent an extreme of socialism?

As for CVA, Senator WAYNE MORSE, of Oregon, who is regarded as one of the most liberal of all the Republicans, has said that it presents the danger of bureaucratic paternalism, a "bureaucratic monopolistic policy." He added: "If we are going to keep democracy strong in this country, we must insist that people who are going to be directly affected by the policies of the Government have a voice in making the policies.

CVA would do much to destroy that philosophy.

[From the Bellingham (Wash.) Herald of August 2, 1950]

IS CVA SOCIALISTIC?

F. Girard Davidson, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, said at Pendleton that the Power Trust is trying to smear the Columbia Valley Administration with a label of socialism instead of arguing the facts.

Mr. Davidson obviously intended to imply that the proposed CVA is not socialistic. It is pretty easy to argue the facts in support of the contention that this program is socialism in disguise. It is in disguise because its sponsors know that the people of the United States are against socialism. The Socialist Party, with even so popular a citizen as Norman Thomas as its standard bearer can poll only about 1,000,000 votes in a national election. But numerous socialistic measures, parading as democratic advances with in the framework of the Constitution, have passed muster.

If the proposed CVA is not a brand of socialism, then so eminent an authority on the subject as Mr. Thomas, six times Socialist candidate for President, does not know what the CVA is or what socialism is. Mr. Thomas described CVA as a splinter—and a very good one—taken by the Democrats from the Socialist platform.

Previously, Socialist Party representatives from Oregon, Idaho, Montana, and Washington, meeting in Seattle, said they realized that CVA is a Socialist venture, and then went on record against the pending CVA bill because it provides no adequate safeguards to insure democratic control. In other words, even the Socialists of the Northwest could not swallow it.

Mr. Davidson lays down the usual line in blaming the Power Trust, whereas the biggest Power Trust is the Federal Government itself, with the power of the Federal Treasury and the Federal propaganda machine behind it. Opposition to CVA is not limited to the private power companies, which have a stake in trying to protect themselves, but has enlisted scores of organizations and unnumbered citizens, including the governors of the States affected.

Efforts to avoid the socialism label suggest evasive tactics. It would be more in accord with the realities to accept Norman Thomas' description of CVA as a splinter from the Socialist platform, and go on arguing the facts from there.

Branding Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. THYE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Branding Russia," which was published in the Washington Post this morning.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRANDING RUSSIA

That the time is approaching when a spade will be called a spade is indicated by the issuance of an Army pamphlet on Why We Fight. In this document the enemy is named as "international communism," and this terminology was carried to Capitol Hill by Secretary Johnson in his plea for more military aid for Europe. "Everybody knows by that," says an Army spokesman, "that we mean Russia." Next time the Army sends out anything of the sort, he added, Russia will be spelled out, for the State Department has taken off the camouflage and allowed names to be called by way of identifying the enemy responsible for western rearmament.

So the country is being prepared for the time when Russia will be named before the United Nations in any patent case that arises of an aggression by proxy which in fact is Russian. This is what Mr. Stassen has been pleading for. It is quite plain, however, that not all hypothetical cases could be so labeled, or that it would be strategically wise so to label them, and Mr. Stassen himself allowed for discretion, even in the kind of action to be taken in coping with any fresh agression. He simply wanted the country not to pretend in all cases from now on, and his speech, which was rebroadcast throughout the country, carried conviction. What seems to have been in his mind is, say, a Bulgarian aggression on Greece which, it is perfectly obvious from the extension of Russia into Bulgaria, would, in fact, be Russian. The great mistake of the between-war years, according to Lord Vansittart's memoirs, was the unwillingness to call a spade a spade, and Mr. Stassen would not have this country repeat it. He, it seems to us, is basically right. Mr. Stassen ought, incidentally, to have included the kind of resolution which, in the event, he would sponsor before the United Nations.

Before the country gets into this danger zone, however, the Government might give a thought to the exact way the enemy is to be described in our propaganda so as to provide maximum value both to our cause and to our peace aims. "Know thine adversary!" warned Cromwell. Is it Russia? Is it communism? In the former case, we would stand guilty of indicting a nation, as we did in the cases of Germany and Japan, with disastrous results to the peace. If we call communism the enemy, then we virtually foreswear our own propaganda abroad, which is aimed at the conversion of "lost souls," in George F. Kennan's words.

Moreover, if the enemy be described as communism, then the issue is made to look like a war between economic systems, with capitalism in the role of adversary. Is this effective? We think not. For it is not true. It merely helps the Russian propagandists to show their people that the capitalists want to bring them under a system of capitalism which is coequal in the Russian propagandists' terminology with tyranny and which in fact no longer exists anywhere. There is something bloodless in the antithesis, something unreal; for men do not die for a system, especially when they know that the antithesis is inexact. Communists in Russia form a gang—a fraction of the population armed with the power to hold the people by the throat. And these are the terrorized victims of what has been called knouto-tyranny. It is this state of subjection to which our propaganda must be addressed so as to hold out the hope of liberation from a status as cannon fodder and serfdom.

It is thus a most important question that the Army has raised, and one that cannot be answered by simple minds. Perhaps a leaf from the copybook of the Kremlin may not be out of order. The oligarchs and warmongers there don't pillory America or the Americans. Oh, dear, no, Americans are their friends, exploited by "Wall Street warmongers" or 'cannibals" or "Fascists." These mythical monsters become real as the tools of propaganda because they are personalized. The Soviet's chiefs seek to create the impression that they are liberators of American men and women oppressed by capitalistic exploiters. They pretend they are just as American as Americans. This, of course, doesn't come off, though a similar appeal does in some other countries, for it carries no connotation of strangeness or apartness, only of fellow-feeling.

The Russian moguls and their publicity agents strive in their propaganda to be fellow Asians in Asia and fellow-Europeans in Europe, even if they cannot quite identify themselves with particular nations. They use a rifle shot technique in their propaganda in the countries they wish to undermine. We must follow suit—at Soviet expense. The Kremlin warmongers are our enemies, not the Russian people, not even the Russian soldiers. It is a nice but extremely important problem to be resolved, this problem of how to call the propaganda shots, and it deserves much study and consideration before we start to repeat the propaganda mistakes of the last experience with an enemy.

General MacArthur and the Democratization of Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, in July 1946, several Members of the House and Senate, who had attended the independence ceremony in Manila, were privileged also to visit with General MacArthur in Tokyo. We were all most favorably impressed with the success of his work in the rebuilding of Japan. Even at that time it was apparent that he had won the confidence of the people of that nation, as he and his father before him had won the friendship and confidence of the people of the Philippines. A most interesting article concerning the great work of General MacArthur appeared recently in the press of the Nation, and I ask unanimous consent that it appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of August 27, 1950]

MAC HAILS DEMOCRATIZATION OF JAPS AS HISTORIC MILESTONE—GENERAL THINKS NIPPONESE WILL MAKE NATION AN OASIS OF HOPE FOR ALL ASIA

(By Bob Considine)

TOKYO, August 26.—General MacArthur believes that historians of the future will regard the democratization of Japan as of more importance and significance than the two world wars which preceded it.

The supreme commander, whose personality and leadership have played decisive roles in the astonishing change in Japan's way of life, has complete confidence in the Japanese people's ability and desire to make their islands an oasis of hope for the enslaved millions of Asiatics surrounding them.

"The Japanese are among the best of orientals," the general told me.

CHEER A WINNER, HATE A LOSER

"And they share one strong oriental trait. They cheer a winner and hate a loser.

"Thus when they lost their first war, they came to despise themselves and the leaders and practices that had brought about their downfall.

"For a short time after their defeat, they hung suspended in a great vacuum. There was not even comfort for them in their deities, for they knew that many of the so-called holy men who stood between them and those deities had long since become tools of the state—the defeated state—and had worked for its preservation against the individual.

"It was a time of great soul searching.

"Into this vacuum walked the Anglo-Saxon influence of our occupation forces, a wholly new experience to a people almost wholly isolated for centuries and accustomed to complete domination of their bodies and spirits.

"The men who brought me back over that bloody 5,000-mile road from Australia have now brought into Japan a civilization and culture founded on what Franklin Roosevelt called democracy and what Pope Pius XII calls the dignity of man. Call it liberty, freedom, or what you wish. It is our bedrock.

"We brought this to the Japanese people in such a way that 1,000 years from now the historian will give scant notice to the two great wars as peaks of significance in the first half of the twentieth century."

NO RETURN TO AUTOCRACY

"In a few paragraphs he will say of those wars that they were the product of a restless, tumultuous period change. But he will say, I am sure, that the truly momentous event of that distant time was the bringing by the vital and wonderful young United States of America of Anglo-Saxon civilization to Asia through Japan."

There was well-controlled emotion in the general's voice when he answered a question about the durability of Japan's new system of life.

"You can search the pages of history in vain and never find an instance when a country which had tasted freedom voluntarily reverted to autocracy or totalitarianism," he declared.

'I stress the word 'voluntarily.' What has happened in Czechoslovakia and Poland and other countries is an evil thing forced upon those peoples.

"The Japanese will never return to the life they knew, where a man is afraid to speak his mind even in the presence of his wife and children, for fear they would feel duty bound to report him to the thought police.

"Nor will they return to the aggressive warriors' role. They are courageous, magnificent fighters, but their wish to rule the world has been crushed forever. They will never return to a system that has brought utter and complete defeat to them."

Anglo-Saxon culture came to the Japanese in small and subtle packages, MacArthur believes, as well as in the mighty directives that were issued back and forth until he felt that the Japanese people were better led than clubbed.

PRAISES CONDUCT OF JAPS

"They were curious as to what sustained the Anglo-Saxon soldier when he first appeared on their shores," MacArthur stated.

"They learned, for instance, that he had built his little place of worship along the victory road often before he built his hospitals.

"They became inquisitive about his God and his inherent decency, and his love of life. They were startled to find him both conqueror against whom they had been warned—yet gentle and generous * * * and good to their children.

"I can think of no finer tribute to their full acceptance of the rights and responsibilities of liberty than their conduct during this difficult war in Korea."

HAS FULL FAITH IN JAPAN

"When I received my orders from the President on June 27 and launched into the war across the sea of Japan, the question arose: 'Now that we must strip our occupation forces, will the Japanese sabotage the work of the past 5 years?'

"I did not deliberate 5 minutes on this, for I knew that the Japanese could be trusted implicitly.

"In short order we were down to one division, occupying a country of 84,000,000, only 5 years removed from a war which they thought would bring them the world.

"My faith in them is such that I am now reshuffling the last division of the occupation forces and sending the majority of its men and equipment to Korea."

AS JAPAN GOES, SO GOES ASIA

"When the time comes I shall have no hesitation about moving my own headquarters into the field in Korea.

"When I was in Japan as a younger man, there was an aphorism which went something like the one about Maine. This one went 'As Japan goes, so goes Asia.'

"And the historian will take that into account, when he looks back upon this time," finished the man who wrought in just 5 years the miracle of which he spoke.

Statehood for Alaska and Hawaii

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the burden of important legislative matters should not exclude our consideration of the Alaska and Hawaii statehood bills before recess or adjournment of this Congress. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, a letter received from one of my constituents, Kenneth Haskell Mantel, which he addressed to the New York Herald Tribune.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATEHOOD BILLS

BROOKLYN, August 17, 1950.

To the New York Herald Tribune:

The desperate situation in Korea has turned the eyes of the world toward the Pacific and has brought into sharp focus the necessity of immediate statehood for Hawaii and Alaska.

Alaska, with its wealth of potential resources, and Hawaii, with its industrious population and important agricultural economy, can become self-sufficient and prosperous States. The statehood bills have the backing of the President, Delegates BARTLETT and FARRINGTON, the majority of the Members of Congress and the people of the respective Territories. These bills have passed the House of Representatives. Despite President Truman's repeated requests that these bills be called up, the Senate leaders have yet to act.

We are today engaged in a great struggle against the driving force of totalitarian communism. In my statement to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs I said: "With statehood within reach, the people of Hawaii have increasingly fought against communism in their Territory. I feel very strongly that with statehood granted to Hawaii, the fight against communism will continue. Communism has no hold on Hawaii. I challenge anyone to prove otherwise. I wish to unequivocally state that the greatest defeat which faces the Communists today is statehood for Hawaii."

KENNETH HASKELL MANTEL.

Parents of Boys Fighting in Korea Are Concerned About Present Policy of Our Government That Permits Strategic Material To Get Through to Russia and Its Satellites

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a letter, which I include as part of my remarks, from Philip E. McKenna, Thorofare, N. J., dated August 30, 1950, in which he commends the investigation to be opened on Wednesday next, September 6, by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The purpose of the investigation is to inquire into the present policy of the Office of International Trade of the Department of Commerce in granting licenses for the exportation of strategic material and weapons that ultimately reach Russia or its satellites.

In addition to the inquiry inaugurated by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I am a member, I have also introduced House Resolution 831, authorizing the Speaker of the House to appoint a committee of seven Members to make such an investigation. This resolution was referred to the Rules Committee.

There is no justification for our Government officials to grant licenses for the exportation of strategic materials at a time when they do or might reach the enemies of democracy. Our boys fighting in Korea are entitled to better consideration. The letter to which I have referred shows how the parents of these boys feel about the matter. It reads as follows:

THOROFARE, N. J., August 30, 1950.

Hon. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON,
Member of Congress.

DEAR SIR: I want you to know that I am in heartfelt accord with your proposed action, namely, a congressional investigation to determine who is responsible and to stop the shipment and delivery of materials to foreign countries where these materials eventually fall into the hands of the Communist aggressors who in turn use them to kill our young men.

My son, Phil Jr., age 21, is in the Korean theater with the United States Air Force. Your action gives me great comfort, inasmuch as it may prolong his life and the lives of many other fine young men.

May God give you the strength and the wisdom to see this through to a successful conclusion.

Sincerely,

PHILIP E. MCKENNA.

The Medway Plan for Human Rehabilitation and World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Dr. Charles R. Joy, entitled "The Medway Plan for Human Rehabilitation and World Peace."

There being no objection, the plan was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A RAINBOW OF HOPE

A huge, rusty gun rises above the battered ruins of the old Atlantic wall, the great bastion built by Hitler along the Channel coast of France to prevent an allied invasion. Storm clouds mass behind it, black and threatening. A gust of wind, a rush of rain, and then—the rainbow.

Back again in Strasbourg, this is a vivid memory of a recent visit to a little fishing town in northern France. But it is more than a memory. It is a symbol of our hope. The shattered remnants of the old war remain: guns and walls and mines, widows and orphans, and mutilated children. Now a new conflict in eastern Asia threatens many parts of the world, the dark clouds lowering in the heavens, driving winds and rains beating down upon us in scattered showers, but there, vibrant in glowing colors overreaching all earth's sorrows and its pains, is the rainbow of man's eternal hope. To this rainbow the unique Medway plan adds its bit of light and color. It stretches in beauty from land to land and binds the people together in love and hope.

THE BASIS OF PEACE

Councils and parliaments, charters and treaties, codes of international law and leagues of united nations will never of themselves create a world of peace. These are but the channels through which a river of life must flow; the empty chalice into which the wine of love must be poured. There are many who cry peace today when there is no peace; many who, behind the form of law, conspire to break the law; many who would organize an idea in order to destroy it. Men put their confidence in external things and artificial forms because faith and love are absent from their hearts. But peace is an inward quality. It is born in the mind and in the soul. It is profoundly spiritual and religious.

The world has never sought peace early enough. Peace is usually a frantic, postwar dream. Former enemies meet with all the old hostility in their hearts to sign it. Wartime allies, sometimes with little in common except their hatred of a former foe, meet to organize it. It is obvious that upon such a basis a lasting peace cannot be found or made.

THE LONG VIEW

Jesus looked beyond the present moment. He cherished a dream of a richer world; He preached of a future messianic kingdom. He was not deeply concerned with immediate problems. "Render unto Ceasar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's." There in brief compass was his attitude toward present and future. There are temporal things, things of today, to which we must make our adjustment. But there are things that are of God, eternal in the heavens, and these are the important things. To the divine law, to the future heavenly kingdom, our loyalty is due. In the end the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our God.

THE MEDWAY PLAN

The Medway plan believes that the essential thing is a will to peace which is based on friendship and understanding. It pins its faith upon the spiritual forces that move in the hearts of men—forces which, eventually, will produce a world conscience wherein the cornerstones are honor, human rights, the moral law, and rule by law. Medway plan is not an organization, in the ordinary sense. It asks for no contributions and carries on no financial campaigns. It is what its name suggests, a simple plan for individual action freely offered to all those who would help to build a world at peace, either through their individual efforts or through voluntary cooperation with others. To such as these the Medway plan makes its suggestions and offers its assistance through its voluntary workers, who are known as Medway-plan associates.

THE CHILDREN FIRST

The Medway plan begins with the children. They are the leaders, the educators, and the voters of tomorrow. If the children of one land come to understand the children of other lands they will grow into adult citizens of a world community where war is unthinkable. The Medway plan therefore attempts to bring the children of America into helpful contact with the children of other lands through correspondence and through the gifts of simple essentials of life It is an exciting thing for a child in a war-torn country to find a new friend in that America which he has always thought of as the wonderland beyond the seas. And little hearts reach out to little hearts, binding friendships are formed, and the future of the world made more secure. It is the business of the Medway plan to facilitate these friendships. It has long lists of names and addresses available. Perhaps the children will lead us into the promised land.

THE ADULTS NEXT

It is the deep conviction of the Medway plan that every individual should make his contribution to the peace of the world. Those who make no such contribution strengthen by act of omission the evil forces that at present dominate the world. The Medway plan has suggestions for those who would like to help but do not know where to begin. It is ready to put Americans in touch with individuals and families abroad who need encouragement and a little help. During the past 3 years many thousands of Americans have found a way into the hearts of stricken families in the war-torn countries by this method of free adoption. This is the final, convincing argument for democracy.

TOWN SPONSORSHIPS

The Medway plan facilitates, also, the adoption of community by community, and many American towns and cities from Maine to California have sponsored sister communities in France, Austria, Italy, England and Germany. This has resulted in bulk shipments of supplies—food, clothing, medicines—to provide immediate relief and, more important still, the establishment of personal friendships. The many letters of gratitude attest to the enduring consequences of this plan. But there are many more such communities that await the evidence of loving concern. The work of building a world of peace has only just begun.

THE RESULTS

More than 200,000 American children and adults are now in regular touch with a corresponding number of persons in Europe. Over 150 American communities have adopted European towns under the Medway plan program. About $2,000,000 worth of relief supplies have been sent abroad to date. Eighty information centers are being established overseas, stocked with material telling the story of a friendly, democratic America. This is a remarkable record of short-time accomplishment by a group of devoted persons working without compensation because of their loyalty to the future peace of the world.

INCEPTION OF MEDWAY PLAN

The Medway plan was founded and developed by Mr. William Montgomery Bennett, of Woodbury, Conn., and Charleston, S. C., a retired industrialist and economist, who is now giving all of his time and work to the promotion of true freedom and world peace. In this he is ably assisted by chapters of Medway plan associates of which Mrs. Gertrude Sanford Legendre is chairman. Mr. Bennett was formerly director of church services for the British War Relief Society and for Bundles for Britain. He founded and directed the Interfaith Group for World Peace Under God, the purpose of which was to secure spiritual representatives as advisers in the organization and development of the United Nations. He also founded and is chairman of the National Religious Council composed of a hundred leaders of the Protestant, Catholic and Jewish faiths. But Mr. Bennett's heart is in the Medway Plan for Human Rehabilitation and World Peace.

THE MEDWAY PLAN INVITES YOUR COOPERATION

This, then, is the Medway plan, a simple, flexible, personalized, integrated program for constructive action. The plan cooperates wholeheartedly with other relief agencies, particularly with the National Medical and Surgical Relief Committee, with the Pestalozzi Foundation of America and with CARE. In turn it invites the cooperation of all men of good will, who want to help and do not know how. Here is a way by which every one, whatever his means, can have a part in building the brave, new world of the future. He can at least write a letter of friendly good will to someone. He can send a CARE package of food or clothing. He can become, perhaps, the Medway plan associate in his community and help organize it for the sponsoring of a town abroad.

St. Francis of Assisi prayed that God might give him strength to leave a bit of love in every place where he found hatred, to leave a little joy wherever he found sadness. That can be the privilege of all those who cooperate through the Medway plan, and a new rainbow will rise above the outmoded symbols of war, a rainbow of faith and hope and love.

Shall Military Men Speak on Military Security?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the suspension of Maj. Gen. Orvil A. Anderson as head of the Air War College is No. 4 in the rebukes which the national administration has given to men connected with the Defense Establishment who have dared voice their convictions on the subject of national security from a military standpoint.

No. 1, was the treatment accorded Admiral Denfeld.

No. 2, was the disavowal of the speech by Navy Secretary Matthews.

No. 3, was the directive to General MacArthur to withdraw his message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

No. 4, is the suspension of Major General Anderson, of the Air Force.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not question or debate the proposition that the President of the United States through the State Department or through his own statements, makes and announces our foreign policy.

To be sure I think the President should consult the appropriate committees of the Congress, because when the President speaks, the world is on notice.

But I do raise the question of the validity of decisions that affect and determine national security if we rule out and deny the right and duty of the top men in the Defense Establishment to speak when they speak—not in the realm of foreign policy—but in the realm of national security from the vantage point of their lifetime careers or special knowledge.

The distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], has stated that the President is the final spokesman on the subject of foreign policy. I readily agree with him, but I raise the question, however, as to whether national welfare is served by putting the silencer on every man high in the national Defense Establishment from voicing his convictions on the subject of national defense.

I understand that Admiral Denfeld is now a candidate for the governorship of Massachusetts. But will anyone say that Denfeld should have kept silent when he risked—when he deliberately sacrificed—his lifetime career in the Navy when he believed the security of this country at stake in his defense of the Navy?

Though I might disagree with Admiral Denfeld on some points, I would for my country's sake want him to speak fully and freely.

Does anyone think that General Groves should not have gone to the President, as he did, before Mr. Truman went to Potsdam to tell him that the atomic bomb was a proven success in order to warn him not to sell Manchuria to the Russians for an unnecessary participation in the closing days of the war against Japan? Of course, the very secrecy of the whole atomic project at that time prevented General Groves from even considering making his convictions public.

Was it not unfortunate that a Presidential decision ignored what General Groves suggested? Would not the whole far-eastern picture be different today had China never been sold out?

And was it not unfortunate that wartime battlefield discipline stopped Gen. George Patton from driving on to Berlin? Stopped him on the basis of a decision dictated by a State Department tender in its sympathies for the feelings of Moscow?

Ah, the picture of world peace would be different today if the forces of Red Russia were all east of Berlin instead of being west of the Elbe where Patton was required to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker, although were I in Mr. Truman's place, I would maintain the responsibility of the Presidency for the final decision, I would not close my mind nor the ears of the American people to the wisdom of a man like Gen. Douglas MacArthur when he spoke on the subject of essentials to security in the Pacific.

And were I MacArthur, fortified in my judgment by his years of experience as a military commander and an observer with high responsibilities in the Orient, I would not hesitate to speak my convictions though it cost me every star on my shoulder.

We are dealing, Mr. Speaker, with issues that go to the very survival of the United States and possibly of western civilization itself.

The latest disturbing thought in this sequence is that now the Air Force is to be silenced. The Air Force, top drawer in our strategic defense.

Major General Anderson, Mr. Speaker, is not a Johnny-come-lately in the field of aeronautics and aviation strategy. He was a pioneer in the Air Force. His courage and his comprehensive grasp of what was ahead were shown when he and the late General Kepner ventured to probe the stratosphere in a balloon November 11, 1935, going to the highest point ever ascended by man up to that time in order to get secrets of the upper atmosphere that were to prove invaluable in the roles he was later called upon to perform.

Anderson was the master planner in the operations of the famous Eighth Air Force over Germany. When he had successfully directed the strategic bombing which drove the Luftwaffe from the skies and destroyed the centers of German concentration and strategic production, he went on to Japan to plan the famous aerial conquest of their home islands. He is no novice in the field wherein he ventured to speak. Shall we lose the genius of Anderson at the Air College, as the price of getting his courageous and experienced convictions? Or, retain his ability at the Air College only by clamping the lid of secrecy on his opinions when national decisions are made by the Republic?

These, Mr. Speaker, are fundamental questions, and the American people are disturbed.

All these efforts to silence outstanding leaders do not quiet fears—they provoke and increase them. They are part of the pattern which denies congressional committees information from the records which Congress should have to make its decisions. They are part of the pattern of governments which do not trust the people to arrive at decisions. They are not consistent with the protestations of the administration, Mr. Speaker, in the confidence of the judgment of the great mass of the American people.

Dr. Townsend's Comments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I have recently received some written statements from Dr. F. E. Townsend that I think will be of interest to my colleagues and to all of the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Dr. Townsend is founder and president of the Townsend Plan, Inc. His comments, titled "Foreword" and "Necessity Is Driving Us to a Forced Circulation of Money" follow:

FOREWORD

I am convinced that now is the time for us to strike a blow for peace and freedom that will be more effective against communism than all the contraptions of warfare ever invented. This blow can be a psychological one. It need not cause the loss of a single human being nor a drop of blood, but it would make the whole world of men gasp with amazement at our confidence in ourselves and our ability to create wealth of all kinds and description.

As a nation of confident people we should announce to the world that we expect to expend whatever number of billions of dollars is needed to help put down any warlike uprising anywhere in conjunction with the efforts of other members of the United Nations, but that in addition to such expenditure we are wiping out poverty in America; that we have proved to ourselves that our ability to produce wealth has become so great that, if called upon to do so, we could supply half the world besides ourselves with food and clothing.

We should announce that we do not fear the effects of war upon our economy because our experience in the two great wars of recent years has taught us that, aside from the loss in human lives, we came out of those wars richer than we went in. Those wars taught us that money spent at home among our own people in payment for services rendered gave us an abundant market for everything we could produce. Money circulated freely through the hands of practically all our people enabled them to live on a scale never before known to any people since the dawn of history.

This new lesson impressed upon us by the holocaust of war has not been forgotten by us. We intend to use it in peacetime as well as in war. We intend to see that those who work and produce shall be assured at all times of a fair proportion of the wealth their work produces. We intend to see that those of us who are incapacitated for work by infirmities resulting from accidents, sickness, and old-age shall be supplied with enough money at all times to enable them to live well and to become useful customers for our business world since business produces all the wealth that is created.

By a legislative device which we are now about to put into use we shall establish a flow of money into the channels of trade and commerce that will constantly stimulate the production of goods and services. Poverty will be abolished entirely in our land of the free. So those countries which think that we can be exhausted by a series of petty wars which will make us vulnerable and flaccid had better heed the warning.

As a nation we have learned that our capacity to produce wealth depends entirely upon the capacity we display in distributing it. War is a great distributor, but we abhor war and we are determined to abolish it from the earth. All those who foster and encourage war are our enemies and the enemies of all mankind. We are determined that warmongers shall cease to exist.

Believing as we do that poverty of the masses is the great breeder of war because of the misery it produces, it is our purpose to wage war upon poverty with all our might. As an example to the rest of the world we intend to abolish poverty in America and we stand ready to assist all other nations that are like-minded.

NECESSITY IS DRIVING US TO A FORCED CIRCULATION OF MONEY

The modern ingenuity and inventiveness of the American people today inevitably divides the population into two major groups, the employed and the unemployables. The former group becomes smaller in proportion to the entire population as farm and factory become more and more highly mechanized. Every year sees more small farms merged into big ones and the work done on the big ones handled by one or two men using modern tools with ever-increasing speed and efficiency. The floating farm labor of former years, no longer finding employment on the farms, has drifted to the towns and cities seeking employment where job seekers are already in excess of jobs.

Every year sees more and more automatic machinery introduced into factories. The urge to mechanize is prompted by a double motive; first, it is known that goods can be turned out faster and with greater precision by machines than by hand methods, and second, because machines cut down the cost of payrolls. Machines do not have to be paid wages. They do not eat food nor wear clothing nor demand furniture for the house in which they are installed.

Thus it is seen that a constant reduction in the number of human hands is required in producing the wealth of things our human family demands. Our United States of America family is the most highly mechanized of all others in the world, and yet, the farther we go with mechanization the more the prospect widens for still greater use of automatic machines in producing our national wealth of things.

Workers are still in demand if their bodies are young and supple and the years have not taken too great a toll from them. But as they approach the age of 45, employers look askance at them when they apply for work. Beyond 45 it is almost impossible for the working class to sell skill or muscle. The army of unemployables grows and with increasing momentum.

With a working population confined to the young and vigorous the all-important question arises of what to do with the older population. There are millions of our people above the age of 45, millions of those above the age of 65. The average life span is growing longer, the work period shorter for everybody. How long can the productive, employed group afford to carry the cost of maintaining all the old, the sick, the crippled and the blind, plus all the millions of children—all nonproducers? What will happen to the market when there are three or four times as many nonproducers, as there are producers? Can we sell goods and services to people who cannot work and earn?

What holds the price of goods so high today? Is it scarcity? No. Food stuff and clothing material were never so abundant. Note the immense storage of wheat, corn, potatoes, milk, butter, and eggs. Food in millions of pounds that cannot be sold. Raw apparel material is equally abundant and oversupplied. Wool and cotton glut our warehouses. And all this superabundance going a-begging for want of a market.

Our economists and law makers seek blindly and stupidly abroad for a market for our surpluses. They will find none. The great mass of foreign people have nothing with which to buy from us. We cannot use their money if they had it, but they are penniless, like our own unemployables. We will not buy from them the things of which we have a surplus. Why should we? We can produce better goods and faster than any other nation, and with less actual cost.

There is no market abroad upon which we can depend for our abundance and there never will be. Our market is right here at home, under our very noses—the greatest potential market in the world, if we had the good sense to use it. Why do we not use this market? Because the great army of unemployables have no money with which to buy.

Shall we deny ourselves this magnificent market because of lack of money in the hands of those who are most desirous to buy? If we lacked any other means of getting goods to the people, such as trucks, railroads, ships, or airplanes, would we not hasten to supply these means? Then why in the name of common sense do we not supply these needy, destitute home folks with money? Is money such a sacred thing that we will see millions of our brothers and sisters suffer rather than let them use it?

Obviously, money must be made to circulate freely amongst all our people if our productive capacity is to be maintained and increased. We can no more sell goods to our home folks who have no money than we can to foreigners. We must devise a way to give our home people the use of money with which to supply themselves liberally with our home-made goods or see our surpluses grow in volume until they choke the market to death.

Let us do for our market what we do for our good roads. We make people pay for the use of our roads by a tax on gasoline. Let us also make everyone pay a small tax for the use they make of the market. The use of this great home market of ours is a privilege that all of us should be glad to pay for. A small tax of as little as 3 percent, if collected by the Federal Government every month (just as the social-security tax is collected) on all sales made with intent to profit, would supply enough money that if divided equally and distributed to all the incapacitated adults of our citizenry with injunction to buy with all that is given them, would furnish the market we need. This forced circulation of money would cost the Nation nothing. It would stimulate production in all lines of industry immediately, for the needs of our moneyless people are as varied as the things we produce.

To produce the added goods needed to supply this new market thousands of additional workers would have to be called back to work, thus reducing the oversupply of jobless that curses us today. No money would be lost. All that was used would immediately flow back into the channels of trade. Poverty, the sickness that afflicts all the world, could be wiped out in this country of ours and an example set for all the other nations to follow. We know that we have the means of abolishing poverty. Let us do it before we find ourselves engulfed in the misery which has cursed the world throughout all history. Wages and salaries upon which our economy has depended to keep the wheels of industry turning, are not sufficient today to maintain the market. They must be supplemented by a much wider distribution of money. This we can have through the establishment of a Federal, mutual insurance for all citizens, paid monthly to all citizens who are found to be physically incapacitated for earning a living, and requiring that all recipients of the insurance money be obliged to spend monthly all that they receive in order to become eligible for the next month's payment. This kind of insurance would insure universal prosperity and rapidly reduce ignorance, crime, and disease.

American Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by Hon. JAMES I. DOLLIVER, of Iowa, United States House Representative, before the Teachers' Federation, Fort Dodge, Iowa, September 5, 1950:

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

(By JAMES I. DOLLIVER)

The foreign policy of the United States has journeyed a long and tortuous road since that day more than a century and a half ago when President Washington, bidding farewell to his countrymen, admonished them to have as little political connection as possible with foreign nations. No American would be human if he did not look with some longing upon that vanished day of horse-drawn coaches and powdered periwigs when the detached and distant position of the United States permitted us to have a comfortable neutrality.

However, the rapid growth of the United States itself, the speedy progress of technological civilization, and the increasing vicissitudes and complications of international affairs as the decades passed by, gradually drew our country ever more deeply into world affairs. And now, at last, in our own day, our once isolationist country has been thrust into the role of leader of the entire free world.

This evolution in 150 years of American foreign policy from one extreme to the other may be traced historically under four main headings: (1) the pan-American policy in the Western Hemisphere; (2) the open-door policy in the Far East; (3) American policy in regard to Great Britain and Europe, and (4) finally the new policy of United States leadership dating from World War II. I shall briefly expand upon each of these topics in an endeavor to paint some of the background of the present position of the United States at the midpoint of the twentieth century.

I. PAN-AMERICAN POLICY

The historic message of President James Monroe to the American Congress which in subsequent decades came to be known as the Monroe Doctrine was delivered on December 2, 1823. It foreshadowed that form of inter-American solidarity we refer to as Pan Americanism, and was intended to accomplish several results.

It may be recalled, first of all, that the Spanish and Portuguese colonies to the south of the United States had taken advantage of the Napoleonic wars to sever their allegiance to their mother country in Europe. Following the downfall of Bonaparte the victorious European powers, under the guidance of the Holy Alliance initiated a policy of stern repression of liberal revolution on the European continent. The United States feared that this reactionary policy might be extended to the Americas. It was for this reason that President Monroe gravely warned the Europeans that any attempt to interpose control over the destiny of the new republic would be viewed as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

Secondly, President Monroe stressed the ideological angle. The political system of the European monarchies, he asserted, was essentially different from that of America and any attempt to extend the European system to the Western Hemisphere would be regarded by the United States as dangerous to its peace and safety.

Finally, Monroe's statement was directed against the territorial encroachments of the Czar of Russia upon the west coast of North America. (Even in those days there was a Russian menace.) The American Continent, Monroe asserted, was henceforth not to be considered as subject for further colonization by any European power.

It might be added parenthetically that the purchase of Alaska from Russia in 1867 was in direct line with the Monroe Doctrine and western hemispheric solidarity.

On the basis of this triple warning by President Monroe, which was designed to protect the integrity of the American continents, the imposing structure of pan-Americanism and hemispheric good neighborliness has since been built.

The system of pan-American cooperation has culminated in our own day in two historic agreements: The Treaty of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, signed September 2, 1947, which was framed to maintain continental peace and security; and the Organization of American States, the charter of which was signed by 21 American nations at Bogotá, Colombia, in April 1948. This latter treaty, the capstone of the American continental system, provides for close cooperation of the American states on a permanently organized basis to maintain peace and to provide jointly for economic, social and cultural development.

II. THE OPEN DOOR POLICY IN THE ORIENT

Whereas the policy of the United States in regard to Europe was primarily one of isolation—at least until the First World War—American policy in the Far East was of a different character. The United States made important commercial and cultural contacts in both China and Japan in the course of the nineteenth century. Our sailing ships rounded the Horn for the China trade countless times. The acquisition of the Philippine Islands in 1898 during the McKinley administration, as a byproduct of the Spanish-American War, really fired American interest in the Far East. This interest was rooted in a legitimate desire for free and peaceful trade in that area, particularly with China's millions.

Unfortunately, that vast and sprawling oriental country was in grave danger of being dismembered by the great powers at the turn of the century. If this had occurred, then American prospects of unimpeded trade would have rapidly dwindled.

Faced by this possibility Secretary of State John Hay sent circular notes to the great powers in September 1899, and in July 1900. He stated in those notes the now historic doctrine of the "open door." Briefly defined, this policy sought the preservation of China's territorial and administrative integrity and the safeguarding for the world of the principle of equal and impartial trade with all parts of the Chinese Empire.

To these principles the great powers expressed more or less firm adherence. But in actual practice they were honored by some countries more in the breach than in the observance. This was especially true of that freshly emerged power in the east—Japan. Both the Sino-Japanese War of 1895 and the Russo-Japanese War of 1904–05 resulted in the acquisition by Nippon of important territories and privileges in China. During the First World War it appeared that Tokyo was bent upon a determined campaign to reduce China practically to a state of vassalage.

The notorious 21 demands which Japan presented to China in January 1915 created great indignation in the United States. We straightway proceeded to reaffirm the principle of the open door. In the Lansing-Ishii notes of November 1917 Japan again acknowledged the open door, and the principle was formally written into the Nine Power Treaty negotiated at the Washington conference of 1922.

It was in the spirit of the open door that Secretary of State Henry L. Stimson enunciated in January 1932 his famous doctrine of nonrecognition in regard to the Japanese conquests in Manchuria. It was likewise in the same spirit that the United States endeavored to sustain China's independence and integrity against Japanese aggression before and during World War II.

That independence has now been submerged in the Red tide emanating from Moscow. Nevertheless, the tenets of the open door, even though their application may remain temporarily in abeyance, still ought to remain the basic policy of the United States in the Far East.

One final remark before concluding our consideration of the Far East. It was under the influence of a sentiment closely allied to the open-door policy that the United States granted independence to the Philippines in 1946. This action left a favorable impression upon millions of Asiatics struggling to be freed of foreign domination. It cannot be without favorable effect in the present grim struggle for the minds of men in the Orient.

III. EUROPEAN POLICY

America's policy with respect to Europe, as already has been mentioned, was for many decades one of isolation. America's chief contact in that area of the world was, as might be expected, with Great Britain. England was our mother country, and from her we inherited many of our cherished ideas and institutions. For example, in every State but one of our Union, the English common law is the basis of the legal system. True, there were altercations with Great Britain—the War of 1812 and disputes during the American Civil War over the outfitting of Confederate cruisers in British ports. But the famous settlement of the Alabama claims in 1872 inaugurated an era of pacific relations and growing understanding between Great Britain and the United States, which was only briefly marred by the Venezuela boundary dispute.

By 1900 popular sympathy between the two nations was quite marked, and English-speaking peoples began to attach new significance to the phrase, "blood is thicker than water." During all this period there were no major upsets in the balance of power in Europe and we in the United States could comfortably sit secure behind the bastion of the British Isles and the "wooden walls"—later, steel bulkheads—of the British fleet, knowing that there were no vital threats to its existence.

By the time the World War broke out in 1914 there was already a tradition of friendly cooperation between Britain and the United States. This tradition was strained by British violations of American neutral rights on the seas. But these were not serious enough to outweigh the ties of race, and other links, and the sense of outrage at German depredations on American commerce.

To protect its neutral rights against Germany the United States went to war—a war that was soon to take the shape, under the influence of President Wilson, of a crusade to make the world safe for democracy. The effect of Wilson's Fourteen Points upon European and world opinion signified a new role for the United States—a role of international leadership that renounced isolationism and which made its decisions independently. The peace, Wilson proclaimed, was to be consolidated in a League of Nations.

We know the sequel. In the emotional backlash of the termination of the war the American public reverted to its please-leave-me-alone attitude. And Washington was once more willing for Great Britain—and France—to occupy the center of the international stage.

But America's attempt to play the recluse was, after a few years, thwarted by three villains, whose names I won't have to mention, who marched dictatorially upon the international stage and threw the show into turmoil.

From the beginning of World War II American public opinion was overwhelmingly favorable to the cause of Britain and the western allies. After Pearl Harbor there was little question but that the United States, because of its tremendous economic power, would occupy the chief place among the allies and would take a decisive part in molding the peace to come. A new world leader had come to maturity, and had come to stay.

The new era upon which the world embarked with the defeat of the Axis and the end of World War II has not turned out to be the blessed epoch of which so many people dreamed in the victorious flush of 1945. Indeed, despite the downfall of Hitler and his cohorts there has been no peace. A new aggressor, with headquarters in the Kremlin, began to extend his mailed fist even before the last shot against Hitler and Tojo had been fired. Since the end of the war the mushrooming proportions of Communist expansionism and aggression have cast a pall of dread over the entire free world.

This Communist drive for world conquest is the most significant phenomenon of the postwar international political situation. It has caused the world to be deeply driven into jarring segments in place of the brave, one world of the United Nations which had been so hopefully planned by the Allies during the war. It is these two vital factors of the world power picture, the expansion of the U. S. S. R. and the United Nations, that I now wish to examine in greater detail.

In the first place Russian world aggression expansion is nothing new. As far back as the eighteenth century under the reigns of Peter the Great and Catherine the Great the Muscovite realm commenced a march west, south, and east which eventually placed its boundaries beyond Warsaw, on the Black, Baltic, and Caspian Seas, and as far east as the shores of the Pacific Ocean. Peoples of many nationalities were absorbed into Russia by this policy of imperialistic expansion. The Czar's passion for reaching warm water sent him into a long series of wars with the Turks in the Balkans and around the shores of the Black Sea.

Russian expansionist pressure on the "Sick Man" of Europe became so great that Great Britain and France in the middle of the nineteenth century felt compelled to spring to Turkey's aid. Thus was fought the famous Crimean War of 1854 56. Later in the century Russian imperialism collided with Japanese imperialism in the Far East, culminating in the Russo-Japanese War of 1904–05. I mention all this in order to emphasize that this problem of containing Russian aggression or expansion is by no means peculiar to our own time. It is a political question which has weighed upon the chanceries of the Western Powers for a long period.

But the question assumed particular acuteness with the accession to power of the Bolsheviks in 1917. These newcomers in the Russian Government brandished in the face of the shocked world an ideology which called for no less than global domination by the Moscow-guided dictatorship of the proletariat.

The objective of global domination appeared clearly in the pronouncements of the Comintern and the Cominform. In the period between the two World Wars respite the fact that Russia was well occupied with a variety of 5-year plans, and other internal building, the Soviet leaders and the Politburo by no means abandoned their goal of world conquest. It was ever in the forefront of the thinking of the highest bosses of communism.

The tremendous political and economic upheavals generated by World War II presented the Kremlin with its long-awaited opportunities. Beginning in 1939 the innocent victims began to disappear down the maw of the Russian bear. The catalog of conquest is a frightening one. By 1940 Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, Bessarabia, and northern Bukovina had been annexed to the U. S. S. R. By the end of World War II parts of Finland, Poland, Czechoslovakia and East Prussia had been added to the Soviet Union. The Kurile Islands and southern Sakhalin Island had also been appropriated.

In the postwar years Communists achieved or consolidated their control over Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, Albania, Bulgaria, east Germany, and North Korea. Finally, the fattest prize of all—China, with its 450,000,000 people, fell into the Soviet lap.

The extent of Communist aggrandizement can be surveyed at a glance by a comparison of population figures. In 1945 the Soviet Union had a population of about 190,000,000 inhabitants; by 1950 more than 830,000,000 subjects were under Communist control—approximately 35 to 40 percent of the world's population. Truly, this is a record of expansion which any conqueror of history might well envy.

The saddest chapter in the whole story, however, is the fact that the United States and Great Britain, either through lack of foresight, or, as some people think, by sinister design, aided the Soviet Union to carry out its aggressive program. This is the only conclusion that can be drawn from the fiascos of Yalta and Potsdam. As a result of agreements reached at these conferences Europe and the Far East were in effect divided into spheres of influence. Situations were created which enabled Moscow, through faithlessness and treachery, to extend enormously its domination.

At these conferences it was confirmed that Poland, our ally, should surrender a large portion of its territory to the Soviet Union. The agreement on the liberated countries of eastern Europe may have appeared fair on its face. But in considering the facts of political reality it enabled the Soviet Union to install in them through perfidy puppet governments kow-towing to the Kremlin. It was further agreed that the Soviet Union should occupy eastern Germany, thus paving the way for the Communist-dominated government which is now arming itself perhaps for a Korea-type aggression. It was confirmed that the western powers should share in the occupation of Berlin, but by incredible lack of foresight no provision was made for the western nations to have guaranteed access to that city. We paid for that blunder in the Berlin blockade, which, incidentally, can be reimposed at any time. It is interesting to speculate that this Berlin blockade may be a diversion to take our attention off the other actions of the Soviet elsewhere in the world.

But perhaps the most disastrous concessions were those secret clauses on the Far East. Stalin was given the Kurile Islands, which extend north of Japan and approach our Alaskan outpost; southern Sakhalin; and outer Mongolia. Even worse, the Red tyrant was in effect given in Manchuria authorization to take control of the railroads across it, which gave access to the warm-water ports of Dairen and Port Arthur. Those concessions were made despite the fact that 14 months earlier, at Cairo, when Gen. Chiang Kai-shek was present, China was told at Cairo by Great Britain and America, and at Potsdam by Russia, that Manchuria would be returned to them when Japan was defeated. It is hard to believe, but now, in the light of history, it seems apparent that our Chinese ally was betrayed at Yalta in 1945 when no representative of the Chinese Government was present.

As a matter of fact, our whole contemporary China policy has been one of gross failure. It is a horrid story of appeasement and refusal to formulate firm objectives for the purpose of preserving China from Red thralldom. The administration's China policy is summed up in that weak, helpless, futile phrase of Secretary Acheson, "waiting for the dust to settle." While we waited, the Reds took over.

As the end of World War II approached the State Department insisted that the Communists join the Nationalists in a coalition government. This attitude persisted after VJ-day. At the end of 1945 President Truman dispatched Gen. George C. Marshall to China to carry out a policy of unification and integration of the Kuomintang and the Communist factions. President Truman authorized Marshall to inform Chiang Kai-shek and other Chinese leaders that "a China disunited and torn by civil strife could not be considered realistically as a proper place for American assistance. * * *" In other words what it amounted to was that if the Communists did not choose to cooperate with the Nationalists the United States would withdraw aid from the latter. Thus the United States, whether intentionally or not, played the Communist game. Our policy put it in the hands of the Communists to control the situation and to call the turn so far as American aid was concerned. And, as a matter of fact, the United States, after it became clear that an understanding between Chiang Kai-shek and Mao Tse-tung could not easily be obtained, did clamp an embargo on military shipments to China in August 1946. Although this embargo was lifted in May 1947, peace between the Kuomintang and the Communists still remained a cornerstone of the administration's policy with the said result we all know. After the disasters of 1948 demonstrated that a coalition government was out of the question and that there was a strong likelihood of a Communist victory, the administration abandoned the Nationalists to their fate.

The administration compounded error upon error; first by considering the Chinese Communists as innocent "agrarian reformers", second, by attempting to amalgamate the Reds into the Nationalist Government; and third, when that failed by finally abandoning the Nationalists.

It is easy to criticize and often difficult to be constructive. But accepting the China situation as it is at the present time, it seems to me that a sound policy for the United States is one based on a historical foundation. We have already seen that the aim of the United States in the Far East has been to safeguard China's independence and integrity.

China now is neither independent, for Mao Tse-tung is dominated by Moscow. Nor in full possession of its sovereign territory, for the Soviet Union has moved in upon the Chinese province of Manchuria. It is to be hoped that these alien encroachments upon China will eventually provoke feelings of deep resentment among the Chinese people.

In the meantime, the United States should make it easy for the Chinese people—as distinct from their rulers—to be friendly toward the United States and difficult for them to be friendly to Moscow. This is sound strategy, for it is thus that the Communist world may possibly be divided and China detached from the Red standard. I honestly believe there is a vast reservoir of good will for America in China. We need the intelligence and the energy to tap and utilize that reservoir.

In speaking of the phenomenon of Russian aggression I have digressed somewhat to treat the problem of America's China policy. Later on I expect to delineate further my views on other facets of American foreign policy. Right now, however, I would like to say something in regard to the principle of collective security, particularly as it has been expressed in the organization of the United Nations.

IV. LEADERSHIP OF THE UNITED STATES

A world organization for collective security is not something new. The League of Nations, we all remember, was established after the First World War in an attempt to forestall outbreaks of fresh wars. That the United States did not go to Geneve has been cited by some people as a major cause of the League's failure. As a practical matter it is idle now to debate the pros and cons of whether the United States should or should not have joined the League. As far as present problems go that is all ancient history. The important fact is that the United States has now become a full-fledged member of the United Nations and is in the forefront of world cooperative efforts to maintain a just peace.

The United Nations was born as a result of joint international effort. At Moscow in October 1943 the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union, and China issued a declaration recognizing the necessity of creating an international organization for the maintenance of international peace and security. From August to October of 1944 these four nations met at Dumbarton Oaks in Washington, D. C., and drew up preliminary draft proposals for such an organization.

Finally, in April, May, and June of 1945, 50 nations convened in San Francisco and there on the basis of the Dumbarton draft, drew up the Charter of the United Nations. On August 8 of the same year the United States ratified the Charter after the Senate had voted overwhelming approval. On October 24 the Charter came into force after the twenty-ninth nation had deposited its ratification. Today, approximately 5 years later, 59 nations have adhered to the United Nations Charter.

Looking back on a half decade's operation of the United Nations the impartial observer would note both successes and frustrations. The latter for the most part have been caused by that most controversial of all the features of the United Nations—the rule of unanimity or veto. When the UN was established there was no surrender of essential sovereign power to the organization. In other words the UN was an organization of sovereign states, and not a world government. Such being the case, it was thought that there would have to be agreement among those major countries of the world, which in actuality possessed the preponderance of real political and military power in the world, or else the UN would automatically fall apart. Thus, each of the big five nations was recognized as having the right of preventing such concerted action as it did not favor. Such an arrangement obviously assumed good faith and a certain amount of coincidence of outlook among those five nations possessing the veto or else there would be frustration in the UN Security Council.

As we all know the Soviet Union has grossly abused its right of veto in the Security Council in an effort to sidetrack the legitimate functions of that organ. Thus far the U. S. S. R. has cast the large number of 43 vetoes. It is impossible here to describe each one of these vetoes in detail. Suffice it to say that these blocking tactics by the U. S. S. R. led many observers to believe that the Security Council could not be an effective instrument for enforcing the peace in case of an aggression by the Soviet Union itself or by one of its satellites.

Yet, when the first real crisis of this sort arose, the UN Security Council surprised many by the promptness and efficiency with which, due to the absence of the Soviet Union, it met the emergency. I am, of course, referring to the aggression of the North Korean Red puppet government against the United Nations—recognized South Korean Republic. For some inexplicable reason the Soviet Union apparently failed to foresee the consequences of its action when it deserted the Security Council chamber in January of this year. For it was not on hand to veto those resolutions providing for United Nations police action against North Korean forces.

I will not impose on you the sad details of the Korean crisis; you are getting them from your daily newspaper and radio. But I will mention some of the lessons I think it has demonstrated. Perhaps the most important is that it reveals convincingly and in a manner most people can understand the real intentions of the Soviet Union.

World conquest is the Kremlin's goal and Stalin will not hesitate to use armed force to attain this goal if he thinks he can get away with it. Also, it has demonstrated the inefficacy of the defensive arrangements thus far made by the United States and the other free nations. We might thank Heaven that the Soviet Union has thus tipped off its hand and given us warning of what to expect. Having thus been warned we can proceed on a more rational and realistic basis to make our preparations.

In preparing for the future both the Administration and the leaders of both parties should redouble their efforts to see that the policy of the United States is formulated on a national basis. By that I mean that the President and the State Department should take the minority into full confidence when formulating policy and not solicit their bipartisan support only after decisions have been reached and it is very difficult to amend them.

Utilizing this national procedure the United States should continue and even intensify its policy of firmness toward the Soviet Union. In this regard I would like strongly to emphasize one point. It seems to me that up to the present we have been missing out on the moral front.

Communism is a hateful doctrine, destroying individual liberty, destroying private ownership, freedom of speech and of the press, and destroying religion. Communism is the declared enemy of Christianity. It is the utter antithesis of western civilization. If it prevails it will destroy those values that we prize most highly. I repeat again that Communist strategy is to overthrow our Government by force and violence.

But thanks to God, we who believe that there is a difference between right and wrong and that this is a moral universe in which we live, have faith that such a system as Russian communism contains the seeds of its own destruction—that ultimately righteousness and human freedom will triumph.

The struggle in the world today is thus a moral and ideological conflict.

We need to regain the political initiative in this world struggle. By the ineptness of our leadership we have been put into a position where the Communists have the initiative militarily, and they have seized the initiative politically by their recent action in the Council of the United Nations.

We need to make it clear to the world that basically Marxism is an assault upon morality. The doctrine of "any means to an end" is the core of the whole movement. Entire peoples are subjugated by force, infiltration and deception; churches are ruthlessly destroyed and the clergy disposed of; treaties are found worthless, agreements are made for tactical reasons only and cynically broken. Standards of conduct are corrupted on all fronts.

The governments and statesmen of the free half of the world must sooner or later come to the realization that only by a revival of high moral and spiritual standards can the battle be won. Until they ally themselves completely with the tremendous moral force of Christianity, until they themselves cease sampling the drugs of materialism, until they more closely adhere to the basic commandments of God, then no number of United Nations and Atlantic Pacts can gain a lasting victory.

In such a conflict the Communists are in a bad position because of their extremely black record on adherence to their pledged word. The catalog of the treaties, agreements, and promises shattered unscrupulously by the Soviet Union is of huge proportions. And it is at this weak plate in their armor that we should strike and strike hard—in the open forum of the United Nations along the earth-girdling airways of radio, in other phases of information, and in every way that we can.

To take one pertinent example, Korea. In 1945 the U. S. S. R. subscribed to an international declaration that in due course Korea should be free and independent. But almost immediately the Soviet Union began to welsh on this pledge. The United States and the Soviet Union decided that the surrender of Japanese troops in Korea should be accepted by the Red Army north of the thirty-eighth parallel and that the United States forces should accept it south of that line. But the U. S. S. R. soon made it clear that it considered this arrangement as dividing the country into military occupation zones.

This was the start of the treachery that finally led to puppet aggression. In December 1945 the United States and the Soviet Union formally agreed that a trusteeship should be established over Korea and that a provisional government for the whole country should be formed. But through 1946 and into 1947 the U. S. S. R. obstructed, in a manner now all too familiar, every effort of a joint United States-U. S. S. R. commission to implement this agreement. Thus another Russian pledge was broken.

In the fall of 1947 the United Nations General Assembly took up consideration of the Korean question and eventually decided that the Korean people should create their own provisional government through United Nations-observed elections. But the UN Temporary Commission which arrived in Korea early in 1948 was denied access to the Soviet-occupied north. The U. S. S. R., in other words, refused to cooperate with the United Nations

In the American-occupied south elections under the observation of the UN Commission were held in May 1948 and a republican government was established. Subsequently the UN General Assembly approved the establishment of this government.

Finally, in June of this year the U. S S. R. displayed its complete contempt for the United Nations by sending its puppet troops into aggressive action against the very state which the international organization had sponsored.

It is faithlessness like this, examples of which could be multiplied all over the globe, that the United States should trumpet far and wide in order to demonstrate to peoples everywhere the sort of menace which is threatening human freedom. This is potentially one of the most effective weapons against international communism that the United States can muster and we should support vigorously all action along this line.

The United Nations despite its weaknesses is still a potent instrument for peace and the United States should give unstinting support to its principles. However, we should not permit slavish devotion to its formal organisms to prevent us from using the provisions of the United Nations Charter in those instances where the United Nations is prevented from functioning as it should.

To become more specific I would like to point out that articles 51 and 52 of the Charter permit groups of UN members to band together for their own defense. Under this authority the United States and other like-minded countries have already entered into such associations as the Rio Pact and the North Atlantic Alliance for the purpose of improving their collective defenses against possible aggression. However, the danger we face is formidable and it is quite possible that the Rio and Atlantic Treaties may prove to be inadequate.

In such a contingency it may be necessary to constitute, under the terms of the Charter, a broad "western block." Something of what I mean was suggested by Mr. Herbert Hoover in April of this year. He recommended a "new united front," organized by those peoples "who disavow communism, who stand for morals and religion, and who love freedom" He pointed out that such a union would "have many potent moral, spiritual, and even economic weapons at their disposal" It is by such bold strokes that we may have to act if present measures to check the Communist wave do not prove effective.

In conclusion, I would like to mention very briefly a couple of the other responsibilities which the United States have assumed in the postwar world. These lie in the economic field. After the war most of the countries of western Europe were prostrate economically and were rapidly running out of the foreign exchange with which they could purchase needed materials from the dollar area. In a word, western Europe was just about broke and the Communists were capitalizing on this wretched situation in order to spread their hypocritical ideology. There was grave danger that discouraged people, mislead by the false but glowing promises of the Communists, would turn to totalitarianism for their salvation.

If western Europe had made such a choice, the consequences for the security of the United States would have been serious. Therefore, the administration decided, with the concurrence of both major parties, to extend large-scale economic and financial aid to western Europe in order to create those conditions in which democracy could again flourish without handicap. Thus far, the European recovery program has been a substantial success and, on its record, it should be continued on a diminishing scale, proportionate to the genuine needs of the recipient countries.

In many other parts of the world—Africa, Latin America, Asia—there are numerous countries and peoples whose economic backwardness is astonishing in this advanced atomic age. Such areas are ripe targets for Communist propaganda which lyingly promises all things to all men. There has been some anxiety that unless these areas were given some prospect of advancing toward a higher standard of living, they too might hearken to the siren call of the Kremlin. The so-called point 4 program was recently inaugurated to cope with this situation. This program provides for limited schedules of technical assistance to undeveloped areas and for improvement of their economic structure through the medium of private investment. The program does not contemplate large loans and grants of money such as are extended under the European recovery program. For this reason it does not constitute a heavy financial burden, but its potential results are expected to be very fruitful.

In all these various programs of foreign aid the United States has undertaken an unaccustomed responsibility. It is a responsibility which weighs heavily upon the American taxpayer's pocketbook and we certainly would not assume it without grave reason.

But as I have attempted to show in the foregoing, there are momentous and solemn causes for the course the United States is traveling. The threat of international communism is undeniably great. The United States, through historical developments which I have tried to outline, has succeeded to the leadership of the free world. Our country is the only single nation with sufficient power to thwart the Kremlin's ambition. If we are worthy of the traditions evolved by our forefathers and remain true to the role for which destiny has shaped us, we shall exercise that power generously and well.

I bring you no message of bleak despair and hopelessness. Rather I have tried to present the great challenge of the day in which we live. Our free Republic—our representative self-government has the patriotic devotion of 150,000,000 Americans. We have abundant resources—industrial, financial, and agricultural. We have a design for living that has given our people standards of health, happiness, and prosperity never dreamed of a century ago; the dream of the millions across the seas in every land.

Do not imagine for a moment that our people will lightly relinquish our freedoms and our political institutions. Rather we will continue to improve them to achieve, under God, the kind of society which will by its very attractiveness, beckon to all men everywhere.

Importations From Russia and Its Satellites Are Displacing Our Workers and Providing American Dollars for Communist Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a communication from our colleague, Hon. ROBERT T. SECREST, representing the Fifteenth Congressional District of Ohio, calling my attention to discharge petition No. 34. This petition relates to a most important matter and is entitled to have the support of the membership of the House. I include as part of my remarks the letter of Congressman SECREST to which I have referred. It reads as follows:

AUGUST 28, 1950.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: For the past 2 years the United States has been buying an average of $2,000,000 worth of furs each month from Russia. Last year more than 12,000,000 pieces of glassware were imported, and Czechoslovakia heads the list of those nations sending glass to the United States. Also from Czechoslovakia come shoes and many other items.

The results of imports from Communist-controlled countries are twofold. First, it creates unemployment in the United States. Second, it gives Russia dollars for propaganda purposes and for the purchase, outside of the United States, of vital war materials.

In my opinion, we should not buy anything from Communist-controlled countries that is not absolutely essential to our own security.

On May 15, Congressman RAMSEY introduced a resolution stating that it is the sense of Congress that the President take steps to cancel reciprocal trade agreements with any country found by the State Department to be Communist controlled. I believe this is logical. Certainly the American people do not want to give dollars to Russia when these same dollars are being used to buy war materials with which to kill our boys in Korea.

I have placed discharge petition No. 34 on the Speaker's desk and I hope you will urge every Member of Congress to sign it.

Sincerely yours,

BOB SECRET.

Equalize the Tax Burden

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I am getting a little weary listening to the pious protestations of the cooperatives and the co-op coddlers who profess it is a mortal sin to suggest that these tax dodgers should pay their Government a little tribute for the privilege of doing business in this country, and who mournfully mouth dire warnings of what will happen if they are required to kick in with their share of taxes like other businesses do.

I refer specifically to an article inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, page A5849, by my colleague EUGENE J. MCCARTHY, of Minnesota. Mr. MCCARTHY suggests that the tax exemption given to farmer co-ops is not enough and says that all efforts to tax their business activities is motivated by self-seeking interests whose objective is to destroy the cooperatives.

I have led the fight in Congress to tax cooperatives, and I have no self-seeking interests. But, Mr. MCCARTHY is right when he says the farmers do not get enough from their co-ops. Karl Loos, co-op attorney, recently told the Senate Finance Committee that 91.4 percent of them get less than $10 a year in patronage dividends, and that a mere 8.6 percent of co-op members get 76 percent of the profits.

Nor does the Government get enough from the co-ops. After Attorney Loos loudly proclaimed that the Government would realize a mere $6,000,000 by taxing the earnings of all cooperatives, it must have been embarrassing to him to pick up his newspaper the other morning and read where one cooperative, the Union Equity Cooperative Grain Exchange, of Enid, Okla., was voluntarily offering to pay a tax of nearly $1,000,000 on its business this year. There are tens of thousands of cooperatives in this country—many of them bigger than Union Equity—but here was one of them acknowledging that it had enough profits to toss Uncle Sam a "million-dollar bone." Conscience money, that is what it was.

Mr. Speaker, conservative estimates of the amount of money the Government would realize from taxation of cooperatives totals $350,000,000. Despite all the breast beating and pious proclamations of the tax dodgers that is a terrific amount of money to be obtained through levying the same tax on them as on other corporations. And it will not break the co-ops any more than it breaks businessmen who pay their taxes.

I have a bill, H. R. 5064, that would equalize the tax burden in this country among all those who do business in the market place, and I cannot understand why, when the Government needs every dollar of revenue it can get, something is not done about this bill. As I have said time and again, it is utterly unfair to consider heaping a still greater tax burden on one segment of American business and let another considerable part of it go tax-free. It has been estimated that one-third of the total wealth of America is now owned by tax-free organizations, and they are growing at breakneck speed. Yet the Senate now has the temerity to announce calmly that nothing will be done about taxing the cooperatives—at least not before the November elections—except to make a further study of the case and hold more public hearings.

Mr. Speaker, extensive hearings have already been held on this subject. An overwhelming amount of testimony has been presented to show conclusively the need for taxing the tax exempts. There is no need for further hearings. The Congress has shown utterly indefensible inconsistency by voting to tax certain incomes of charitable and educational institutions and at the same time refusing to touch the sacrosanct co-ops. It is high time we laid this bugaboo to rest.

We are rapidly entering another war economy with all its burdensome restrictions and limitations on profits. Is there any justification in permitting anyone, cooperatives, or whatever other pseudonym you choose to call them, to operate almost completely tax-free? Do you think it fair, Mr. Speaker, that anyone should be permitted to enjoy a tax-free profit in time of war?

National Science Foundation Is Too Important To Be Pushed Aside by Dilatory Tactics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the National Science Foundation bill is too important to be stymied by failure to make an immediate and sufficient appropriation to carry its provisions into effect. The Congress by an overwhelming vote approved the measure on May 10, after several years of study and consideration. It has received the approval of the President. Up to the present time neither the Director nor the Board to direct its affairs, has been appointed, nor, has any appropriation been made. As one of the sponsors of the legislation I am deeply concerned over the lethargy that is being displayed.

An editorial appearing in the Courier-Post, newspaper of Camden, N. J., issue of August 31, 1950, has clearly, concisely and forcibly set forth not only the importance of the National Science Foundation but the extreme necessity of putting it into effect without further delay. The editorial to which I refer reads as follows:

COMMITTEE WOULD NULLIFY SCIENCE FOUNDATION LAW

The House Appropriations Committee is attempting to override the expressed wishes of the majority of Congress, President Truman, and our military leaders by a pigeonhole veto of the National Science Foundation law.

This law was approved May 10, after 5 years of legislative consideration, to establish an agency which would centralize and strengthen our scientific research efforts in both military and nonmilitary fields.

During this time hundreds of witnesses from the executive departments, scientific organizations, and institutions testified that a National Science Foundation was needed to fill a missing link in our security chain. They agreed that such an agency was necessary to coordinate and stimulate basic scientific research in this country, which they testified is falling behind that of other nations.

The law was nonpolitical in nature and received bipartisan support. One of its strongest advocates was Congressman WOLVERTON, who was sponsor of a similar measure in the Eightieth Congress that was vetoed by President Truman because of administrative features he disliked, which were revised in the 1950 bill.

As passed by Congress and signed by the President, the law provides for appointment of 24 citizens as members of the National Science Board, which will guide the Foundation's policies.

President Truman, according to a letter sent Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR, chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, by presidential assistant John R. Steelman, "has been preparing to nominate in the very near future 24 outstanding citizens drawn from the field of science, engineering, agriculture, industry, and public affairs to this board.

The President feels, says the letter, that "to fail to activate this very important agency, at this critical juncture as we speed the strengthening of other segments of our defenses, would be to pass over a unique opportunity to improve and strengthen our scientific research efforts which, as you well know, are of vital importance to the preesrvation of our security."

But the House Appropriations Committee is blocking activation of the Foundation by withholding an appropriation of $475,000, because, it says, it "believes that new programs which will not provide early aid to our defense effort should not be initiated at this time."

In other words, to save a tiny drop in the bucket of defense spending, this committee would set up its judgment as superior to that of the whole Congress, the President, and all the others who say the Foundation should be put in operation at once.

This is congressional minority dictation of the worst type, comparable with past actions of the House Rules Committee in refusing to permit legislation favored by a large majority to come to a vote. In a way it is worse, since it would nullify a law that has already been approved by Congress and signed by the President.

Congress will convict itself of impotence and cowardice in the face of a small group's arbitrary attempt to thwart its will unless it insists on passing this appropriation and setting up an agency which all authorities agree is vital to our defenses.

Address by Hon. Claude Pepper, of Florida, at Fourth Biennial Convention of Southern Conference for Human Welfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address delivered by me at the fourth biennial convention of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, held at New Orleans, La., on November 28, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr Chairman and delegates to the fourth biennial convention of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, tonight we strike the keynote--freedom road. Each delegate to this convention must carry back home the torch to light freedom road for the South.

The people of the South are at the crossroads--the road to freedom or the path to the unseen wilderness of Republican administration. I fear the hand of republicanism will fall heavily upon the Southland. I fear for her industrial growth and development of her great resources. I fear the decline of southern agricultural production under a Republican regime. I fear that the Republicans will give lip service and ancient shibboleths on civil rights for southerners

I have a well-grounded fear that certain southern Democrats are inclined to cooperate with the Republicans. I am not alone in my fears.

Let me read to you excerpts from two editorials of a southern newspaper—the News and Courier of Charleston, S. C. On October 13, 1946, the editorial read:

"The Negroes who in South Carolina call themselves 'Progressive Democrats' are more consistent members of the new party founded in 1933 and more loyal followers of its national leaders than are the leaders of the white party in South Carolina. The white leaders oppose the passage of an FEPC law, filibuster against a Federal antilynching bill, and oppose the repeal of poll-tax laws. They oppose other important policies of the new party, and the allegations that they sometimes join the Republicans in voting against administration measures cannot be disputed. By 1948 the white people of South Carolina are pretty sure to find out where they don't belong, where they are unwelcome guests though they are fed with leavings."

On November 14, 1946, the editorial read: "Of the 170 members and senators composing the general assembly of South Carolina, how many are true New Dealers, loyal to the policies and to the memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt?"—"The News and Courier cannot shut its eyes to signs that some South Carolinians are yielding to the temptation to cooperate with Republicans. Cooperation is one degree removed from coalescence."

The people of the South and its economy are an integral part of these United States. The solution of southern economic, social, and political problems will play a great part in determining our country's ability to meet the challenge of this postwar world.

This solution lies in progressive democracy. It means that the Democratic Party must be led by those who believe in progressive democracy. Real democracy does not look backward in time for the solution of its problems—but looks forward. Hindsight is not the answer—but foresight is.

Progressive democracy does not seek the return to prewar standards like the Republicans. It does not desire to go back to 1932 or even to 1939. We must go far above even the 1939 level to remove economic, social, and political barriers to human happiness and peace.

I tell you that the South is America's economic problem No. 1. But the problems of the South, for the most part, are the problems of the North and the West. The differences are only in degree.

Let's look at the South. Variations in the income of the people in the South from those in the North or West are due to differences in natural resources, capital equipment, and financial resources, and the relative levels of productive training of the population.

As the result of a trend away from dependency upon agriculture to manufacturing there has been a sharp increase of incomes in the South. But they are still very low. Per capita incomes in the South are far below the average for the Nation, and, mind you, this fact is also reflected in State and local revenues.

Per capita incomes in the southern area moved from $371 in 1929 to $340 in 1940 and to $797 in 1945, or from 55 percent of the national per capita average in 1929 to 59 percent in 1940 and 69 percent in 1945. If you line up the 13 Southern States in ascending order of income you find Mississippi, with 59 percent of its workers on farms, in 1940 had a per capita income of $202, and Florida, with the lowest proportion of farm workers, 20 percent, had the highest southern per capita income of $471.

Average annual wages and salaries of workers in industries covered by unemployment-compensation laws in the South are roughly three-fourths of those in the same industries for the entire country. The average annual wage in the South in 1939 in these industries was about $1,016 and in 1944 $1,798. In all industries except mining the wages and salaries of southern industrial workers drew closer to the national average between 1939 and 1944. These averages for the South are overstated because a great proportion of small firms are excluded from the figures. Small firms generally pay lower wages than large ones.

Wages and salaries in the South represented less than 60 percent of the total income of the South in 1939 and in 1940, rose to 66 percent in 1943—because of military wages—and dropped to less than 60 percent in 1945. The rest of the country showed somewhat the same trend, starting at less than 65 percent in 1929, rising to 70 percent in 1940, and dropping back to 66 percent in 1945.

The proportion of wages and salaries paid in the South to the total for the country rose from 14 percent in 1929 to 16 percent in 1940 and 18 percent in 1945, whereas there has been a decline for the rest of the country from 86 percent in 1929 to 82 percent in 1945.

Manufacturing wages and salaries in the South increased from $1,562,000,000 in 1929 or 10 percent of the country total to $1,717,000,000 in 1940, or 11 percent of the national total for manufacturing, and $4,653,000,000, or 12 percent of the total United States manufacturing payrolls. The percentage increase in total southern manufacturing wages and salaries rose 171 percent between 1940 and 1945, and in all other States only 142 percent.

A study of straight-time earnings shows that in 1945 the Southeast had the lowest earnings in each of 23 of 36 industries, and the Southwest was lowest in 12 of 31 industries. Only 1 of the 36 industries in the Southeast had average earnings above the national average for the particular industry, and in the Southwest only 2 out of 31. Wages in lumber, railroads, textiles, building and printing trades, and many other important southern industries were lower in the South than elsewhere.

Per capita State and local revenues in 1938-39 in the United States were $68.61; for California, $99.76; for New York, $113.73; for Georgia, $35.79; for Alabama, $29.01; and for Florida, $57.44.

The South was not made for economic slavery. It has one-third of our Nation's farm lands. It has 60 percent of the Nation's land which has at least 40 inches of rainfall. It has 50 percent of the Nation's crop land with 6 months without frost. Yet there is poverty a plenty in the South. The poor farms and the poor farmer of the South help to pull down southern per capita income.

Although average net farm income per farm in the South rose from $582 in 1940 to $1,708 in 1944, about the same increase as the rest of the country, there was a decrease in the number of farms. Thus larger size farms reaped the harvest.

Farm wages in the South dropped from 4.4 percent of total wages in 1929 to 3.9 percent in 1940 and 3.4 percent of total southern wages and salaries in 1945. For the rest of the country, this relationship was about 2 percent between 1929 and 1945.

About half of the country's farm workers are in the South, but they get only less than 30 percent of the total national farm-wage payments. They got only $319,000,000 in 1929 or about one-fourth of the total United States farm wages in 1929. In 1940, they got 29 percent of the total and in 1945 about 27 percent of the total farm wages. The discrepancy lies not only in lower farm wages in the South than in the rest of the country, but in the large number of unpaid family workers in southern farming.

The Southern States with about one-half of the farm population get less than one-third of the national farm income payments. In 1929, agricultural income was $2,513,000,000 or 36 percent, the total farm income, in 1940 it dropped to $1,906,000,000 or 35 percent of the total farm income, and in 1945, $4,821,000,000 or 32 percent of the total agricultural income.

Agricultural income in the South was 20 percent of its total income in 1929, 15 percent in 1940, and 16 percent in 1945 compared with 6.3 percent, 5.6 percent, in 1940, and 8.4 percent in 1945 for the rest of the country. This shows that the South is more dependent on agriculture than the rest of the country.

Farm wages for the South rose from $21.20 per month to 1939 to $53.20 per month in 1944. This increase of 151 percent for the South can be compared with 156 percent for the country as a whole. The index of farm wage rates for the Nation (1910-1914—100) was 123 in 1939 and 315 in 1944.

As to wages—I know of no greater factor in determining the wealth of a State and its ability to meet human welfare needs than high wages. The South has always been known as a low wage area.

Substandard wages in the South has resulted not only in limited education, but also has placed a heavy toll on all persons with low wages in poor health and health facilities, high mortality, poor housing. Low wages have not meant good business in the South.

The principal industries originally affected by the 40-cent minimum under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 were those which, to a great extent, were in the South, namely: tobacco, lumber, textiles, apparel, and furniture. These were the principal industries with a large percentage of their workers getting under 65 cents an hour in the summer of 1945. This level, the Senate Committee on Education and Labor found necessary for minimum subsistence. In tobacco, 58 percent earned under 65 cents at that time, 54 percent in lumber, 47 percent in textiles, 38 percent in apparel, and 37 percent in furniture.

Wage differences between the South and the rest of the country for the same kind of work have no economic or social justification. These differentials are not based on any substantial difference in the cost of living between the North and the South. The cost of purchasing the same standard of living does not vary greatly from one geographical area to another.

The wage differentials between the North and the South in these industries particularly, and within these two regions, vary widely and irrationally from locality to locality. The Fair Labor Standards Act did help to reduce the North-South differentials for such industries as seamless hosiery and fertilizer. It exercised some influence in the equalization of wage rates for the same kind of work.

Studies by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics show that the cost of living differential between a city of 100,000 or more and one of 2,500 persons is probably not more than 10 percent on the average. A given standard of living in five small southern cities was, on the average, only 3.1 percent less than that for five small northern cities of the same size.

In December 1938, the cost of living for an Atlanta family of four was $1,332, for Birmingham $1,277, for Memphis $1,306, for New Orleans $1,261, and for Houston $1,298, for Jacksonville, $1,284, for Norfolk $1,325, for Richmond $1,332, Mobile $1,184, for Hattiesburg (Mississippi) $1,205, Sherman (Tennessee) $1,167, Statesville (North Carolina) $1,315, Sumter (South Carolina) $1,264, Thomasville (Georgia) $1,245.

The December, 1938, cost of living for North Atlantic cities was $1,340, for South Atlantic cities $1,325, North Central cities $1,343, South Central cities $1,243.

Southern city living costs were only 3.9 percent less than that for northern cities of various sizes (ranging from New York and Chicago to Chillicothe, Mo., and Dover, N. H.).

Compare the 1938 figures with $1,352 proposed in 1946 as an annual minimum wage base in 65 cents an hour when the cost of living was over 40 percent higher for low-wage families. In such low-wage cities as Mobile and Memphis, two-thirds of the families were estimated to be living below a minimum subsistance level in comparison with 25 percent in Washington, D. C., and San Francisco.

Living costs in the southern cities range from 88 percent of the cost of equivalent goods, rents, and services for the District of Columbia in March 1945, for Houston, Tex., to 95 percent in Richmond, Va. In eight of the twelve southern cities for which data is available for 1939 and 1945 the costs were 5 to 12 percent lower in the southern cities and 10 to 15 percent lower than the District of Columbia base for 1939.

And southern business and employment have benefited by high minimum wages. The profit experience of the southern lumber industry, a good example, was very satisfactory under the Fair Labor Standards Act and dur-World War II. The southern branch of the industry compares favorably with the northern branch and with the entire industry in the country.

I need not cite all the facts here. You can find it in the reports of the Senate Education and Labor Committee on the 65-cent minimum wage bill.

The full-fashioned hosiery industry expanded very rapidly in the South between 1932 and 1939 when wages in the southern division of the industry rose more rapidly than in the rest of the Nation. The proportion of plants in this industry located in the South rose from 20 percent in 1929 to 35 percent in 1938 and, for seamless hosiery the proportion of southern plants rose from 60 percent in 1934 to over 66 percent in 1941, a period of rising wages.

Under the NRA, employment increased from 46,754 to 55,441 in the men's apparel industry of the South. The South's share in the increase of employment in the paper and pulp industry rose from under 4 percent in 1925 to 7½ percent in 1939 and for furniture from 14 4 percent to 21.5 percent between 1929 and 1939. Although the actual number of persons employed in logging and sawmill operations dropped as much as 45 percent between 1914 and 1938, the southern share of employment in the industry remained constant Between 1938 and 1940 manufacturing employment in southern cities increased as much as, if not more than, other cities in the United States. Between 1937 and 1939, the dress-shirt industry in Tennessee doubled its employment. Employment in the southern branch of the men's apparel industry in 1939 was double that for 1931 when no 30-cent minimum was in effect.

The net profits before taxes of the southern division rose from a deficit of $332,000 in 1938 to $3,814,000 in 1939 and to $28,540,000 in 1942.

In October 1939 the minimum wage rate for the cotton-textile industry was set at 32½ cents an hour, in April 1942 at 40 cents an hour, at 50 cents an hour in 1944, and 55 cents in 1945. Net profits before taxes for the cotton-textile industry rose from an average of $38,000,000 in 1936-39 to $71,500,000 in 1940, $378,000,000 in 1942, and $400,000,000 in 1945.

The South not only provides its most productive labor for its own factories and farms, but also contributes substantially to the labor forces of the rest of the country. The fast-growing population of the South confronted with low job standards and low living standards provides the source of labor for many other areas. And our southern veterans, fully aware of this situation, are seeking employment elsewhere. Those who are left behind are, for a good part, the very young, the very old, the less competent in the factory and on the farm.

In 1920-30, the net out migration from the South was about 130,000 a year, during the depression of the 1930's, 100,000 per year and during 1940-45, 300,000 migrants in excess of the number entering the South left it. The 13-State area and every State in it except Florida and Virginia, has continued to lose population to other areas. There is strong evidence to indicate that rural southern migrants went to the North, the West, and to southern cities such as Mobile and Houston.

Data for the 1935-40 period indicate that many of these migrants are in the young, productive age groups. After spending unproductive school years in the South, they moved to other regions which reap the harvest of southern training. Of those who left the South, three-eighths of the 25-34 year age group had a high school education or better and six-sevenths had completed eighth grade or better.

War Department surveys show that in 1944, 15 of every 100 southern soldiers had plans to settle in the North or the West.

The median age of the population in the South in 1940 was 25 years, in contrast with 31 years in the North and the West. Fifty-two percent of the southern workers were under 35 years of age compared with 46 percent in the North and 44 percent in the West.

Similarly, there are more older men in the southern labor force. Forty-eight and five-tenths percent of southern men 65 and over are in the labor forces as compared with 40 percent for the North and 35.5 percent for the South.

A study of States in the last 5 years by Dr. E. J. Eberling, chief of research of the Tennessee Department of Employment Security (Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, South Carolina, and Georgia) shows 515,979 left this area for war jobs elsewhere. Florida gained 226,906 and Mississippi lost 227,599. Many of these are not returning. In the Mississippi Delta, 50 percent of Negro farm labor has gone since the war began.

With the flood of the population to southern cities during the war, the housing shortage became severe, rentals soared, and prices of consumers goods and services rose rapidly. The war workers who flocked to southern cities stayed there even without jobs, in preference to returning to farm life.

Before the war southern agriculture supported 37 percent of the labor, and manufacturing only 17 percent. In May 1945 these figures were 30 and 24 percent, respectively.

Seven of the ten largest cities of the South—Savannah, Jacksonville, New Orleans, Norfolk, Birmingham, Atlanta, and Memphis—showed rises in the cost of consumer goods and services between August 1939 and June 1946 of above the national average of 35 2 percent for 34 large cities. Savannah and Jacksonville were the two highest cities (41 6 and 40.5 percent). Between mid-June 1940 and early 1945 in 13 smaller southern cities, such as Vicksburg, Miss., Gadsden, Ala., Corpus Christi, Tex., Jonesboro, Ark., Chester, S. C., Goldsboro, N. C., Newport News, Va., et al., the cost of living rose more than the national average of 26.2 percent for the 34 largest cities in the same period. The only city which was less was Stillwater, Okla. (25 percent). In such cities as Vicksburg and Newport News the rise was 30 percent or more.

Between July 1, 1940, and September 30, 1945, Mobile and Norfolk increased total dwellings by 45 and 37 percent. In Jacksonville and Savannah 19 and 13 percent of prewar dwellings were added. Atlanta, Houston, and New Orleans also added many new dwellings.

Southern homes reflect their poverty and the poor housing and sanitation facilities which exist there. The lack of electric lighting, running water, private inside privies, mechanical refrigeration, and other facilities is merely a reflection of low incomes and the ensuing conditions of ill health.

The 1940 census shows that the average value of housing in the South was $1,363 in comparison with $2,503 for the average home in the Nation. In fact, the value of farm homes in the South was only $644 on the average against $1,728 for other rural homes. Of the 10 States with the poorest homes, 9 were in the South. In fact, other data reflect the poor housing and sanitation conditions which prevail in the South. The 1940 census shows that the percentage of dwelling units with electric lights was 31.3. In the South Atlantic States 21.8 percent of the dwelling units had electric lights.

	Percent of dwelling units with over 1.5 persons per room per unit	Mechanical refrigeration	Percent of dwelling units
			Owner occupied	Tenant occupied
United States	9.0	44.1	43.6	56.4
South Atlantic States	14.7	35.3	40.5	59.5

It should be noted that this comparison includes Delaware, Maryland, and Washington, D. C., in the South Atlantic States. If these are excluded, the disparity would be even greater.

Yes; of the 5,500,000 rural homes in the South, less than 3,000,000 have a water supply within 50 feet: 657,799 have no toilet or privy, and 4,000,000 have only an outside privy.

Of 4,922 southern incorporated communities in the South, 1,928, or 39.5 percent, need a public water supply and 47.2 percent need a sewage system with treatment.

Of southern rural homes in 1940, 13.6 percent were "acceptable" under Federal standards, 27.8 percent repairable, and 58.67 percent nonrepairable, against 52.5 percent acceptable, 31.8 percent repairable, and 24.3 percent nonrepairable for the rest of rural America.

Only 16.4 percent have electricity against 46.7 percent in the Nation. Four and nine-tenths percent had inside toilets and 15 percent none whatsoever.

Malnutrition is common in the South. This is no surprise. We southerners well know the average southern family has a less healthful diet than nonsouthern families. Why? Good diet is largely dependent on decent incomes available for purchasing power.

A study by the Department of Agriculture shows that farm operators in the Southeast have poorer diets than those in the North and in the West. About one-half of Negro farm families have poor diets. Based on national per capita consumption, it is estimated that southern people have an annual shortage of 121,000,000 gallons of milk, 18,500,000 head of purebred cattle, and 70,000,000 dozen eggs.

The South failed to contribute as much of its manpower as the rest of the Nation for its common defense.

About one of every two selective service registrant in 13 Southern States were rejected for physical and mental reasons. Compare this rate with one out of every three for the non-Southern States.

What is more precious to us than our mothers and children. Yet eight of the nine States with the highest mortality among maternity cases in 1943 were Southern States.

Maternity death rates were 3.6 per 1,000 live births in these States and only 2 2 per 1,000 in the non-Southern States. Infant mortality death rates in 13 Southern States were 48.6 per 1,000 live births in comparison with 40.6 for the nonsouthern group.

These facts are easily understood. Only 8 of every 10 mothers receive doctor care in a hospital during maternity. Almost 8 out of every 10 nonsouthern mothers get such care. Furthermore, over 2 out of every 10 southern mothers give birth to children without doctor and hospital care—they get the aid of a midwife. This situation is almost unknown in the non-Southern States.

We know that if the 13 Southern States, for example, had the same maternity and infant mortality rates as Minnesota and Connecticut, the States with the lowest rates in 1943, the lives of 16,304 southern mothers and 1,658 infants would have been saved (over 50 percent of the total lives that could have been saved).

Doctors, dentists, and nurses will not settle in localities where they cannot make a good living. This fact accounts, to a great extent, for the smaller proportion of physicians, dentists, and nurses in the South than in the rest of the Nation.

The number of physicians in the 12 highest per capita income States are 15.1 per 10,000 persons and only 8 per 10,000 in the 12 lowest-income States, which are largely Southern States. How threatening these figures are. For the national minimum standard for health safety is about 10 doctors for each 10,000 persons.

The number of active physicians per 10,000 persons was 9.4 for 13 Southern States in 1940 and 14.9 for the non-Southern States. In 1944 15 southern counties with a population of 3,000 or more had no active physician; 15 more southern counties had over 10,000 persons per active doctor; in 78 others there were 5,000 to 10,000 persons per active physician.

In States like Georgia, Alabama, and Florida 39.2 percent, 38.8 percent, and 44.8 percent of the counties, respectively, had over 3,000 persons per active physician under 65 years of age. Specifically, the 1944 rates for the States were 1,907, 1,213, and 2,185 persons per active doctor under 65.

In the 12 highest-income States there are about 72 dentists per 100,000 persons. In the 12 lowest per capita income States, largely Southern States, there are only 25 per 100,000 people.

In 1940 there were 27.3 male dentists per 100,000 persons in 13 Southern States in comparison with a rate of 64.1 for the rest of the Nation. The 1940 rates for Georgia was 1 dentist to every 3,796 persons, 1 per 4,683 for Alabama, and 1 per 2,657 for Florida. In 1940 there was 1 dentist for every 1,878 persons in the country.

In 1941 there was 1 dentist to every 1,200 persons on the west coast, 1 to every 1,300 in the Middle Atlantic area, 1 to every 3,100 in the West South-Central area, and 1 to every 3,900 in the East South-Central States.

Believe it or not, there are twice as many trained and student nurses in States outside the South as there are in the South. No wonder our maternal and infant mortality rates are high.

In 1940 there were 156 trained and student nurses per 100,000 in Southern States and 315 8 per 100,000 in the non-Southern States. In 1943 the ratio of population to nurses in the South Atlantic States was 993 for each nurse; in the West South-Central States there were 1,359 persons per nurse; in New England the rate was 423 to 1 nurse.

Health and hospital facilities in the South are wholly inadequate. Many of our southern counties do not have a local public health department. Is it any wonder that venereal-disease treatment in the South falls so far behind that of other States?

Is it any wonder that the prevention and care of tuberculosis and other contagious diseases have fallen by the wayside in the South?

Thirty-eight and nine-tenths percent, or 529 counties, in the South have no local health department. Eight hundred and thirty-two others are inadequately staffed. In 1944 about one-thousand-two-hundred-some-odd counties in the Nation had no full-time public-health service.

While the South has almost 30 percent of the country's population, it has only 19 percent of the general hospital beds, 18 percent of the tuberculosis beds, and 18 percent of the mental hospital beds. This disparity is too great for the public good and for the health of the southern people.

In 1940 the 10 States with the least number of hospital beds per 10,000 persons were all southern. The minimum considered to be necessary in 1940 was 4 beds per 1,000 people. Yet the Southern States in that year had only about 2.2 beds per 1,000 people. No Southern State was up to this minimum.

The 12 highest-income States have 4.3 beds per 1,000 persons and the lowest 12 per capita income States have 2.1 per 1,000 persons. The latter, of course, were largely Southern States.

In 1944, 4.5 to 5 general beds was considered a good standard for each 1,000 people. Yet, in States like Georgia and Alabama, the rates were below 2.5 beds per 1,000 persons.

In 1944 we find a rate of 2.5 general and special hospital beds per 1,000 people in the South. The rate for the Northeast was 4.8 and for the Western States 4.1 such beds per each 1,000 individuals.

The wealth of a State also determines hospital occupancy. For example, New York which had 5.4 general and special beds per 1,000 persons in 1944 had an occupancy rate in its hospitals of 74 percent. Mississippi, with 1.8 beds per 1,000 had an occupancy of 57 percent. In New York each patient in a hospital averaged about 1.4 days. Mississippi provided only 0.38 days to each patient despite a record of greater ill health in that State.

Is it any wonder that the South has a lower education level than the rest of the country? Is it any wonder that the wealthy States of the North and the West pay their more unfortunate citizens substantially more than our Southern States? The amounts paid in the South are a pittance on which they can hardly exist.

We find 341,200 selective-service registrants rejected because of the lack of education, as of September 1, 1943. The number of Negroes rejected for this reason was six to seven times the number of white men rejected and equaled over one-half of the total rejections for this cause.

In Georgia, the rejection rates for lack of education were about 15 per 100 registrants and in Alabama 16 per 100 registrants. No wonder—the average 1939 school expenditure per pupil in Georgia was $17 and in Alabama $15. On the other hand, look at New York City or Massachusetts. The rate of rejections for educational deficiencies was less than 1 per 100 in New York City and 1½ per 100 registrants examined in Massachusetts. The city of New York spent $157 for the education of each pupil in 1939 and Massachusetts expended $115 per pupil.

The Southern States, which have a lower per capita income than most other States spend much less on the average for educating its young people. For example, Alabama with a per capita income in 1940 of $782 per person between 5 and 20 years of age spent $22.77 on education for each such person in 1942. Georgia with an income of $950 per school age person spent $24.93 and Florida with $1,708 expended $41.70. The Nation in 1940 got an income of $2,043 per school age person and gave each one in return $55.69 worth of education. New York with $3,592 gave $91.07 and California with $3,575 gave $105.59.

There is no question that the State benefits by giving its young people opportunities for better education. The 1940 census shows that 50 percent of the people who had completed college or beyond had incomes of $5,000 or more per year, 39 percent of those who attended high school had annual incomes at this level. Only 11 percent of those who had 8 years of schooling or less had incomes as high at this.

That proportion of a State's income spent on education is not indicative of neglect of education. States like Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi spend as great (and a greater) proportion of their incomes on education as wealthy States like California, Washington, and New York. But the average school expenditure per average classroom or per pupil is many times higher in the richer States. Of the 10 States with the lowest expenditures for schools per average classroom in 1938 39, 9 were Southern States.

In April 1946, the average old-age assistance payment in the United States was $31.34. The highest paying State was Washington with $53.14. Look at Georgia which doled out $12.67; Alabama, $16.02, and Florida, $30.21. Yes, an aged citizen had to get these meager sums after he underwent a humiliating means test.

The average payment in April 1946, in aid to the blind was $33.85. California and Washington paid as much as $58 a month. The blind person in Georgia received $15.45, $17.56 in Alabama, and $31.41 in Florida.

The average payment in the United States for April 1946 to families with dependent children was $53 82. One hundred dollars, the highest amount, was paid by Washington. Georgia doled out $26.73; Alabama, $28.29, and Florida, $34.12.

Dr. FRANK GRAHAM, one of the great leaders of the southern conference, has proposed a 10-point program as a solution to many of the economic and social problems of the South. Furthermore, I am heartily in accord with the program for democracy in southern agriculture, which is so competently set forth in the November 1946 issue of the Southern Patriot.

"SOUTHERN CONFERENCE FOR HUMAN WELFARE—TEN-POINT PROGRAM

"(By FRANK GRAHAM)

"1. Elimination of discriminatory freight rates which have for so long been barriers to the development of the South.

"2. Federal and State aid for building hospitals and rural health centers and the expansion of the few remaining State 2-year medical schools into standard 4-year medical schools.

"3. Federal aid to the States for the public schools without Federal control and increased pay and equal pay for teachers of equal competence as steps toward providing equal educational opportunities for all youth.

"4. To help to provide the desperately needed doctors and nurses for the hospitals and rural-health centers.

"5. More and diversified industries in the South and responsible bargaining between organized businesses and organized labor as the foundation for cooperation in fair employment and maximum production for the maintenance of justice and peace in the world.

"6. The 65-cent Federal minimum wage in interstate industries and State minimum wages in intrastate industries, State and public employees to correspond to the Federal minimum.

"7. More diversification of agriculture, promotion of agricultural societies, farm and home ownership and the establishment of a clear and equitable status for farm tenants and share croppers.

"8. Additional State and Federal support of both agriculture and industrial research and fundamental scientific, economic, historical, social and humanistic research as indispensable to southern production and human well-being.

"9. The development of great university and college centers in the South.

"10. State aid for county-wide libraries for adult education, workers education, institute of government, State symphonies and folk government."

The Southern Patriot program for agriculture includes:

1. Governmental purchase of large units of land with resale to farmers and tenants at low rates and expansion of the Farmers Home Administration program.

2. Adequate low-cost credit to farmers for acquisition of land, machinery, livestock, housing and fertilizer. Amendment of the GI bill of rights to provide direct Government loans to veterans.

3. Governmental assistance to farm cooperatives.

4. Granting of certain legal rights to tenants and share croppers.

5. Coverage of farm labor under various labor and social-welfare laws.

6. Expansion of health, housing, education and public-welfare programs for southern rural areas.

7. Removal of poll-tax laws, passage of antilynching laws and outlawing of white primaries.

I have little to add to these splendid programs. I should like to say however, that there should be a basic guiding principle, namely, that the Federal Government must equalize economic and social opportunities throughout the Nation. It is high time that the South shared more equitably in Federal aid for human welfare. The present system of matching Federal moneys with State funds fails to equalize the financial burdens of economic and social welfare throughout the Nation. To assist the low-income States it is necessary that Federal participation recognize differences in the present financial status of each State. States with low per capita income must receive a higher proportion of assistance from the Federal Government than the States with high per capita income.

What is also needed in the South is a well-planned chain of TVA's, a soil-conservation program, a reforestration program and a carefully developed plan to develop our natural resources.

This is a program for economic and social welfare. It is a program which progressive democracy offers for human happiness. On the other hand, what do the Republicans offer the American people. Budget slashes, tax cuts, high prices, food and other shortages, housing shortages. It is a program for the few at the expense of the many. It is a program of scarcity which will lead us to depression and unemployment.

The third phase of the program deals with human liberties. These are grave times for the South. The anti-Democrats are in the saddle. They are riding the southern people like herd—just as they did after the end of the Civil War and World War I. We know about the Columbians of Atlanta, the Talmadges of Georgia, the lynchings in Mississippi, the depredations heaped upon American citizens throughout the South, the "white supremacy" primaries of South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama. Other States, like Arkansas and others, talk of following suit. Therein lies the danger. The fires of racial hatred have been lit in the South. The poison seeds of Hitlerian creeds have been sown.

Shall lovers of liberty and human happiness cringe in fear before these fires, or permit these seeds to grow in the American soil. "No," I say. Americans have never given way to tyranny, despotism, or autocracy. They have resisted until their forces were strong enough to beat down the enemy.

There is a gentle mist settling before the winds blow. It will rise into a storm. The wrath of God will put out these fires and wash away these poisonous embryos.

For in the South today the forces of progressive democracy are behind this gathering storm. With the help of progressive Democrats elsewhere, the Arnalls of Georgia, Folsoms of Alabama, the Perrys of Tennessee, the Grahams of North Carolina will rise to defeat the anti-Democratic forces in this country. There is no place in the Democratic Party for people who have no regard for human welfare and liberty.

All other believers in our program must back up these leaders. The Southern Conference for Human Welfare must take its position in the front lines of the forces of southern democracy to achieve victory. The conference must become the bulwark in the rebirth of the South. It must become the South of Jefferson, of Patrick Henry, of the Georgians at Kings Mountain. It must be the South in which the most immortal of all documents must be given the breath of life again. This is our program. It is your duty to carry on.

A Tribute to Peter J. McGuire as Father of Labor Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that on each succeeding Labor Day, exercises are held in Arlington Cemetery, located near the city of Camden, N. J., to honor Peter J. McGuire, known as the father of Labor Day, who was buried there in 1906, the year he passed on into the Great Beyond.

Mr. McGuire was born in Dublin, Ireland, in 1852. At an early age he came to this country. He identified himself with trade-union activities, and, eventually became general secretary of the Carpenters and Joiners International Union. In his effort to achieve recognition of labor's rights, he advocated the setting aside of a fixed day each year to be known as Labor Day. The day to be observed as a national holiday in tribute to labor and the workingman. In 1881 he prompted New York's Knights of Labor to hold the first Labor Day parade up Fifth Avenue. In 1894 Congress answered his 20-year plea and made Labor Day a national holiday. Since that time Labor Day has become a fixture in our national holidays and each year receives the recognition it is entitled to have. Well may it be said that Peter J. McGuire is the father of Labor Day.

The tribute that is yearly paid to this great man is well deserved. We consider it an honor that he made his home in our city of Camden. He died in our city a poor but respected man. Though poor in earthly goods, he was rich in the honor and respect of his fellow man. His memory has continued through all the years that have intervened as a wholesome influence. His allegiance to the cause of labor is even yet an inspiration to all who believe in the dignity and importance of labor and the rights of workers.

There can be no higher compliment paid to this great man than for each to seek to emulate his character, his high regard for principle, his unswerving belief in the rights of man and his loyalty to America.

A fitting tribute to this great labor leader has been paid by the Courier-Post, of Camden, N. J., in an editorial in the issue of September 1950, entitled "Free Labor, Free America Involve Same Principle." It reads as follows:

FREE LABOR, FREE AMERICA INVOLVE SAME PRINCIPLE

During his term of office as general secretary of the Carpenters and Joiners International Union a young trade-unionist who had come to this country from Dublin at an early age presented a motion to the Central Labor Union of New York City that:

"A day be set aside, a festive day, as a tribute to labor and the workingman; and on this day there should be a parade and a picnic where speeches would be made by trade-unionists and sympathizers."

Peter J. McGuire's motion was adopted, and a huge demonstration was held on September 5, 1882, in New York in which thousands of people took part. It was America's first Labor Day celebration.

Twelve years later, after a long and determined fight against bitter opposition, Congress proclaimed the first Monday in September a national holiday to be known as Labor Day.

Down the years the holiday has been observed and has come to meet universal acceptance as the one on which we pay our respects to the man who works for a living, the man who has literally built this America of ours.

Many of us tend to lose sight of the original objective of this holiday, as we do of others.

We regard it as merely an occasion for frivolity, for plain and fancy loafing. It has become more and more a day for clambakes, political speeches, picnics, and the torture of driving homeward after the last long summer week end at the shore.

Peter J. McGuire wished this to be a festive day, as indeed it should be. But he also wished it to be a serious day, a day for contemplating the advances America and American labor have made under a system which believes in the dignity of labor, labor's right to organize and gain economic security by concerted action, in contrast with the totalitarian systems which have enslaved labor along with management and made both the helpless serfs of a faceless state that denies all human dignity.

Today south Jersey pays its annual tribute to McGuire, who adopted Camden as his home and died at 204 Byron Street in 1906, with a pilgrimage to his grave in Arlington Cemetery, Pennsauken, and memorial services there sponsored by Camden's Central Labor Union.

As we renew our homage to the memory of this great Camden citizen, let us rededicate ourselves to the principles on which he founded Labor Day.

Where labor is free, as it is free in America, the people are free. Where labor is not free the people cannot be free.

Free labor may produce occasional excesses, but they are relatively few. We believe it is better to allow labor to police itself against such excesses, as it does and will, than to adopt police state methods toward labor.

We now are in a crisis that may involve many of us for the rest of our lives. The security of America must be our central aim for a long time to come.

The security of labor's true rights is wrapped up in the security of America. A friend of one is a friend of the other, a foe of one a foe of the other.

Lattimore: Dreyfus or Hiss?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Lattimore: Dreyfus or Hiss?" written by Eugene Lyons, and published in the New Leader on September 2, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LATTIMORE: DREYFUS OR HISS?

(By Eugene Lyons)

During the recent inquiry into charges of Communist infiltration of the State Department, Dr. Owen Lattimore made a number of statements to the Tydings committee and the press, flatly denying that he had ever been friendly to communism, let alone an agent or spy as charged by Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY and others. Now he has brought together and elaborated these statements into a small book: Ordeal by Slander.

Dr. Lattimore presents his narrative as a black-and-white political morality play. His accusers figure (in his wife's words) as "the powers of darkness," bent on frame-up and not beyond the arts of forgery. His friends and defenders, including several Communists, figure as angels of light, sometimes stubborn but always sincere. For himself he reserves the role of a latter-day Job, the truth-seeking savant afflicted and badgered by hysterical witch hunters.

The book, of course, cannot be considered in a vacuum, on its own merits—as most reviewers have done. A judgment based solely on the author's testimony makes as little sense as the premature judgments of certain jubilant souls after Alger Hiss first testified before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Guilty or innocent, a Dreyfus or a Hiss, Dr. Lattimore's role in the Asian debacle has been intricately woven into larger affairs: The organized propaganda that "sold" the Chinese Communists to Americans as reformers independent of Moscow; the Amerasia scandal; the Institute of Pacific Relations, infiltrated by key Communists, which during critical years supplied personnel and guidance to Government agencies.

The current American plight in Asia is at least a partial consequence of blundering policies geared to misunderstanding and tolerance of the Chinese Communists, tragic temporizing, calculated appeasements of the Soviet Union and its fifth columns on that continent. Those policies were shaped and nurtured by an array of people, inside and outside the Government, that included—to cite types—Philip Jaffe, Lauchlin Currie, Edgar Snow, Harriet L. Moore, Alger Hiss, Frederick Vanderbilt Field, John K. Fairbank, T. A. Bisson, Edward C. Carter, Philip C. Jessup, and Owen Lattimore.

Against this background, one would suppose that serious newspapers and reviewers would approach a frankly self-defending book by Dr. Lattimore critically. One would expect them, in deference to common sense, to examine the other side of the story, to ask themselves:

"Why, of all the left-wing experts on the Far East, many of them louder and more reckless in riding Stalin's wave of the future, has the scholarly Dr. Lattimore been singled out for the alleged slanders? Even granting the existence of a sinister China lobby, how come that this so-innocent professor was selected as the sacrificial goat? Villains are not necessarily idiots. With so many more vulnerable characters on hand, what prompted them to pick for assassination a character as pure as the one limned in Dr. Lattimore's self-portrait?"

Yet solely on the professor's ex parte account, the initial reviews in the metropolitan press ratify vehemently and without reservation the author's extreme opinions of himself and his detractors. Both the New York Times and Herald Tribune Sunday book sections feature these offhand verdicts on their front pages. The Herald Tribune review, moreover, is done by Dr. Fairbank, who (according to Lattimore, p. 203) sent out telegrams to a long list of Far Eastern experts suggesting that they write to Senator TYDINGS in Lattimore's defense. A more cynically logrolling choice of reviewer can hardly be imagined, short of the author himself. The following morning the daily critics of the same papers concurred.

The nearest these reviewers come to glancing outside the pages of the book is in reference to the exoneration of Dr. Lattimore by the Democrats on the Tydings committee. This they again accept uncritically, although the Tydings investigation was a crudely partisan affair, adjourned before it had explored the edges of its vital assignment.

Ordeal by Slander was put out by Little, Brown, whose editor has been one of the Nation's most eminent fellow travelers for years. It was instantly snapped up by the equally pro-Soviet Book Find Club (the New Leader, October 15, 1949). With no less alacrity it began serial publication in the New York Compass, successor to the late unlamented PM. Its generous advertisements presented enthusiastic endorsements by such impartial judges as William L. Shirer, James P. Warburg, Prof. K. F. Mather, and Edgar Snow.

SLANDER WORKS TWO WAYS

These eulogies are all full of righteous indignation. They cry out against accusation without adequate proof. But they fail to notice that in crediting Lattimore's version at face value they make themselves party to the slanders throughout the book—without a shred of proof—against Louis Budenz, Freda Utley, Alfred Kohlberg, and others who claim that the author has been playing a pernicious Communist game.

Surely they command enough logic to realize that in unreservedly approving this book they are accusing others of the heinous crime of framing an innocent man.

I have stressed the literary reaction to the book because that seems to me deeply pertinent to the current world crisis. It suggests a climate of confusion with respect to communism, and supports the terrifying conclusion that on the intellectual level America today is more dismally unarmed than on the military level.

Recently - too recently to be dealt with in Ordeal by Slander—it was disclosed that Owen Lattimore in September 1949 bought a half interest in a Bethel, Vt., property from Vilhjalmar Stefansson, a forthright pro-Communist, and that jointly they sold it a few months later to an outright Communist, Ordway Southard, the party's 1942 candidate for Governor of Alabama.

Not too recently to be dealt with in the book—but passed over in silence in its pages—it was revealed that Dr. Lattimore is honorary vice president of a Red front, Indusco, for "technical aid" to Communist China, and that his wife is secretary of the organization. Among others involved in the enterprise are such notorious party-liners as Philip Jaffe, Maxwell Stewart, Hugh Deffacy, Rev. S Harrington Littell. Of its 21 directors, 12 have also been prominently associated with the leading front of the China Communist lobby, the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, identified as subversive by the Attorney General.

For a period of 4 years, 1937-41, Dr. Lattimore served on the editorial board of the Communist mouthpiece Amerasia, edited by Jaffe, who pleaded guilty in the espionage case centered in that periodical. Dr. Lattimore says that since the spy case did not break until 1945, he has nothing to explain. It is not easy to believe, however, that a man of his political perspicacity never caught on that Amerasia was a Communist organ. The fact that nearly all the accused in the spy case were close colleagues of Lattimore, and that two of them were at his home just before their arrest, adds to the mountain of coincidences.

Dr. Lattimore was associated at various times with Red fronts like the National Emergency Conference for Protection of Human Rights, the Washington Committee To Aid China, the American Writers Congress. Although this was widely publicized by his accusers—and long before MCCARTHY came on the scene—the book avoids so much as an allusion to it.

The Soviet purges of the late thirties rightly became a test of the "loyalty" of so-called friends of the Soviets. Dr. Lattimore passed the test with flying colors. In his own magazine, Pacific Affairs, he wrote in 1938 that the Moscow blood trials "sound to me like democracy."

Dr. Lattimore was welcomed to Yenan, Chinese Communist stronghold, in 1937, at a time when only "friendly" investigators were given this privilege. His fellow-travelers included Mr. and Mrs. Jaffe and T. A. Bisson. But the professor, by the testimony of the Amerasia editor in the New Masses, did not limit himself to investigating. "Our visit to Yenan," Jaffe wrote, "was climaxed by a huge mass meeting addressed by Chu Teh, Bisson, Lattimore, and myself. * * *"

In 1947 Dr. Lattimore was chosen by President Roosevelt to go to China on a mission. The summons was conveyed to him by Lauchlin Currie. "I don't know who suggested my name to Mr. Currie," Dr. Lattimore has testified. Some unkind guessing on the mystery is inescapable when we recall that Mr. Currie has been identified as a prominent cog in the Soviets' Washington "apparatus" by both Elizabeth Bentley and Whittaker Chambers, whose charges thus far have stood the test of time and probing.

One of the more fantastic episodes in the annals of Communist befuddlement was the junket of Vice President Henry A. Wallace to Magadan, the all-slave forced-labor area in the Soviet Far East. Mr. Wallace talked of freedom and democracy to an audience of convicts and guards under the illusion that they were "pioneers" like those who settled our West. His political expert and mentor on that journey was Dr. Lattimore, who, alas, did not bother to tell his Vice President the facts of Siberian life. And his own report, in the National Geographic of December 1944, describes Magadan admiringly without a word about its forced-labor battalions. It was, as William Henry Chamberlin put it in the New Leader recently, as if an American had described Dachau or Buchenwald gushingly without a hint of the inmates' true condition.

Space does not allow me to continue this inventory of symptomatic data. No one of these facts, standing alone, means much. Even all together they do not prove that Dr. Lattimore was on Stalin's payroll. But I submit, in all conscience, that they do cast doubt on his denials of Communist sympathies and associations. I submit that they cast doubt on the good sense of those who rushed to acclaim the book and blackguard Lattimore's accusers without some elementary research beyond its pages.

WHY NO SUITS?

Dr. Lattimore and his reviewers convey the impression that the author, out in Afghanistan on a UN mission, was surprised and shocked by the Senator's accusations. The truth is that roughly the same charges had been made, in print and verbally, for many years. He makes much of McCARTHY'S refusal to give up the protection of congressional immunity. But he does not explain why he did not sue when others, protected by no immunities, made similar accusations in writing.

I have before me a widely circulated letter dated March 18, 1947, in which substantially the McCARTHY charges were set down, though in somewhat more guarded language. Lattimore himself (his alleged surprise in Kabul notwithstanding) says at one point, "These were charges that had been put out for years by Alfred C. Kohlberg." For an educator and writer whose reputation for objectivity is his main capital, Dr. Lattimore was strangely remiss in reacting, especially in view of his present pose of eagerness to sue.

Probably the most impressive single piece of evidence—which the Tydings committee chose not to pursue—was provided by a former Red general, now an American citizen, whom the press identified as Alexander Barmine. Dr. Lattimore's handling of this item seems to me significant through its omissions.

According to reports predating Senator McCARTHY'S intrusion, Mr. Barmine apparently claims that his superior in Moscow—not just another general making small talk, mind you, but the Chief of Soviet Military Intelligence, General Berzin, discussing business with a colleague—named two Americans as his agents in the Far East. One of these allegedly was Lattimore. How does ordeal by slander deal with this accusation?

To begin with, the author implies that this was a brand-new witness of whose existence he had not known. In that case, he was about the only one active in Far East and IPR affairs who had not yet heard the Barmine charge, whatever its worth. It was no secret that the story had been told in detail to the FBI long, long ago, and to others since then.

Secondly, Dr. Lattimore sums up the supposed Barmine story as follows: "McCARTHY'S Red general charge was an insinuation that the Institute of Pacific Relations was in 1936 a tool of Soviet intelligence." But in the context of his own case the essence of the story was precisely the part he somehow does not mention: not an insinuation but a specific allegation that he, Lattimore, had been reported by the top Soviet intelligence officer as an agent. Having concealed the real point from his readers, the pages Lattimore then devotes to the question become so much futile flailing of water.

FBI INFORMERS

Dr. Lattimore generously concedes that infiltration of our Government by subversives is a serious problem the American people have a right to solve. Yet he has only angry contempt for Americans, whether repentant former comrades or FBI agents, who help to uncover them. One of the agents, who had given 10 years to gathering information by posing as a Communist, is told off as the ordinarily despised common informer.

In fact, anyone who tells on subversives is labeled "informer" in Lattimore's book. Who but "informers," volunteers or Government plants, are best equipped to unmask infiltrated Communists? Dr. Lattimore doesn't answer that one.

The only ex-Communists for whom he has kind words, indeed, are the two who happen to be ex only in the technical sense that they were expelled from the party, namely, Browder and Bella Dodd. Them he describes as "sincere" and, along with Freddie Field, not the kind of people who would engage in conspiracies.

Bella Dodd, incidentally, was brought into the Lattimore drama, he reveals, by a character who calls himself a labor man, one Wellington Roe. This is one of the most dubious, and to me revealing, incidents in the book. It was Mr. Roe, in his zeal for justice, who on his own dug up the Dodd woman as counterweight to Budenz and delivered her to Lattimore's lawyers. But it happens that this is not the first time Mr. Roe's concern for justice has moved him to act on his own—and always, by coincidence, of course, on the side of the comrades. He had made it his private task previously to "expose" Jan Valtin and Walter Krivitsky.

The "ordeal" part of the book peters out in unconscious comedy. Rarely, it develops, has a Job gotten off so lightly. "No more cruel or unusual punishment can be devised," Dr. Lattimore exclaims, "than allowing a Senator to make charges against individuals that he has not even attempted to substantiate with proof." But the nearest he comes to pointing to social or economic sanctions against himself is the decision of a southern college to return 20 copies of one of his books.

"ORDEAL" LUDICROUS

For the rest, everyone seems to have rallied to his banner. TYDINGS smiles on him. Senator CONNALLY reassures him. Even a uniformed Senate guard whispers encouragement in his ear. Taxi drivers cheer him on. Drew Pearson goes all-out in his defense on the radio. His university faculty stages a triumphal reception for him. The Afghans (as he solemnly records) voice faith in his loyalty. Editorial writers and reporters are on his side. The National Academy of Political and Social Sciences insists that he lecture to them, and the pressure of new lecture and writing assignments grows heavier. Presumably he has put it on a bit thick, but if the half-hearted attempt to look into his record has damaged him irreparably, this book fails to prove it.

Legislative inquiries, like trials, cannot be limited to the demonstrably guilty. Were guilt so clearly known, there would normally be no need for inquiring. Unavoidably the searchlight picks up people who may be innocent or, as one critic said of Lattimore, lacking in discretion. This is a sad by-product of the democratic process which innocent men take in their stride. The Pujo committee, the Teapot Dome investigation, the LaFollette committee all drew in suspects who were ultimately cleared without permanent damage to their lives or hysterical books about their "ordeals."

The anguished wailing and handwringing over his ordeal by the professor and his reviewers are pretty ludicrous, especially in the light of events in Korea and China. Even if his multifarious relations with Communists were merely innocent stupidities (not incompatible with erudition)—even if his influential views just happened to be helpful to the Kremlin—it is well that the facts are now public, as a warning against the man's unfitness as a policy mentor. Actually the Lattimore case, of course, is only in its early stages. Vital facts have been revealed since the book's publication and others seem certain to come out. Those who now weep publicly over his distress may yet be as embarrassed as they were when the Hiss case was clarified.

Color Television

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement by me regarding the decision of the Federal Communications Commission on the controversial color television question, together with a letter I wrote to Chairman Coy, of the Commission, with regard to the matter.

There being no objection, the statement and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On Friday, September 1, the Federal Communications Commission handed down its long-awaited decision on the controversial color television question. This determination is one of the most important ever made by the Communications Commission and, in general, in my opinion reflects much credit upon that body.

In brief, the Commission's decision holds that of the three systems demonstrated to it during its 9 months of penetrating and exhaustive hearings, Columbia Broadcasting System's color television was the most advanced now. The Commission is anxious that the public be protected from early obsolescence of the black-and-white television sets it is now buying and therefore ruled that if manufacturers agree to build new sets capable of receiving Columbia's color pictures, it will not make a final decision for Columbia's color at this time. Thus, if a substantial number of manufacturers notify the Commission within 30 days that they will begin building such sets, the Commission will hold further hearings and witness additional demonstrations of several new and/or improved color systems beginning December 5 of this year to determine whether or not such color systems come up to the basic minimum standards which the Commission has laid down. If, on the other hand, the manufacturers refuse to build sets on which Columbia's color system may be received, the Commission will issue a final decision ordering commercial operation on the basis of the Columbia system.

It seems to me that by following this practice, the Commission wisely has not closed the door to possible basic improvements in color television now. In addition to RCA and CTI who demonstrated their color systems to the Commission during the hearings, and who now claim major improvements in their systems, there are a number of new systems in the laboratories and on drawing boards for which great claims are made and whose inventors and makers will have an opportunity to present them to the Commission for practical, working tests. If they are only half as good as some of the claims being made for them, the American people are going to have superb color television.

While I have no doubt that the Commission's decision will be criticized, it seems to me that unbiased, fair-minded people will generally agree that the decision was as good a one as could be made now under all the circumstances prevailing and is definitely therefore in the public interest. It is significant that for the most part the decision was unanimous by all seven Commissioners. Three Commissioners differed only as to the implementation of it, two holding that the Commission should have finalized now and picked the Columbia system, while one felt that the final decision should be deferred even longer than the majority held.

Since the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had taken a close and continuing interest in the color television question, I wrote Chairman Wayne Coy, of the Commission, a brief comment last week after the decision was issued.

SEPTEMBER 2, 1950.

Hon WAYNE COY,
Chairman, Federal Communications Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR WAYNE: I want to take this occasion to congratulate the Federal Communications Commission for having reached a decision on the important color television question. According to reports, none of those intimately affected by the decision is wholly pleased; but this is no reflection on the decision. Rather, it indicates how difficult and complex are the points which had to be resolved.

It is, of course, particularly gratifying to me that the Commission unanimously agreed and emphasized "that color is an important improvement in television broadcasting. It adds both apparent definition and realism in pictures. It opens up whole new fields for effective broadcasting, rendering lifelike and exciting scenes where color is of the essence * * * color is * * * a fundamental improvement in television. * * *" The decision brings very close the day when this great new improvement in the art will serve the American people.

The exhaustive and penetrating hearings which the Commission held are a credit to you and your colleagues. The earnest and painstaking attention which each Commissioner brought to bear upon the very difficult and extremely technical problems involved has been most reassuring to the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who have followed the matter closely.

Leaving the door partly ajar, affording an opportunity to the Johnny-come-latelies, is a challenge to them to produce or step aside. Moreover, it is in the best traditions of American democracy and the free enterprise system since it does not foreclose improvements and advances which I am sure our American electronic science may bring out. I am sure the majority of the Commission will not permit this desirable approach to delay the commercial use of color. This will allay the fears of those who dissent on the grounds that finality now is essential.

My thanks and commendation to you personally and all of your colleagues for a difficult job well done and for the progress made thus far. I know that every effort will be made to push forward rapidly the allocation decisions so that television will be made available to many more millions of our citizens who are waiting impatiently to have television in their homes.

Very sincerely yours,

ED. C. JOHNSON,
Chairman.

Why Does the United States Help the Russian Fur Industry?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the present policy of the United States seems to be based upon a desire to help Russia sell their goods in our country even though it is to the detriment of our own workers. This in my opinion is absolutely indefensible particularly when it is known that such goods are produced by forced labor.

This subject was dealt with in a most comprehensive and forceful manner by Robert F. Hurleigh, Mutual Broadcasting System, on Wednesday, August 9, 1950, in a broadcast report at that time. It deserves the attention and the serious consideration of every American, and, in my opinion, the whole subject deserves investigation and remedial action by Congress. The report to which I refer is as follows:

While the Security Council of the United Nations takes a day off from the regular sessions which have proved exasperatingly futile, we have the opportunity to consider the delaying tactics of the Soviets in another agency of the United Nations and which have had tragic consequences. The news spotlight has not been turned on the sessions of the Economic and Social Council to reveal the stalling tactics and evasions of the Soviets as publicized these past 10 days by reporters covering the Security Council. Just as we now know the Soviet delegate at the Security Council never intends to abide by any moral code, so have we had proof, time and again, that Moscow will never accede to any decision made by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations which will force Russia to abide by the articles of the UN Charter as it affects forced labor. Although the protests have been made that Russia is not living up to the articles of the UN on slave labor—or corrective labor—the general press—with very few notable exceptions—has given little attention to an appalling situation. Much of Soviet Russia's industry is geared to forced labor, and the product of Soviet slave-labor camps is being sold in this country in competition with the free American worker. This invasion of the American market by Russia results in the weakening of our own economy by destroying domestic employment and undermining prosperity which is necessary to maintain the heavy financial burden we now carry for the world.

This trade with the cold-war enemy continues even as we have indications that the presently "contained" war in Korea may explode in literally a dozen different areas. It is now apparent that certain officials in Washington have seemed more concerned over maintaining the Soviet Government's exports to this country than in being genuinely worried over the damage these exports are doing to American industries. For the past number of years the fur farmers of this country, many of them disabled ex-GI's who were advised by the Veterans' Administration to get into the business of fur farming, have been trying to convince Washington that the importation of furs from the Soviet Union has been detrimental to the country as well as to their industry.

In the first place, American fur imports have tripled since the war—and this year, according to the authoritative trade paper, Women's Wear Daily, American participation in the Russian fur sales in Leningrad have been above last year—and this at a time when the affairs between this country and Soviet Russia have been deteriorating. Close to 100 American fur buyers were able to obtain visas and journey to Leningrad for the big Russian fur sale of last month and it is probable that $50,000,000 will be deposited to the account of the Soviet Union in New York banks in payment for these Russian furs. Moscow has been willing to sell furs on the American market at almost any price in order to obtain the American dollar and since all the industry in Russia is controlled by state socialism, the government and not free individuals fixes the price in competition with the American fur farmers. And the Soviet Union stands accused by no less an authority than the American Federation of Labor as running slave-labor camps where millions of individuals are forced to live under conditions intolerable to free men.

This allegation that human beings are forced into conditions of slavery is perhaps the gravest charge which could come before the United Nations—and the charge has been made, repeatedly—before the Economic and Social Council of the UN. The protest made by the A. F. of L. underlined the fact that no country in the UN could afford to ignore the growing evidence of appalling widespread use of forced labor in the Soviet Union. For enough information has come through the thick veil of Soviet secrecy to confirm that millions—perhaps as many as 15,000,000—are forced in work camps by the Soviets and the product of their effort is being sold on the American market in competition to free American labor. According to the figures of the Department of Commerce, the imports from Soviet Russia last year totaled almost $42,500,000 while our exports to the U. S. S. R. are valued at only $6,6[illegible]6,000.

If you wonder what happens to that dollar difference of 35,000,000 in net earnings in Communist imports, you need only to realize the vast expenditures of the Soviet Union for propaganda and espionage—and for lawyers' fees to defend Communists. Fur imports alone have accounted for as much as forty or fifty million in the years since the war and the buyers who are now on their visit to Leningrad for fur buying may be expected to make this year's purchases of Communist furs just as high as ever. The Soviets are cunning enough to make the most of the American woman's penchant for nice things—and the many furs sold in this country as luxuries are conceivably straight from a fur farm in Siberia maintained by Soviet slave labor. Thus, the United States has been unable to bring about any corrections of forced labor through the United Nations, even though the A. F. of L. has made comprehensive surveys of slave labor in the Soviet Union and has demanded that the other nations compel Moscow to live up to the Charter of the UN.

And second, the American fur farmer, including those disabled GI's who went into fur farming on the advice of the Veterans' Administration, find it impossible to compete with the government-controlled forced labor of Russia, and third, the excess American dollars which Soviet Russia obtains are important in financing the subversive activities of Communists in this country.

The American people are entitled to know that Communist activities and Soviet slave labor is being supported by the dollars paid for these Russian exports. And the Washington officials responsible cannot claim ignorance of the situation, for the protests have been made in Congress and to the responsible Government departments. The laws of this country, by the way, are emphatic in prohibiting the importation of goods produced by slave or forced labor. Evidence in the hands of the American Federation of Labor—and evidence which has been presented before the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations—proves conclusively that slave labor camps are a most important part of the economy of Soviet Russia.

The procrastination on the part of Washington officials is certainly part and parcel of program of those who have fashioned policy during the past number of years which would be favorable to the Soviet Union, even if at the expense of the United States.

That's the top of the news as it looks from here.

"From Korea Comes Word of the Daily Wonders Being Worked by Close Air Support of Ground Troops, Teamwork Which Is Fast Making the 'Gravel Crunchers' and the 'Fly-Fly Boys' Brothers Under the Skin"—Battle Report, Washington

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, again last Sunday evening, the American people were given a realistic insight into the affairs of their Government in Washington, D. C.—again John Steelman, assistant to the President of the United States, presented the third in the series of teledocumentaries to explain to millions of Americans within the scope of the medium of television, just what the problems are that are confronting the country and just what gave rise to the present international crises.

Mr. Speaker, more important still, in this telecast, Battle Report, Washington, John Steelman and the National Broadcasting Co. are bringing to Americans everywhere a graphic pictorialization of what the top-flight officials of Government as a whole, as well as in part, are doing to meet these problems.

Mr. Speaker, I know of no agency of Government, research institutes, or any other type of private concern in these United States that is making a greater contribution to the vast problem of informing our people as to current affairs than the National Broadcasting Co. is doing in projecting this series of broadcasts.

I am given to understand that the NBC, without a cent of expense to the Government and to produce this program, alone contributes the services of more than 50 NBC employees to work on, build up, and project this half-hour Sunday evening program, averaging 14 hours each day. This is exclusive of the manpower and hours used by the wonderfully cooperative and selfless public officials who appear on the show.

The show is definitely a must for all Americans—completely frank, unbiased, bipartisan, it is a news event broadcasted by Video by Americans and for Americans.

It is written by NBC's top script writer, Lou Hazam, produced by Ted Ayers, NBC's star news broadcaster. Its commentary is by Robert McCormick, favorably known to all of us on the Hill as one of the Nation's top radio and TV commentators.

Add to the skills, scientific, technical, literary, and dramatical ability of these men, the services of their eminent electronic engineers, artists, and directors, and one gets a full realization of the contributions that the National Broadcasting Co. is making to this Nation, become crystal clear.

Mr. Speaker, in projecting this program, Dr. John Steelman is bending over backward to see that the public is fully informed of what must be done, what can be done, and, most of all, just what is being done by the Government and the people in this tense situation.

He appears each week on this program and does so in addition to and in the midst of many other pressing worries, of which the long arduous hours of seemingly endless conferences with respect to the rail strike is but one example.

It is the purpose of Mr. Steelman and the National Broadcasting Co. to call upon all Federal agencies from time to time to contribute their share of information to our people on all pertinent activities. While the cost to NBC is high, my good friend, Mr. Joseph McConnell, president of the network, is doing the program gratefully because, splendid American that he is, he feels that an informed American public is a victorious American pubic.

The program was as follows:

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON

(Production, Ted Ayers; script, Lou Hazam; commentary, Robert McCormick; film, NBC, Marine Corps, and Department of Defense; technical director, Sherman Hildreth; scenery and sets, Edward Camp, and graphic work, Joseph Ferrier.)

(Guests: John Steelman, assistant to the President; Sgt. Frank Collins; Dr. Richard Melling; Maj. Gen. Merwin Silverthorn, United States Marine Corps; Brig. Gen. Jerry Jerome, United States Marine Corps.)

Mr. MCCORMICK. This Sunday in Korea, bombs celebrated the war's 2-month birthday. For a teledocumentary report from the men spearheading our defense, NBC once again turns its cameras upon the Nation's Capitol.

And from Washington comes report from the headquarters of our Army, Navy, and Air Force—whose field of battle in Korea finds Americans holding down a front line 5,000 miles from home.

Waiting to lead off our teledocumentary this ninth Sunday of the Korean conflict is John R. Steelman, who most recently has been engaged with still another conflict at home. To wit, the Nation-wide railroad strike which could easily have brought to a standstill all rail movement of war materials on the continent north of the Rio Grande—remember '47?

For his personal report on where we now stand in this crisis, here is the man who literally struggled hundreds of hours to keep the railroads of this Nation in operation—Dr. John Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. Good evening ladies and gentlemen. As all of you know, at 4 o'clock this afternoon, eastern standard time, the Government took over the operation of most of the Nation's railroads. I deeply regret this action had to be taken in the public interest and am glad that, in our democracy, such action is a rare occurrence. During the past 3 weeks, I have spent about 125 hours with the representatives of the railroads and the two unions which are involved. In addition, both parties have spent many more hours conferring with their associates. Up to the present time, no agreement has been reached, but, of course, some of these days, one will be—and the railroads will be returned to private operation.

We are grateful that we live in a country where disagreements between workers and employers can be decided at the conference table—where men can meet each other as equals, and in most instances, reach agreement without disruption of production or service. In nations where tyranny rules, such negotiations would be called a waste of time. There would be nothing but a curt order—with prisons or a firing squad awaiting all who did not obey. The freedom and dignity of man is unimportant—the state and the tyrant all suffer. The American way is possible only in a Nation of freemen.

Now to another subject: In spite of the fact that men all over the world hate war and dream of peace, wars will be a constant danger until tyranny disappears from the face of the earth. In our imperfect world, all we can do is to continue to work for peace. But if war comes—as it has come in Korea, we must spare nothing which will make it less tragic.

Tonight I want to take you on still another visit with Government officials from whom you will learn about some of the things your Government is doing to lighten the burden of war. Two general officers of the Marine Corps will tell you how marines are taught to take care of themselves—how they are supplied the best in armament—and the best in food—and what they are doing in Korea. One of the world's outstanding physicians, who directs all the medical activities of the armed services, will tell you how your fighting men are protected from disease under appalling conditions—and how they are restored to health if they are wounded. A fighting GI who is now a patient in Walter Reed Army Hospital will tell you of his personal experiences—and how his life was saved.

All these men are engaged in the battle to preserve your freedom—each in his own sphere. And, back of them, are all the agencies of your Government. For your freedom—the freedom of every citizen is regarded as his most precious possession. With freedom to think—to act—and to do the things each man can do best, we have the foundation for a world of plenty—and of peace.

Mr. McCORMICK. In sharp contrast with the strike front, Mr. Steelman reports in America, are the wounded now being returned home from the battlefront. Meet Sgt. Frank Collins of New Hampshire.

Sergeant COLLINS. I was hit late in the afternoon somewhere in Korea. I got hit with an automatic weapon of some kind. After I got hit, I sat down in a rice paddy, started hollering for a medic. There was no medic around. I sat there about 20 minutes and one of the boys from the outfit came along and put a torniquet on my arm. After that he helped me back behind the line. He took me back and we picked up a jeep. The jeep took me to the battalion-aid station. Stayed there 15 minutes and they gave me a hypo. After that, an ambulance took us back to the clearing station. Stayed at the clearing station about 3 hours; they gave me a shot of penicillin and another hypo. Took another ambulance to the evacuation station Stayed there overnight; took a train from there into Pusan. Operated on in Pusan; put a cast on me, and from Pusan took a boat to Fukuoka. Stayed there overnight; gave me penicillin. Took an airplane to Osaka. Stayed there 9 days and they changed casts and gave me a lot more penicillin. After that we took a train to Tokyo General Hospital. Got there at night. They said we would be air-lift to the United States the next day.

Mr. McCORMICK. At Washington's Walter Reed Hospital, medical men are amazed at the fine condition in which the wounded—like Sgt. Frank Collins, are being returned from a battle-front environment said to be about the worst ever encountered by an American fighting force. The secret—speedy air-evacuation of the injured. And waiting before our cameras now is the Defense arm's top director of medical services, the "Father of Air Evac"—Dr. Richard L. Melling.

Dr. MELLING. These fighting men wounded in Korea are on the road to recovery today because the American people have provided the best military medical care available. One of the most important parts of our medical service is the system of air transportation of patients, which we call "air evacuation."

Helicopters and small planes bring many of the patients to the field hospitals in Korea. Those requiring special treatment are placed aboard planes bound for Japan. For those requiring more than 4 months' hospitalization our largest and most comfortable planes wing them across the Pacific, first for an overnight stop at the big Army hospital in Honolulu and then to the air base at Fairfield, California. From this air base they are then sent to the Army, Navy, and Air Force hospitals throughout the United States.

Our air evacuation system is a true example of American teamwork in action. Secretary of Defense Johnson established this system throughout the Armed Forces last October. Air Force and Navy flight surgeons, nurses and technicians attend the patients while en route. The Military Air Transport Service, the Air Force, the Navy, and the Marine Corps fly the planes. Army, Navy and Air Force hospitals are used jointly, regardless of the uniform of the patient, both at home and overseas.

Men severely wounded in Korea often are back in the United States within 10 to 12 days. Last week in an Air Force hospital in Texas, I visited a patient who had been wounded in Korea just 7 days before. In spite of his wounds and with almost 8,000 air miles behind him, he was in excellent spirits and making a fine recovery.

Here are the pictures to show you what I mean.

Mr. McCORMICK. Somewhere in Korea—South Koreans spread out the parachute of an American pilot injured as he parachuted to earth, in order to guide a helicopter ambulance signaled by radio.

The pilot is carried out of a rice paddy and placed aboard the helicopter which flies him to a point behind the lines.

Here the pilot is transferred to a plane which will speed him to prompt medical attention.

Dr. MELLING. That gives you a quick glimpse into the way the air evacuation system operates. Behind the scenes, of course, has been a great deal of planning over a long period of time. As the Chief Air Evacuation Officer in World War II, I learned first hand the multitude of problems which had to be solved to make this system work. As Director of Medical Services today, I have seen these problems overcome and the entire operation modernized. I know from personal experience that, to give this kind of medical support to our fighting forces, many people in the armed services, medical and line, must pull together. Because they did pull together, this air evacuation team was ready when South Korea was invaded.

Incidentally, let's clear up one point regarding casualties in Korea. General MacArthur's Chief Surgeon, Major General Hume, reports that the death rate in military hospitals from battle wounds has been the lowest of any similar military campaign in our Nation's history. You should know, too, that the newest approved drugs and equipment are on hand. Supplementing the blood program of General MacArthur's command, we launched this morning our first regular air shipment of blood to Korea. This blood, donated by patriotic Americans, is collected by hospitals, medical centers and blood banks throughout the country. The American National Red Cross now coordinates the procurement of blood for the Armed Forces and a schedule has been set up for shipping blood to the men in Korea. Maintaining that schedule depends on your donations of blood at the center in your community.

I bring you this brief report tonight to let you know that the men in combat are closely supported by the finest medical service which a grateful Nation can provide.

Mr. McCORMICK. The United States marines—justly famous from the halls of Montezuma to the shores of Tripoli. When word came out that the Marines had landed in Korea, one noted cartoonist captured the thrill that ran through the Nation when he drew John Q. Public beaming "I feel better already." (To show you why there is cause for optimism where the marines are concerned.) "Battle Report, Washington" invites two top-notch marines to report to you today. First, Maj. Gen. Merwin H. Silverthorn, Director of the Marine Corps Reserve, formerly Chief of Staff, Fleet Marine Force, Pacific, and Third Amphibious Corps, World War II. For the facts then, on the readiness of the marines still at home, and how soon we may expect to see more "leathernecks" in action—here is a sure-fire "leatherneck" himself, General Silverthorn.

General SILVERTHORN. For the fifth time in the 174 years of Marine Corps history, marines have landed in Korea. Once again "leathernecks" all over the world are squaring away their gear and putting on their packs.

We are mobilizing our Organized Reserves. We are authorized to mobilize our Volunteer Reserve. Of our Volunteer reservists we first plan to put all sergeants and below back into uniform. Only 2,650 Volunteer officers will be ordered to active duty at this time—for the most part only captains and below. A limited number of field officers and senior noncommissioned officers in critical specialties will be needed. For those others—all I can say right now is, "Take off your pack for the present, but we may need you later."

One of the most encouraging things we have experienced is the tremendous response we have received from our Organized and Volunteer Reserves. Hundreds of letters have poured into headquarters from reservists requesting immediate active duty—most of them specifically request duty in Korea. Eighty-nine percent of the officers and men in the Organized units were mobilized with their units.

To you parents, wives, and sweethearts, let me say this: It has always been and is today the policy of the Marine Corps not to send marines into combat without thorough and complete training. We have always prided ourselves on the training we give each individual marine; he is trained to be a fighting man—self-reliant, with an ability to take care of himself and his shipmates. It is because of this training that the Marine Corps was and is ready. In Korea our marines are ready with close air support—with their helicopters, their 3½-inch bazookas, their new flame throwers, and their General Pershing tanks—the latest type of equipment—the same equipment that has been used in our peacetime training program. Although our recognized mission is to train marines for amphibious operations, it is to be noted that our training is entirely suitable for normal land warfare as evidenced by the present use of our troops in Korea.

To give you an idea of our readiness, let me give you some figures—figures which I am releasing tonight for the first time. A sampling of the thousands of Organized reservists called to active duty shows 51 percent are available for immediate assignment to combat duty, 28 percent will require only short refresher and reconditioning training, and only 21 percent must be sent to basic recruit training.

In our rapid build-up of marines in Korea, a movement in which our far-flung Fleet Marine Forces were readily concentrated in a threatened area, we owe a great deal to the Navy for its ever-ready ships and to the Military Air Transport Service for flying over key Marine Corps personnel.

The Marine Corps has called in its reserve fire power—but we still need more. Our most urgent problem today is for red-blooded young men who want to be a part of this Marine Corps team.

Mr. McCORMICK. From Korea comes word of the daily wonders being worked by close air support of ground troops, teamwork which is fast making the gravel crunchers and the fly-fly boys—to borrow a phrase from Kipling—brothers under the skin. Blasting a niche in combat history for themselves, in this respect, are the Marine Corsairs at the battle front. And less than an hour ago, it was announced by Marine Corps headquarters here, that an old hand at this sort of game—Brig. Gen. Jerry Jerome—will become director of marine aviation and assistant commandant for air. Because he can tell you how the Marine Cosairs are lending precious close support to our Ground Forces in Korea, we now focus our cameras upon Gen. Jerry Jerome.

General JEROME. The primary mission of Marine Corps aviation is to support the ground units of the Fleet Marine Forces in amphibious operations. One of their most important jobs is therefore, of course, close air support. To do this job, our officer and enlisted pilots are trained and equipped to operate from both aircraft carriers and land bases. Our Marine aircraft are now operating in Korea from Navy aircraft carriers.

I would like to tell you a few things about our pilots in Korea. I know most of the pilots personally from our service together in the South Pacific and Philippines during the past war and at the Marine Corps schools at Quantico, Va., after the war.

Practically every one of those pilots are battle-trained. Since the war they have been continuously schooled, both formally and practically, in working with ground troops of our Fleet Marine Forces. They know the man on the ground they are working with and what he is up against. Conversely, and very important, is the fact that the man on the ground knows the pilot and what he is capable of. I call it the "Bill and Joe team." Bill on the ground—Joe in the air.

Bill knows that when he is up against a strong position, Joe can take it out for him—or at least beat the enemy down until Bill can get on top of him with his infantry weapons. Joe also knows that he is flying and operating mighty close to Bill. Joe must put his machine gun fire, his bomb, rocket or napalm right on the target or he may do irreparable damage to our own troops. I've referred to this type of flying through the years as pickle-barrel bombing.

By pickle-barrel bombing, I mean that the target is usually relatively small—a tank, mortar position, or artillery piece—in fact it's no larger than a pickle barrel. The object is to put the pickle—be it bomb, rocket, or napalm—squarely in the barrel. If you do, Joe helps Bill. If you don't—it may be disastrous.

I like to quote my very good and admired friend, Gen. Robert E. Eichelberger, United States Army, of the effectiveness of this type support—a statement which he made as a result of our work for him in the Philippines during the past war.

I quote: "Nothing comforts a soldier more, ankle-deep in mud, faced by a roadblock or fortified strongholds, as much as the sight of bombs wreaking havoc on stubborn enemy positions."

Bill and Joe know the game—they have practiced it for years.

Now again in Korea, Bill and Joe are putting their practice to good use—and they are doing it for keeps.

There are a lot of Marine Corps Joes and Bills fighting out there in Korea today. But we still need more—a lot more—to meet our authorized strength. We need young men who can be trained to do Joe's and Bill's jobs tomorrow.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Now for a cameraman's eye view of the war.

Seven days ago, for the first time since war erupted in Korea, B-29's were out in mass on a tactical strike. At the signal "bombs away" some 100 Superforts of the Far Eastern Air Force Bomber Command poured 1,000 tons of explosives upon Communist positions west of the Naktong River, near Maegwan. With the precision for which they are famous the bombers saturated an area scarcely larger than 3 by 7 miles, dropping 500-ton bombs like rain. Everything went according to Air Force plan—a bombing pattern that assured one bomb to each 5 acres. The smoke rising from below gave witness to the destruction they reaped—echoing the days the heavies saved the beachhead at Anzio and sparked the break-through at St. Lo. But in spite of it all, within the next 24 hours, the enemy was pressing a new offensive through this very area smashed by the superforts.

You are now on a strafing mission in a fast-rooming jet plane. As the battle front unfurls below you, you go to work on the targets that leap into view. Field installations come in for their share of your poison. Now you "lay to" on the roads winding ahead, going after any moving object that will aid and abet the enemy. Here's a train deep in enemy territory—probably moving men and war material vital to the Reds. You start at one end and go right down the line—giving it everything you've got. Now up and away for a look at the damage you've done. All in a day's work. In the life of a jet pilot in Korea anyway.

Most bitter of the week's stories to come from the war front is the massacre of American soldiers that took place on hill 303. It began when an American platoon mistook North Koreans for South Korean reinforcements they had requested. Forced to surrender to their captors who outnumbered them 10 to 1, the soldiers had their hands bound behind them with their own shoelaces, were then marched to a cemetery and shot down in cold blood. The bodies were discovered and removed by United States troops who later advanced up the slope. There were three survivors; one was Roy Manring, 18, of Chicago, who rubbed blood from his leg onto his face and lay under one of his dead buddies, pretending to be dead himself. When the Communists moved on he made his way to his own troops and later identified some of the Red killers among captured North Koreans. Thirty-three Americans met brutal death in this massacre, and promptly, 2 days later, General MacArthur sent this stern warning to the North Korean Premier: "I shall hold you and your commanders criminally accountable."

Thus the Nation, America—as top defense officials have come before you to report—moves into the ninth week of war in Korea. And the latest headlines that are like the pulsebeat of that war.

Let's Eliminate Aliens From the Count in Reapportioning Congress

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 7, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the American people are now realizing what a farce this so-called census has been.

Instead of confining themselves to what the Constitution intended, they undertook to make it a questionnaire that touched everything except the main issue. As a result the census is a farce, especially in certain States.

In Corinth, one of the leading cities in my district, the preliminary survey shows 230 families that were not even consulted.

In Itawamba County where there is not a vacant house, they report the loss of 400 inhabitants. They now propose to take representation away from such States as Mississippi, Pennsylvania, and others, give it to a gang of aliens who are not entitled to vote in this country, many of them here in violation of law, and plotting the overthrow of our Government. I am going to oppose any reapportionment under that so-called census, and I am going to demand that new censuses be taken, and that aliens be eliminated from the count when we reapportion Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Where Is Our Stockpile?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am today calling upon the Armed Services Committee to institute an investigation of the lack of American stockpiles of critical minerals and metals.

It is necessary to only read the production and consumption figures on metals in this country to come to the conclusion that we are deficient in some fields and, very likely, have no reserves whatever in others.

What are our reserves today in manganese, in chrome, in lead, in mica, and in many other minerals?

Why are not the low-grade chrome mines in Montana being put into production now? The Government spent $20,000,000 to develop the Mouat and Benbow properties during the war but has done nothing since to maintain production. Why? The manganese reserves in Montana and Arizona are not being worked at anywhere near capacity even though, domestically, we produce only 10 percent of our needs.

Where will our steel mills be if they do not have the chrome and manganese necessary to harden and refine the iron ore? We all know the answer to this, and if these deficiencies are not met by stockpiling, it will mean that both our peace and war economy will be seriously hindered.

In July 1946, Congress passed the Stockpiling Act and stated that the Munitions Board, over a 5-year period, should acquire the necessary critical metals to cover our minimum requirements. In July 1950, 4 years after the act was passed, we had on hand only 38.4 percent of our minimum requirements. The money has been appropriated to fulfill the requirements of the act but the deficiencies have not been met.

I have mentioned, specifically, manganese and chrome because we have the reserves in these metals in my State of Montana and because I know something about them. Private enterprise is unable to develop these deposits because they are low grade in character and can become workable only if the Government will step into the picture and subsidize the working of them. The stake may well be the security of our country and the solution can be found only in a premium-price payment plan or outright Government subsidy.

I am not in favor of Government subsidies, in general, but I know of no other way at this time to fulfill our needs. It is far better to do this than to depend on foreign imports of critical metals which can, in time of war, be shut off by submarine warfare.

With these comments in mind, I am today calling for a congressional investigation by the Armed Forces Committee to find out why we are still deficient in critical metals under the Stockpiling Act.

Twenty-third National Convention of the Fleet Reserve Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Samuel Rose, Chief, Central Office Contact Division, before the Twenty-Third National Convention of the Fleet Reserve Association at Long Beach, Calif., Saturday, September 2, 1950. Mr. Rose's ability and consistent helpfulness to many Members of the House is well known, and I therefore heartily commend to my colleagues his address.

In extending sincere greetings to the Fleet Reserve Association on the occasion of your twenty-third national convention, I can assure you that I speak with a feeling of heartfelt warmth.

As official representative of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Carl R. Gray, Jr., I bring to you the assurance of his deep interest in the constructive work your organization is performing for veterans and their dependents. Administrator Gray wants you to know that he regrets that the pressure of official duties makes it impossible for him to attend your convention. He asked me to present his most cordial wishes for a successful get-together.

I bring with me also the pleasant feeling that comes when a person is fortunate enough to be able to revisit old and valued friends.

Mr. La Belle, your able national president, is an old friend of mine. Mr. Lofgren, your national secretary, has brought his good-natured and jovial smile many times to my office in Washington, where I have had the pleasure of working with him in the interests of your shipmates. It's good also to see and to talk with Mr. Pyle, your financial secretary, and Mr. Cronan, your national treasurer.

More than 6 years ago the GI bill became law. During those 6 years about 7,000,000 veterans have, at one time or another, attended school or trained on-the-job or on-the-farm under the GI bill. The cost for tuition, supplies, and subsistence allowances exceeds $10,000,000,000.

During that same 6-year period more than $11,000,000,000 of GI loans were obtained by more than 2,000,000 World War II veterans. The real value of this benefit for veterans during those hectic years of readjustment may be inferred from the fact that 92 percent of those GI loans were for homes.

Incidentally, veteran borrowers have proved beyond the shadow of any doubt that they are good financial risks. Only seven-tenths of 1 percent of GI loans were defaulted to the extent that VA had to make good the guaranteed and insured portions.

GI insurance is another program that testifies to the prudence, the foresight and the stability of veterans. About 6,000,000 national service life insurance policies are now in force. They represent about $36,000,000,000 of protection.

These encouraging facts offer proof that veterans can be trusted to use their opportunities wisely. There can be no doubt, that the welfare of veterans and their families is synonymous with the welfare of our Nation. Our debt to these men can never be repaid. Benefits to them are an investment in a whole generation of Americans. They are an investment in America itself.

I want to leave with you, if I may, one final thought, a most important one in this year of 1950 for all Americans, both veterans and nonveterans.

I have mentioned some of the billions of dollars spent to promote the readjustment of veterans. But money spent to help repair the consequences of war is a mere pittance compared with what we in America shall have to spend, if we permit our Nation to become soft and helpless in the face of deliberate Communist aggression.

Ware have enduring consequences. The VA has just recently closed its books on the War of 1812. VA is still taking care of surviving dependents of the men who fought in the Mexican War—and that war ended more than 100 years ago. More than 3,000,000 compensation and pension checks go out monthly to veterans and dependents on VA rolls.

That's why I ask you to think about this: The money we spend in increasing our industrial output, in making our country too tough and virile for any police state on earth to risk a sneak attack—that's not even properly classed as an expense. It's a gilt-edged investment—a guaranty of democratic freedom, of a just and durable peace.

Now, as never before, America's productive output must be maintained and increased. Now, as never before, every American who's ready and willing to work should be given a job.

Only by working as Americans, for America, can we face a ruthless enemy with the calm assurance that comes from a positive knowledge of our own material and moral strength.

In this task for 1950 and the years ahead it goes without saying, I am sure, that there will be, as always, 100 percent participation by the Fleet Reserve Association. We deeply appreciate your wholehearted cooperation and understanding of the many problems confronting the Veterans' Administration. Thank you.

Townsend Club National Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from an address I made at the Townsend Club national convention, at Denver, Colo., on June 1, 1950:

It is a privilege and pleasure to speak to this fine group of men and women. I appreciate the opportunity which you have so graciously extended to me.

I wish to pay tribute to your leader, our good friend, Dr. Townsend, who has done so much for the older people of this Nation. He has given untiringly of his time and effort in behalf of those who are growing older and facing retirement after long years of active participation in our ever-expanding national life.

Despite hardship and adversity, Dr. Townsend has fought for the security and welfare of our aged citizens. At many times, the path has been dark and obstacles have been purposely thrown in his way. But with determination and courage he has fought on and has had the support and conviction of an ever-growing band of men and women who also have given unstintingly to help in the great cause of pension or insurance for our aged.

In our national history, there have been many leaders like Dr. Townsend who have battled for what seemingly were lost causes. But in the end they have triumphed. Remember the early struggles for free education and the efforts to establish a postal service, both of which we enjoy today. William Lloyd Garrison comes to mind when we think of leaders who faced overwhelming odds to achieve success. Roger Williams is another of our famous countrymen who was subjected to bitter and unrelenting attacks before he finally accomplished the high ideals and purposes which were part of his basic social philosophy, the freedom of religious ideals.

Many of the objectives for which these men fought are now law. This same thing is true concerning pension or insurance plans for our aged. There was a time when Dr. Townsend's proposal was challenged and held up to ridicule, but now we are finding that it is being discussed and accepted as a reasonable and sound method for aiding our Nation's senior citizens. In many instances, it is pointed out as a more beneficial and helpful program than that which has actually been incorporated into the laws of our land. Dr. Townsend, first of all made us pension-conscious. Under our free enterprise system, many of his proposals have been accepted and offered to the public in voluntary programs, like the Blue Cross and similar health and benefit organizations. More clinics are available to care for the public. When our people are ill or infirm, increasing medical aid and care is available because of the force of the Townsend plan proposals and the demand of our people for adequate health facilities.

It occurs to me, that here is an excellent place to utilize the vast stores of surplus foods we have and are accumulating in this Nation, and under the existing farm programs Why not distribute this food to our needy, either on a give-away basis, or at low cost, to supplement their diet and augment the pensions they are receiving? I have advocated the distribution of this food abroad to the people who are hungry through Christian agencies, such as CARE and CROP, rather than let it go to waste or rot in the bulging storage bins and caves of the Nation. At home let us help replenish the family larders of families in need or pinching out a meager existence on the small pensions doled out by many States.

The Townsend plan offers an insurance program that is designed to help our aged citizens as well as promote business. Instead of it we have the present inadequate hodgepodge social-security program, that is inadequate, incomplete, and discriminatory.

The success of both public and private retirement plans depends on the extent to which such systems can be integrated with old age and survivors insurance. Employees would gain by old age and survivors insurance coverage in that deductions from their pay would be less, they would receive greater benefits for dependents and survivors, and in the event of a change of employers, they would still be covered by a retirement plan if their new employer were under the program. Should they still want their own private plan, to obtain benefits greater than old age and survivors insurance, their plan could be integrated with the Federal system, each plan paying part of the benefits. I am confident that ultimately the battle will be won for a sound national insurance plan within the framework of our American economic system. I know there is no question in your minds about the great wealth and strength of our economic system. It has its weaknesses. But in the long run, a quick comparison with any other nation shows us that we have as yet the best economic system any government has ever developed. That is the reason I am certain we can work out an insurance system for our senior citizens that will work and strengthen our economy.

On the basis of economics, Dr. Townsend's theory of pensions for all and the beneficiaries be required to spend monthly the money they receive strikes me as one of the most important features of the Townsend pension plan. The revolving circle of obtaining an insurance payment adequate to meet the current expenses of the home, and channeling this sum back into the regular markets, means stimulated business, the consumption of foodstuffs, and the utilization of our production machinery at its full capacity. What better program is there for an expanding America?

Instead of restricting these insurance plans, let us make them available for all the aged. This would eliminate the administrative red tape which has enveloped the present program to the extent that it is choking off the benefits intended. This is another important principle in the Townsend plan.

Persons living on pensions are among those hardest hit by inflation and high taxes. The value of the dollar must be sound if these persons are to survive the tidal wave of inflation. An insurance president recently pointed out the blight of cheap money and high taxes on insurance. A paid-up policy for $10,000 in 1940 is now worth only $6,000 to the widow. A typical policyholder now needs 70 percent more insurance to provide the same protection as in 1929. Think what that means to the IOU's for social security payments which the Government has placed in the Treasury against your money it has taken out to run our fiscal affairs.

In closing let me give you this word of warning: Guard against the watering of our American dollar. Hidden taxes and inflation can undermine our security and safety. Jefferson said we must make our choice "between economy and liberty or profusion and servitude." An adequate insurance program for our aged may well be the protecting economic cloak around the shoulders of our Government, which in the end could save us from economic chaos.

And I believe the majority of our people are coming around to the idea and necessity of junking the present Social Security System for a universal pay-as-you-go insurance plan taken out of current tax revenues. All can be accomplished, in my opinion, within the operation of our present economic system. Surely great credit is due our own Dr. Townsend for his untiring efforts in directing the thoughts of our Nation toward a correct and proper solution of this problem.

Place of Honor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, a thought which I entertained relating to the prime importance of the House of Representatives has been reduced to print by our esteemed friend, Bruce Barton, who as our former colleague left a record of great service to the people.

In his usual modest way, Mr. Barton sets forth the preeminence of the House of Representatives in a manner which anyone can understand. He rests his case upon proof obtained from the Constitution. Nothing could be more convincing or more easily understood. The article entitled "Place of Honor" appeared in the Washington Star on November 20, 1949.

I deem it worthy of preservation in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, especially so at this time of uncertainty and confusion fostered by the enemies of democracy:

PLACE OF HONOR

(By Bruce Barton)

To my horror, I discovered that a talented young friend, a college graduate, had never in his whole life read the Constitution of the United States.

Is there among my readers a single one similarly afflicted? If so, I beg him to sit down right now and make the acquaintance of what Gladstone described as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

The experience will bring at least one surprise. The Constitution does not start with a discussion of the powers and duties of the President, nor of the Senate, nor the Supreme Court.

Instead, it gives the place of honor to that body which we are apt to call the lower House, the House of Representatives.

Is this something that just happened? Believe me, our ancestors deliberately and solemnly planned it that way.

They mistrusted Presidents, being too painfully mindful of their experience with an English king. Edmund Burke had warned them that "the greater the power the more dangerous the abuse."

They had their doubts about the Senate; it might make itself a dam across the river of progress, like the House of Lords. And they had seen too many people jailed for political or religious beliefs to put their final trust in judges.

So they wrote a Constitution of checks and balances. And they gave to the House two mighty safeguards—control of the purse strings and the sole power of impeachment.

In order to keep the Congressman close to the people, they stipulated that he must go home and submit his record for appraisal, and himself for reelection, every 2 years.

So the House is the common man's own particular part of the Government, yours and mine—the very heart of our democracy. Whoever ignorantly abuses the House, or makes cheap cracks at Congressmen, or writes impatiently against the procedures set up to insure full hearings and adequate debate, is doing a thoughtless and dangerous thing.

Oswald Spengler's Decline of the West, published after the close of the First World War, contained some dire predictions, many of which have already proved terrifyingly true. One prediction was that parliaments everywhere would lose their authority.

In most of Europe parliaments have lost their authority. Only in the United States does the "people's House" hold fast its grip on the purse-strings and—weapon of final mastery—the power to impeach.

So before you throw a rock at Congress, stop and think: The House is your body, set up for your protection. It is the place where the common man can finally turn for relief when he is tired of having bureaucrats push him around. If ever it goes, freedom vanishes.

The 1950 Revenue Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I had assured Mr. Charles F. Wahl, who represents the Pacific Lock Operators Association, Masters, Mates and Pilots, Marine Engineers, Dredge Operators, Truck Drivers and Marine Dispatchers of the Panama Canal, that I would insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at the time of the consideration of the tax bill, a statement by him in regard to a certain portion of the tax bill. Inadvertently, I did not have an opportunity to present that statement and request that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. I now ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF CHARLES F. WAHL

The largest group of American citizens gathered together in one place in the Tropics in overseas service is on the Panama Canal. Forty-five hundred of these Americans are employees of the United States Government. These employees have made a career service of employment on the Panama Canal and Panama Railroad and enactment of section 216 subjecting them to income tax is inappropriate, inequitable, and not conducive to the efficient operation of the organization.

Reasons are given as follows:

1. RECUPERATIVE LEAVE

Panama Canal and Panama Railroad employees already are taxed a minimum of $1,000 per year for the privilege of being employed there because of the cost of taking necessary recuperative leave.

Because of the enervating effects of the tropics on the white man, medical authorities advise recuperative leave once a year, or at the least every 2 years.

The average amount of leave accumulated over a period of 2 years is 4 months.

This amount of recuperative leave is not granted because the United States Government is particularly fond of its employees in the Tropics, but because it is considered a minimum amount of time conducive to good health.

The cost of recuperative leave considering an average family of two adults and two children, 13 and 8 years old, traveling an average distance from the Canal Zone to Chicago. Many go to the west coast. Many go to the Southern States, but the average distance has been considered as Chicago.

Ship fare: Minimum employees' rate $40 times three and one-half fares times two for the round trip, plus $40 expenses and tips—$320.

Train fare $84.64 round trip plus $50 for meals and incidentals is $346.24. Total cost of getting employee and family to his home is $666.24. A round figure of $700 would be closer to a real figure and is an absolute minimum. If this family has saved $2,000 for a 4-month recuperative leave, this leaves them $1,300 to spend in 120 days, or approximately $10 per day for four people.

These employees are recruited from the working ranks, and the bulk of them are members of the mechanical crafts. I will use a boilermaker as an example. This man gets $2.16 per hour, or 25 percent over a base pay calculated on an average of nine navy yards, or an annual salary of $4,492. With tropical conditions this pay is not excessive. He would pay around $300 in income tax.

2. CAREER EMPLOYEES

Panama Canal employees are recruited on a career basis which is desirable for efficient operation of the organization.

The cost of recruiting a new employee is based on $1,800. This is the average to bring an employee and his family to the Canal Zone and return him to the United States upon termination of his service. Obviously, the tax measure as provided in section 216 of H. R. 8928 will not offset the cost of recruiting employees to fill the places of those who will find it necessary to completely reestablish themselves under new conditions. Housing conditions on the Isthmus are generally unfavorable. An employee is not permitted to own his home, purchase property or engage in business and when he does finally leave the Service to come back to the United States it is usually necessary to completely reestablish himself under new conditions. There are a number of conditions faced by these employees which sometimes are not understood by themselves until after long years of service and that is the remoteness from relatives and friends in the employee's home community in the States and from other desirable features of his natural residence.

3. TWENTY-FIVE PERCENT DIFFERENTIAL

Yes, most employees of the Panama Canal and Railroad get a 25-percent differential over moderate rates derived from bases within the continental limits of the United States. This accompanied with application of section 251, Internal Revenue Code, has been considered highly desirable for the attracting of qualified employees.

Always in connection with discussion of income tax for employees on the Panama Canal, the question of the 25-percent differential comes up. When you consider the average annual pay of an average worker, such as the boilermaker mentioned in item 1, it will be noted that even with the 25-percent differential and the partial exemption from income tax, the rates of pay are not excessive. Actually, the 25-percent differential is a restrictive law passed during the early days of construction of the Canal when an investigating commission found that the rates of pay being paid were out of all proportion to those existing for comparable work in the United States. They recommended a limitation of 25 percent. As an inducement to recruiting, many individuals look on this differential as a stimulation for employment. However, when you consider the factors of employment from a total viewpoint, it is impossible under existing law to pay these employees what they are entitled to for this career service in the tropics with the United States Government.

4. HEALTH CONDITIONS

Yes, health conditions are good, only because of the excellent service of the Health Department. Continual warnings are issued requesting employees to report to dispensaries or hospitals at the slightest physical change.

It should be borne in mind that these employees of the United States Government are working practically at sea level and only 9 degrees north of the equator. The tropical climate in the Canal Zone has uniform high temperature, high relative humidity and excessive sunlight. The enervating climate with its depressing effects on the white man, plus the many other ever-present hazards to health, have long been studied and recognized by health authorities. That the climate in Panama, despite the excellent efforts of the Health Department, is a continuing threat to the health of the residents of the Canal Zone, is proven by a statement from the then Surgeon General of the Army in 1934.

The Economy Act of 1932 extended the tour of duty in the tropics of the military services from 2 to 3 years. The resulting illness, insanity, and lowering of morale terminated in a frantic effort in 1934 to restore the 2-year term of duty which had previously been in effect. The then Surgeon General of the Army testified before the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, on S. 3340 and S. 3397, bills to amend the laws relating to the length of tours of duty in the tropics, etc.

This testimony was given on April 30, 1934, and is quoted as follows—page 5:

"General PATTERSON. * * * I have served in Hawaii and I have been in Panama several times, and Puerto Rico, and my own judgment is, from observation of officers and enlisted men, I will say, it is poor economy on the part of the Government to require them to stay more than 2 years except for important reasons in the public interest.

"A man rapidly gets back to his normal condition after 2 years, but the longer you keep him over that period—it just takes that much longer for him to get back his normal efficiency after he returns to the home country, and some of them, especially the older men—I think it takes much longer to get back. Now, there are some circumstances which indicate that when you take the admission rates for all cases, except injuries, that is, for disease only, it shows that the rate over, we will say, in 1931, the rate was higher in Panama than anywhere. It was next higher in China; next higher in the Philippines, and Hawaii, and the United States holds the best health record. Over a period of 10 years in the Surgeon General's report, for 1932, on page 26, there is shown a graph which shows the rate over that period of time and you see that the Philippine Islands and Panama stood away above everything else. That is for disease only. The rate has not been shown for China, because we have only been there relatively a short while, but the rate for China is not quite as bad as Panama, but worse than the Philippines."

5. WAR ZONE

Men fighting in Korea have been exempted from income tax. This is only just. However, the Panama Canal can be a war zone. Thirteen Canal employees were killed on the Zone under war conditions during the last war.

During World War II a naval patrol plane leaving on its morning hunt for submarines off the Atlantic side of the Panama Canal crashed into a Panama Canal tow boat, killing the master of the tug, chief engineer, a Panama Canal pilot, and two Panama Canal seamen. Another incident occurred at the Pacific entrance when a tugboat towing a mud scow through the channel hit a loose mine, killing the master of the tug and seven Panama Canal seamen. These casualties were directly part of the war and there was no extra compensation provided for the families except that granted by existing injury compensation laws. An attempt was made to have legislation passed which would give the families of such employees additional compensation. This legislation failed A forecast of the future can quite rightly consider the Panama Canal as a war area because any nation considering the contributions made by the Panama Canal toward winning the war in the Pacific will, of necessity, move toward its destruction.

With regard to the two tugs, they were a total loss.

6. CONTRACTORS

Contractors and employees would still get benefit of section 251 with appropriations of $70,000,000 for construction of quarters approved.

The Congress has provided for a $70,000,000 housing construction program to spread out over a period of years. This work, presumably, will be done by contractors. Under section 216 of the bill before Congress, only Government employees who are United States citizens will be required to pay income tax. Section 251 will still apply to contractors and their employees. When the writer was persuading the Treasury Department in 1942 to write a recommendation to the Senate Finance Committee to restore section 251, a similar situation existed and the statement was made by a representative of the Treasury that those are just the people we are trying to get—meaning the contractors and not the working employees of the United States Government.

Coolidge Said Nation Secure When Decisions Are by True Majority

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the Nation is approaching one of the most important elections in the history of this Republic. The outcome is a matter of concern to every citizen. Some months ago I expressed the opinion that "the only issues which really matter in 1950 are those which will determine whether the United States itself will survive."

Opinions will differ on issues. How then can we be sure that the right decision will be made? Calvin Coolidge gave us the answer in an address to the Nation on the eve of the national election of November 4, 1924.

TEXT OF THE COOLIDGE ADDRESS

(The then President Coolidge said:)

The institutions of our country rest upon faith in the people. No decision that the people have made in any great crisis has ever shown that faith in them has been misplaced. It is impossible to divorce that faith which we have in others from the faith which we have in ourselves. The right action of all of us is made up of the right action of each one of us. Unless each of us is determined to meet the duty that comes to us, we can have no right to expect that others will meet the duties that come to them. Certainly we cannot expect them so to act as to save us from the consequences of having failed to act.

The immediate and pressing obligation for tomorrow is that each one of us who is qualified shall vote. That is a function which cannot be delegated, which cannot be postponed. The opportunity will never arise again. If the individual fails to discharge that obligation, the whole Nation will suffer a loss from that neglect.

America, more thoroughly than any other country, has adopted a system of self-government. Sometimes we refer to it as the rule of the people. Certainly it is a system under which there is every opportunity for self-government and every encouragement for the people to rule.

Ours has been described as a Government of public opinion. Of course, public opinion functions all the time. It no doubt has its influence on the actions of the executive and legislative branches of our Government, and even though it be imperceptible on any given occasion, it is probably, as time passes, reflected in the courts.

SELF-RULE DEPENDS ON BALLOT BOX

But all the influence of public opinion, all the opportunity for self-government through the rule of the people, depends upon one single factor. That is the ballot box.

If the time comes when our citizens fail to respond to their right and duty, individually and collectively, intelligently and effectively, at the ballot box on election day, I do not know what form of government will be substituted for that which we at present have the opportunity to enjoy, but I do know that it will not be a rule of the people; it will no longer be self-government.

The people of our country are sovereign. If they do not vote they abdicate that sovereignty and they may be entirely sure that if they relinquish it other forces will seize it, and if they fail to govern themselves some other power will rise up to govern them.

The choice is always before them—whether they will be slaves or whether they will be free. The only way to be free is to exercise actively and energetically the privileges and discharge faithfully the duties which make freedom. It is not to be secured by passive resistance. It is the result of energy and action.

To live up to the full measure of citizenship in this Nation requires not only action, but it require intelligent action. It is necessary to secure information and to acquire education. The background of our citizenship is the meeting house and the schoolhouse, the place of religious worship and the place of intellectual training.

But we cannot abandon our education at the schoolhouse door. We have to keep it up through life. A political campaign can be justified only on the ground that it enables the citizens to become informed as to what policies are best for themselves and for their country, in order that they may vote to elect those who from their past record and present professions they know will put such policies into effect.

The purpose of a campaign is to send an intelligent and informed voter to the ballot box. All the speeches, all the literature, all the organization, all the effort, all the time, and all the money, which are not finally registered on election day, are wasted.

"SHALL MINORITY RULE?"

We are always confronted with the question of whether we wish to be ruled by all the people or a part of the people, by the minority or the majority; whether we wish our elections to be dominated by those who have been misled, through the presentation of half truths, into the formation of hasty, illogical and unsound conclusions; or whether we wish those to determine the course of our Government who have through due deliberation and careful consideration of all the factors involved reached a sound and mature conclusion.

We shall always have with us an element of discontent, an element inspired with more zeal and knowledge. They will always be active and energetic, and they seldom fail to vote on election day. But the people at large in this country are not represented by them They are greatly in the minority. But their number is large enough to be a decisive factor in many elections, unless it is offset by the sober second thought of the people who have something at stake, whether it be earnings from investment or from employment, who are considering not only their own welfare but the welfare of their children and of coming generations.

SECURITY IN TRUE MAJORITY OPINION

Our institutions never contemplated that the conduct of this country, the direction of its affairs, the adoption of its policies, the maintenance of its principles, should be decided by a minority, moved in part by self-interest and prejudice. They were framed on the theory that decisions would be made by the great body of voters inspired by patriotic motives. Faith in the people does not mean in a part of the people. It means faith in all the people. Our country is always safe when decisions are made by a majority of those who are entitled to vote. It is always in peril when decisions are made by a minority.

QUOTES WASHINGTON ON WOMEN

Lately we have added to our voting population the womanhood of the Nation. I do not suppose that George Washington could be counted as one who would have favored placing upon the women of his time the duty and responsibility of taking part in elections. Nevertheless, he had such a deep realization of the importance of their influence upon public affairs at the time when we were adopting our Federal Constitution that he wrote to one of them as follows:

"A spirit of accommodation was happily infused into the leading characters of the continent and the minds of men were gradually prepared, by disappointment, for the reception of a good government. Nor could I rob the fairer sex of their share in the glory of a revolution so honorable to human nature, for, indeed, I think you ladies are in the number of the best patriots America can boast."

The praise of Washington was none too high. Without doubt the intuition of the women of his day was quick to reveal what a high promise the patriotic efforts of Washington and his associates held out for the homes and for the children of our new and unfolding Republic. What was then done by indirect influence is now possible through direct action.

The continuing welfare of the home, the continuing hope of the children, are no longer represented by an expectation. Experience has made them the great reality of America.

If the women of that day were willing to support what was only a vision, a promise, surely in this day they will be willing to go to the ballot box to support what has become an actual and permanent realization of their desires.

But the right to vote is conferred upon our citizens, not only that they may exercise it for their own benefit, but in order that they may exercise it also for the benefit of others.

Persons who have the right to vote are trustees for the benefit of their country and their countrymen. They have no right to say they do not care. They must care. They have no right to say that whatever the result of the election, they can get along. They must remember that their country and their countrymen cannot get along, cannot remain sound, cannot preserve its institutions, cannot protect its citizens, cannot maintain its place in the world, unless those who have the right to vote do sustain and do guide the course of public affairs, by the thoughtful exercise of that right on election day.

They do not hold a mere privilege to be exercised or not, as passing fancy may move them. They are charged with a great trust, one of the most important and most solemn which can be given into the keeping of an American citizen. It should be discharged thoughtfully and seriously, in accordance with its vast importance.

I therefore urge upon all the voters of our country, without reference to party, that they assemble tomorrow at their respective voting places, in the exercise of the high office of American citizenship; that they approach the ballot box in the spirit that they approach a sacrament, and there, disregarding all appeals to passion and prejudice, dedicating themselves truly and wholly to the welfare of their country, they make their choice of public officers solely in the light of their own conscience.

When an election is so held, when a choice is so made, it results in the real rule of the people, it warrants and sustains the belief that the voice of the people is the voice of God.

To my father, who is listening in in my old home in Vermont, and to my other invisible audience I say "Good night."

Boston and Our Boys

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Boston Sunday Herald, Boston, Mass.:

BOSTON ONE CITY THAT KEPT WELCOME OUT FOR SERVICEMEN

(By Paul Stevens)

Boston is one city in America that tries to treat the man in uniform right.

With the world situation once more heating up to a critical boil, Boston need not change its spots with a simper: "Welcome, serviceman." The serviceman knows he is welcome whether the world is shaking with war scare ague or not.

Any hint to the contrary brings a rise from Mrs. Thomas E. Cady, executive director of the Bay State Soldiers and Sailors Club on Boston Common. "We're no fair weather friends," she says, with black eyes snapping.

"Let's see," she said, thumbing through her files, "last year, long before there was any thought of trouble in Korea, we played host to 239,000 men in uniform."

MAGNIFICENT HOST

The club, any serviceman who has been there will tell you, plays host in a manner that is practically magnificent. Mrs. Cady and her staff arrange for free tickets to ball games and the movies, sew on buttons, wrap packages for mailing, find lodgings, stage nightly dances and make the man in uniform feel appreciated in a score of other ways.

Meanwhile, the Charlestown YMCA at City Square holds daily programs for servicemen. The building has 600 lockers where sailors can keep their civilian clothing. It has 170 dormitory rooms for servicemen, and provides an additional 165 cots for use on week ends. Members of a large girls' service organization serve as hostesses at dances 3 times a week.

All this takes on special significance in view of a recent survey made by This Week Magazine, supplement to the Sunday Herald, which shows that many American communities view the serviceman with indifference and even with open hostility.

"It is a sad commentary on our peacetime Army to note that American soldiers are treated better in foreign lands where they are stationed than they are in their own country," the author of the This Week piece states.

NATURAL MECCA

Mrs. Cady replies to this, "Well, then, Boston must be a foreign land." Without arguing down the author's general findings, she states that the writer couldn't truthfully cite Boston as an example of a community that had left the serviceman outside the door to its heart.

"I would have to remind him of the party at the Hotel Vendome last year for the men of the U. S. S. Fiske, and the party for the Kearsarge's crew at the Hotel Statler where 500 girls served as hostesses and 100 gallons of punch were served," she said.

Then there was the time when the club ran out of turkey dinners last Christmas and the Hotel Statler saved the day by sending over food from its own kitchens so speedily that the servicemen were not aware of any shortage.

The club, with its television set, snack bar, dance hall, lounges, and game room, is the natural mecca for lonely men away from home as surely as it was during World War II.

SIXTEEN THOUSAND, FIVE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIVE VISITS

Up to last Sunday night, servicemen had made 16,535 visits to the club in August alone. The figure will increase sharply as the draft gains momentum, and the club probably will expand into the adjoining Veterans Rehabilitation Division Building.

As an example of how servicemen are being cold-shouldered elsewhere, This Week tells of how a chaplain at the Brooklyn Navy Yard received a letter from a group aboard a cruiser requesting tickets for a Broadway show. The chaplain asked the management of the theater to reserve tickets—for which full prices would be paid—and got his written request back with the notation: "The war is over."

Contrasting with this, Boston theaters supply free passes to Mrs. Cady for distribution among servicemen. The Boston Braves allot her 250 passes to its ball games played here.

Tonight, the Boston Opera House will be thrown open to servicemen for a special, preview, free performance of the new Olsen and Johnson show, Pardon Our French.

HE IS OUR FRIEND

While Mrs. Cady and her work are sponsored by the public through its contributions to Community Services, this does not end civilian responsibility to the man in uniform. Boston can be proud, but it cannot be complacent, of its treatment of servicemen.

"An Army and Navy abandoned by the clergy, ignored by education, pilloried by the press, and forsaken by the civil community will inevitably degenerate professionally and rot morally," quote, Brig. Gen. Charles T. Lanham, former chief of Army Information, and Education Division.

This man in uniform—he is your boy, our friend, our neighbor.

Thad Stevens Versus God

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAM HOBBS
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, the pertinent parts of the first and the fourteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States, adopted respectively in 1791 and 1868, are:

The first:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

The fourteenth:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Vashti McCollum sought mandamus that would order the Champaign Board of Education to—

Adopt and enforce rules and regulations prohibiting all instruction in and teaching of all religious education in all public schools in Champaign District No. 71, * * * and in all public schoolhouses and buildings in said district when occupied by public schools.

The State of Illinois trial court denied her petition. The Supreme Court of Illinois affirmed the trial court's decision. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed and remanded to the State supreme court for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

On the day that the right to file an application for rehearing in the case of People of the State of Illinois ex rel. Vashti McCollum, appellant, against Board of Education of School District No. 71, Champaign County, Ill., et al., appellees, expired April 2, 1948, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in that case became the law of the land. In the 25 days immediately preceding, every effort had been made, and proved futile, to get such application filed by someone having that right. For the time being, the door of hope for judicial relief was closed. So resort was had to the Congress, and House Joint Resolution 364, Eightieth Congress, second session, was introduced proposing repeal of the fourteenth amendment.

This decision of the Supreme Court was of such transcendant importance as to shake the very foundations of our Government. Its ultimate dual effects were plain. It not only struck down our system of dual sovereignty, thereby sowing the seed of national destruction, but it also might mean the destruction of every landmark that indicates that ours is a Nation dedicated to God and freedom to worship Him.

In the Constitutional Convention of 1787 some 4 months of debate was required to settle the question of how the founding fathers could assure the perpetuity of the Government which they were designing "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty." They were greatly perturbed lest centralization of power should creep in and work its inevitable result—destruction. The certitude of such eventuality was clear as we refresh our memory from their wisdom. They knew full well that there must be created a government of checks and balances, with the powers of government brought as near to the sovereign people as possible, not concentrated in some distant national capital. They foresaw the fruitage of the truth written by Lord Acton: "All power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely." They also foresaw the growth and development of the infant Nation they were trying to protect. So they created a government with few essential powers, though enough to supply the deficiencies manifest in the Articles of Confederation. They struck the keynote, however, when they set up the system of dual sovereignty. All power came from the people, so each State was made supreme and omnipotent in its sphere, with only five generic powers entrusted to the National Government. All other powers were reserved to the States or to the people. This included all powers of police save only the single national police power to maintain itself, which, incidentally, carried with it the responsibility of defending every State.

The substance of the fourteenth amendment was first offered in the Constitutional Convention of 1787. It was then and there overwhelmingly rejected.

In 1866 it was proposed and submitted to the States for ratification. It was defeated again, although the Southern States were of course denied representation in the Congress and had no vote. Still they could not get the requisite number of States needed for ratification. But at the points of Federal bayonets and under the reconstruction acts disfranchising practically all native white voters, in 1868 a sufficient number of States ratified to make it a part of the Constitution. So, even in "the tragic era" it took bayonets to write it into our Constitution.

The prime purpose of the fourteenth amendment was, of course, in language attributed to Thad Stevens, "to keep a black heel on every white neck." In the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall. 81 (1872)) Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the Supreme Court, not only denied Federal intervention, but wrote:

We doubt very much whether any action of a State not directed by way of discrimination against the Negroes as a race, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision.

Again, in Strauder v. West Virginia (100 U. S. 306), the Court said:

This is one of a series of constitutional provisions having a common purpose, namely, securing to a race recently emancipated * * * all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy.

In his excellent work, The Fourteenth Amendment and the States, by Charles Wallace Collins, he says:

Although this race situation may be said to have been the immediate and proximate cause of the adoption of the amendment, as well as its immediate field of operation, in the mind of the radicals it had a much wider scope. To them it meant the ultimate centralization of power into the hands of the Federal Government. It meant the death knell of the doctrine of States' rights—the ultimate nationalization of all civil rights and the consequent abolition of State control over the private rights and duties of the individual. It meant the passing over of the police power of the State into the police power of the National Government, thereby giving the Congress undefined and unlimited powers whereby it would be enabled to enter fields of legislation from which hitherto it had been barred.

Yet, in spite of the fact that its main objective was so clear, after the first few cases reaching the Supreme Court had been decided little attention has been paid to the main purpose of its adoption and fewer than 5 percent of the cases interpreting the fourteenth amendment have even touched the race problem. Literally hundreds of cases have dealt exclusively with other matters, practically all, tax or corporated, under the due-process-of-law clause. It is interesting to note also that the States of the Confederacy have long since ceased to be the happy hunting ground at which the gun of the fourteenth amendment has been aimed. For a half century the fourteenth amendment in its prime purpose has been a dead letter.

But, although the fourteenth amendment had become a part of the Constitution of the United States—though unlawfully—the fight for further encroachment upon the power of the States went on. In 1876, in the Hayes-Tilden campaign, James G. Blaine, a leading Republican, offered a resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution reading as follows:

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 44th Cong., vol. 4, pt. I, p. 5580]

No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under any State. No public property, and no public revenue of, nor any loan of credit by or under the authority of, the United States, or any State, Territory, District, or municipal corporation, shall be appropriated to, or made or used for, the support of any school, educational or other institution, under the control of any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, or wherein the particular creed or tenets of any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination shall be taught; and no such particular creed or tenets shall be read or taught in any school or institution supported in whole or in part by such revenue or loan of credit; and no such appropriation or loan of credit shall be made to any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, or to promote its interests or tenets. This article shall not be construed to prohibit the reading of the Bible in any school or institution; and it shall not have the effect to impair rights of property already vested.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to provide for the prevention and punishment of violations of this article.

This was defeated.

The diminution of State power thus prevented, has now been imposed on the States by the decision of the Supreme Court in the McCollum case. The holding is to the effect that the fourteenth amendment had already imposed, in 1868, these very restrictions upon the States, and that the bitter fight of 1876 to submit the Blaine amendment was utterly unnecessary. It is passing strange that such able men as those who vigorously espoused the cause of this amendment of 1876 deemed that amendment absolutely necessary to overcome the absence of authority in the first amendment to prevent State contributions to religious education. They evidently thought it conclusive that the first amendment plus the fourteenth amendment prohibited nothing except laws favoring one religion over others. But more than 75 years after that bitter fight of 1876, where the Blaine resolution was made a national issue in one of the most bitterly-contested national elections ever held, the Supreme Court virtually writes the defeated Blaine amendment into the law of the land.

The Everson case (330 U. S. 1) was a 5-to-4 decision, holding:

It appears that these parochial schools met New Jersey's requirements. The State contributes no money to the schools. It does not support them. Its legislation, as applied, does no more than provide a general program to help parents get their children, regardless of their religion, safely and expeditiously to and from accredited schools.

There were two dissenting opinions by Mr. Justice Jackson and Mr. Justice Rutledge. Mr. Justice Frankfurter joined in both, and Mr. Justice Frankfurter, Mr. Justice Jackson, and Mr. Justice Burton joined in Mr. Justice Rutledge's.

Mr. Justice Black wrote the majority opinion in both the Everson and the McCollum cases. Mr. Justice Reed was the only Justice dissenting in the McCollum case, which was an 8-to-1 decision, though the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Jackson reads more like a dissent. In the majority opinion in the McCollum case, Mr. Justice Black makes liberal use of quotations from the two dissenting opinions in the Everson case.

In both the Everson and the McCollum decisions, of course, the fourteenth amendment is the fundamental basis upon which each decision is grounded, and it is held that the fourteenth amendment made the first amendment obligatory on the States.

However, it is contended by many students of the Constitution that there is nothing in the fourteenth amendment which justifies the imposition of any clause of the first, upon the States; and they join in the further contention that the Everson and the McCollum cases violate the "free exercise" clause of the first. But the two most dangerous expressions in the Everson decision, carried forward into the McCollum, are: That neither the Federal Government nor a State can "aid all religions"; and that "no tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion." In the case of Nichols v. School Directors (93 Ill. 61) (1879) the Supreme Court of Illinois, notwithstanding the strict provisions of the Illinois Constitution—article II, section 3, and article VIII, section 3—prohibiting appropriation or payment of public money in aid of religion, held: "Religion and religious worship are not so placed under the ban of the Constitution that they may not be allowed to become the recipient of any incidental benefit whatsoever from the public bodies or authorities of the State. That instrument itself contains a provision authorizing the legislature to exempt property used for religious purposes from taxation; and thereby, the same as is complained of here, there might be indirectly imposed upon the taxpayer the burden of increased taxation, and in that manner the indirect supporting of places of worship. In the respect of the possibility of enhanced taxation therefrom, this provision of the Constitution itself is even more obnoxious to objection than this permission given by the school authorities to hold religious meetings in the schoolhouse. There is no pretense that it is in any way in interference with the occupation of the building for school purposes."

Storey, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, fifth edition, 1891, II, section 1872, points out that—

There are a number of ways of creating an establishment of religion by different methods of preferring one over another. Hence, a law respecting an "establishment of religion" might give a preference without imposing a tax. Tax support or, more commonly, tax exemption may be given if no preference is to be made.

Tax exemption is in essence an appropriation, as held by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in Massachusetts General Hospital v. Inhabitants of Belmont (233 Mass. 190, 203; 124 N. E. 21, 25) (1919):

An exemption from taxation is in the nature of an appropriation of public funds, because, to the extent of the exemption, it becomes necessary to increase the rate of taxation upon other properties in order to raise money for the support of government.

Philip Schall, professor of church history in the Union Theological Seminary at New York, in Papers of the American Historical Association, volume II, No. 4; G. P. Putnam Sons, 1888, pages 23-24:

The framers of the Constitution, therefore, had no right and no intention to interfere with the religion of the citizens of any State, or to discriminate between denominations; their only just and wise course was to leave the subject of religion to the several States, to put all churches on an equal footing before the national law, and to secure to them equal protection. Liberty of all is the best guaranty of the liberty of each.

No matter how the Court may interpret the language of the first amendment, as it is to be applied to the Federal Government, which in form it closely controls, the only means of enforcing it against the State of Illinois, or any other State, is by virtue of the fourteenth amendment.

In Adamson v. Calif. (332 U. S. 46), concerning the decision in that case that the self-crimination clause of the fifth amendment did not bind the States, Mr. Justice Reed, speaking for the Court, said—page 53:

It accords with the constitutional doctrine of federalism by leaving to the States the responsibility of dealing with the privileges and immunities of their citizens except those inherent in national citizenship.

There is no occasion at this late date, 160 years after the formation of our Government, for the Supreme Court of the United States to impose, for the first time, more than equal treatment of religions upon the States. The problem of the extent to which equal aid may be extended to religion has always heretofore been handled on the State level and is extensively treated in the provisions of the constitutions of the several States. This is a problem which has been satisfactorily handled without the intervention of the Supreme Court, and it is difficult to see why the power of that Court should now be asserted. The very fact that its power has never been invoked in the history of our country is, itself, the most persuasive evidence that the power was never intended to be exercised and is not necessary to the protection of the fundamental rights of citizens, whether as citizens of the States or of the United States.

A contemporaneous, uniform legislative or executive construction of constitutional provisions adopted and acted on with the acquiescence of the people for many years has always been entitled to great weight. Okanogan Indians v. U. S. (279 U. S. 655, 688 (1929)); Hanover Fire Ins. Co. v. Harding (327 Ill. 590, 603; 158 N. E. 849, (1927)), and cases cited in note, page 60.

The Everson case is the first case in which it was sought—and there unsuccessfully—to apply the establishment of religion clause of the first amendment to restrain the acts of a State.

The decisions are clear that the fourteenth amendment has not, by a mechanical process, imposed the first eight amendments on the States. Twining v. N. J. (211 U. S. 78, 91-98); Hamilton v. Regents of the University of Calif. (293 U. S. 245, 261); Palko v. Connecticut, (402 U. S. 319, 323, 328); Betts v. Brady (316 U. S. 445, 461); Adamson v. Calif. (332 U. S. 46).

It seems clear that the repeal of the fourteenth amendment is not only necessary to restore dual sovereignty and, therefore, the form of our government as designed by the founding fathers, but that the mammoth size to which our national Government has grown has demonstrated to all who have had experience with its incapacity that if we continue centralization of power in Washington, the Federal Government must fall of its own weight.

In a score of cases the Supreme Court has struck the shackles intended to render the States impotent, that were forged and sought to be applied by the fourteenth amendment.

Not only because each of the 10 points made by the President's civil rights committee would be killed by the repeal of the fourteenth amendment, but also, and more especially, because the free exercise of religion, and the dedication of our Nation to God and His worship would so be best given guaranty.

Most of us, if not all, cordially agree with the desperate efforts now being made by our Government to avert war and preserve our Nation. However, there is another question of equal importance: Should we not see to it that our Nation continues to be worth preserving? We have the highest regard for the Supreme Court of the United States and for the ability and integrity of each one of the members of that Court. Undoubtedly they are declaring the law to be what they conceive it. Whether we agree or not, their decisions are the law of the land. The Court and its members would, of course, join cordially in an effort to make sure that the Nation's religious life is safe and that their decisions may not be misunderstood as seeking to weaken "the Power that has made and preserved us a nation."

It was not until 1940 that the Supreme Court clearly enunciated the doctrine that the fourteenth amendment of our Constitution imposed on the States the duty required of Congress by the first amendment. Mr. Justice Roberts, in Cantwell v. Conn. (310 U. S. 296), held that the words of the first amendment—"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof" embraced "two concepts—freedom to believe and freedom to act."

The two latest decisions, however—the Everson and the McCollum cases—go so far beyond all former decisions as to cause the fear, if not the certitude, that the effect will be to destroy every mark that characterizes this a Nation dedicated to God, and the freedom of His worship.

In a renewed effort to safeguard against such an unintended evil, the same repeal resolution—House Joint Resolution 538, Eighty-first Congress, second session, has been introduced and is again pending in the House of Representatives.

Our forefathers came here for the priceless privilege of worshipping God, not for the purpose of ignoring Him; the essence of the religious philosophy of the United States of America has always been the absolute guaranty of freedom of religion, never of freedom from religion.

Our forefathers appointed a committee to design our currency. Jefferson, Franklin, and Adams were the three members of that great committee that labored to give us our sign and seal to display to the world. It was the American eagle. And, in reporting that decision, they referred to the Book of Books where, in Exodus, 19:4, God said:

> Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself.
> Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people—for all the earth is mine.

That was the first covenant promise, and our committee chose that to remind us always that on eagles' wings God had borne our forefathers across the flood of the Atlantic, just as He had, through the Red Sea, brought his first chosen people. We sought to claim that promise also for our Nation, dedicated to God and the keeping of that covenant.

Must our American eagle be struck from our currency? Shall we be forced to forget the pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night that were engraved on our first dollar bills, signifying our prayer for God's guidance and leadership? Must we erase "In God We Trust" from our coins? His all-seeing eye from our great seal? Will mandamus or injunction compel us to cease administering oaths to witnesses and parties and in qualifying prospective witnesses of tender years, in our courts of justice—so-called after one of God's attributes? Must the designation of the year as Anno Domini, the observance of Thanksgiving Day for expression of gratitude to God, Sunday and Christmas, all go? Of course, it is even clearer that Chaplains in all our Armed Forces, in both Senate and House, in West Point and Annapolis, and compulsory Church attendance in both Academies are to be prohibited.

Once upon a time, there was in our fair land an omnipotent queen—the States. The whole empire of sovereignty was hers. But in her wisdom she felt the need of a prince consort who could fight her battles, protect, defend, and guard her from foreign foes and serve her constituents in those manly ways ill-befitting a queen. So she created such a prince, joined him to herself by sacred vows in holy wedlock, made him King in the sphere she had allotted him, and with him shared her throne. By their vows he was to be supreme in the field of power she delegated him, she in all else. It was to be a perfect partnership.

He had his scepter—the Army and Navy. She had hers—the army of her intelligent, virtuous voters selected by her, her children in home, school and church, and her law-making, law-interpreting, and law-enforcing servants.

From time to time, as desirability became apparent, she gave him more and more of her power. He kept all of his, and ever grasped and exercised more of hers.

May God grant us of His wisdom, grace, and power, a sufficiency to enable us to deal with the situation that confronts His people. May it not be the answer to repeal the cause of so much of our tribulation and free the States again, as they were for the first century of the life of this Nation, from the shackles of that tyranny from which our system of dual sovereignty was designed to keep them free?

This Nation must have under God a new birth of freedom. It must be kept God's country.

My Father Works

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on Labor Sunday, September 3, 1950, I had the privilege of attending my own church, the First Baptist Church, of Tallahassee, Fla., and hearing one of the most heart-warming sermons by our pastor, Dr. Harold G. Sanders, who, on that day, Labor Sunday used as his text the seventeenth verse of the fifth chapter of the Book of John, "But Jesus answered them, my Father worketh hitherto, and I work." I ask the privilege of having his stimulating and far-sighted sermon printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the sermon was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MY FATHER WORKS

Text, John 5:17: "But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work."

Religion has about forfeited its right to be called a religion when its leaders deny a stranger's deed of mercy on the Sabbath day. Such was the case with the Pharisees when Jesus came along "doing good." For some strange reason, Jesus did not seem to remember what day it was when He saw human suffering about which He could do something. That men who professed to represent God, His Father, could not appreciate His nonconformity to the laws of Sabbath observance did not seem to bother Jesus; but He had an answer for them. He had come to "seek and to save that which was lost," including the leaders of the temple—if they would have it so.

Jesus found him, a chronically impotent man who for 38 years had been afflicted, and for long had taken his place in the Holy City by the Pool of Bethesda, hoping to be cured by the angel-stirred waters. "Wilt thou be made whole?" The impotent man said, "Certainly? But, when the angel stirs the waters, I am so slow that another beats me to the pool every time. I need someone to put me into the pool ahead of others." The Lord of Life said firmly, "Rise, take up thy bed, and walk." At once the man was made whole, and he took up his bed and walked—but it was on the Sabbath Day, and he had broken it! The Jews caught him in the act. "Who told you to break the Sabbath by carrying your bed?" The cured man admitted that the one who had healed him had also told him to take up his bed and walk, but his name he did not know. Later, however, Jesus "findeth him in the temple, and said unto him, 'Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.' The man departed (ungrateful as he was) and told the Jews that it was Jesus which had made him whole." For this cause, therefore, the Jews persecuted Jesus and sought to kill him- because he had healed the man on the Sabbath.

But Jesus was now to commit the greater sin. He told them the reason he healed the man: "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" Therefore, the Jews determined to kill Him, because not only had He broken their Sabbath laws but also He had claimed sonship with God.

HE CAME UNTO HIS OWN

Little wonder that the Apostle John, writing later in the Gospel which carries his name, could write these pathetic words: "He came unto His own, but His own received Him not" (1:11). So sure were the leaders of their position with and interpretation of God that they could not even recognize Him when He became flesh in the person of His Son. They could not take his liberal attitude toward ecclesiastical law, and the last straw was his wild claim to be equal with God. Away with Him. But, some received Him, and "to them gave He the power to become the sons of God, even to them that believed on His name; * * * (1:12).

LIBERAL LABOR VIEWS OF JESUS

If Labor Day provides no better result than to have the Christian leaders and preachers rethink the attitude of Jesus toward manual labor, it will be worth the observance Jesus was a worker. A carpenter. And He was proud of it.

He would have been repudiated in almost every Graeco-Roman center for his high opinion of manual labor. Furthermore, they would have denied him the right to speak as an authority simply because he was a carpenter. In the city rich in Periclean culture, He would have run counter to the ideas of Aristotle who was dead-sure that the mechanical arts made freemen unserviceable for the use and exercise of virtue. He would have fared no better in the delta of the Nile where the teachers in the city made famous by Alexander the Great (whose name it bore) taught—as many of the short-sighted of American schools—that a college sheepskin was an insurance protecting one from working with his hands. A manual laborer, in the minds of the teachers and philosophers of all ancient peoples except the Hebrews, was low man on the totem pole of life's occupations. Whether in China or Asia Minor, the same taboo was placed upon labor—a man of that class could not speak with authority. It was just simply out of the question.

Only the Hebrews, and that after a four-century experience in the bondage of Egypt and a seven-decade experience in Babylonia, held a worthy conception of the worker in the manual arts. Perhaps making straw bricks for the Pharaohs—without pay, helped them to see life more fully. By the time of Christ every Hebrew boy had a trade. Even the scholars like Paul might be a tentmaker. Peter, James, and John were fishermen. Matthew was a tax collector. And Jesus was a carpenter.

WOULD JESUS TAKE SIDES TODAY?

Jesus is very much alive today. And He is tremendously interested in the best interests of labor. His father was a worker. He was a carpenter. Most of all, He is interested in the welfare of human beings. His restless, ubiquitous spirit is everywhere today working.

But suppose He were to return in the flesh and come to Detroit or Birmingham when labor troubles were brewing. Would He take sides with labor or management? Would He aline Himself with the labor unions or with big business? He would be very much concerned with the clashes between them, but He would be all too honest and too wise to take sides with either group per se, but I think He would do a lot of mediating—after prayer. He would seek to build men fit for fellowship with each other and His Father, knowing that labor-management relations would have to be settled on a different basis from that used by most mediators. He would seek to bring all parties concerned—labor, capital, and the rest of the world—into cooperative, creative labor for the benefit of all God's children. He would not be lost in the narrow, selfish interests of any particular group seeking a fatter envelope from another group, who do so without stopping to consider what effect such action would have upon ( ) their own consciences, (2) future good will between the contracting parties, or (3) the rest of the world. He would help men now, as He did then, to see life whole; to see it through the eyes of God and the eyes of suffering humanity.

WHAT DID JESUS THINK ABOUT LABOR?

The attitude of Jesus today toward labor and money is no different from what it was when He walked in human's sandals on the roads of Palestine What does the record show? How did he feel about labor, about money?

1. He saw people as people, and loved them all. He was no respecter of persons, but He respected all persons. He loved the poor—and He loved the rich. He disliked ill will and low motive in both. He loved a good workman, one who worked creatively, whether with his muscle, mind, or money. In other words, He saw all men as workers, whatever the vocation, vitally related to each other and to God. He would not criticize the work, only the worker with antisocial attitudes. "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." This was His over-all command to workers all.

2. Jesus, only Son of His working Father, believed in just pay for all workers. Even in the Old Testament, the righteous person was promised that his seed would not beg bread. A righteous man was never a shirker. The New Testament is plain: "The laborer is worthy of his hire." In the parable of the pennies, or the parable of the vineyard, recorded in Matthew 20: 1-16, God is represented as a householder who went into town to hire laborers for his vineyard, contracting with them for a penny a day. Needing more workers, at intervals throughout the day, even up to 5 in the afternoon, he hired all who would work. At 6 o'clock, he paid them all the day's wages as agreed upon. Those who worked longest complained at the generosity of the employer who paid those who worked but an hour the same as they who had borne the burden and heat of the entire day. God is represented as kindly but firmly replying: "Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst thou not agree with me for a penny? * * * Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Is thine eye evil, because I am good?" (20: 13-15). What is the obvious inference? That God is interested in two things: (1) getting the work done for the benefit of mankind; and (2) in seeing that every workman has a living wage—no matter the nature of the work.

3. Jesus did not seek to regiment labor and manpower. The parable of the talents (Matthew 25: 14 30) indicates that native abilities are given men in dissimilar quantities—some have five, others two, others one. Men are not to be judged by the number of talents, the amount of ability and education which they have, but by the creative use which they make of all their abilities in relation to the fellow who dispensed the ability. The selfish, antisocial fellow with one talent who did not use his ability for the common good, for his own enrichment, or for the purposes of his master received severe indictment and just punishment.

Realistic as He was, Jesus taught the principle of the strong caring for the weak, the "haves" sharing with the "have nots," and the supreme principle of sacrifice for the good of others.

4. Making a life, not making a living, is the big idea. I have no sympathy with the pious teacher who says that Jesus would not stoop to the level of a discussion of economics or touch the garment of filthy lucre Jesus said bluntly: "Ye cannot serve God and money." Almost half of His parables dealt with money, material values, stewardship. He had plenty to say about economics. He was not a theorist, but a realist. He would demand labor from all. He would just as firmly demand a living wage for labor. He would tell a servant to serve his master as if that master were God. And, He would remind that master that he was not really a master at all, and, that he himself had a Master—God.

He was interested in a just wage and in a just profit for the worker commonly known as capital or management; but He would warn both management and labor—and all of us who are interested in the welfare of both—that money in abundance is not of itself a passport to heaven, or a promise of brotherhood. He found that abundance, for any person, carried with it its own temptation to do evil, to be unbrotherly. A full pay envelope may turn a worker into a bigot, a drunk, a libertine. American pay envelopes may isolate us from the laborers of India or South Africa—ask a GI who spent some time in Australia or Europe.

The big idea is to make a life, the kind of a life which God lives—a good life, a working life, a creative life, an unselfish life. Jesus promised those who follow Him that if they seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, that all these things—food, drink, clothing—shall be added unto you (Matthew 6: 33).

5. Jesus saw all workers in relation to His working Father. "No man liveth unto himself, or dieth unto himself." Every worker has an obligation to all others. All workers really have the same Boss—the Great Worker who once in history begot an only Son who said, "My Father is working even until now, and I am working too." In the parable of the vineyard, all workers worked for the same employer. The world is a vineyard of God. Whatever the foreman or the straw boss, God is the employer. He gives abilities and opportunities as He will, but He asks that each laborer work out his salvation with fear and trembling, knowing that not only is he working for God, but, literally, God worketh in you. Jesus came working. And he said, "As the Father hath sent Me, even so send I you." Out to work, workers together, workers in the vineyard of God.

WHAT IS GOD TRYING TO DO?

Could we stop Jesus for a moment, look straight into His face, and ask him plainly, "What does your Father do, anyway? What kind of worker is He?" Jesus would be patient with us for we are his dull children.

Jesus would tell of the work of creation, how that His Father created the things of earth and sky and sea; and how that He holds the atoms of the world and the planets of the universe in the hollow of His great Hand. Then, he would talk of His work in the interest of His highest creation—His children, the men of earth. He would remind you of John 3:16, how that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life". He would have you read the story of His only life, teachings, vicarious death for sinful men, His exploring and conquering the darkness that is called death, and the continuing work of God and Jesus through the Holy Spirit who is now busy at work in the world—revealing the mind of God by spotlighting the life of Jesus—trying to bring it life, and help it to live peaceably and creatively at work with Himself and all His family.

Then, He would look every inquiring one of us in the eye and say: God is working for you, and wants to work in and through you now.

GOD'S HOPE OF GLORY

In the first century, "God sent forth His Son" to glorify Himself. By that we mean, to reveal his true character, his attitude toward men. Jesus did that completely. He who was the One perfect man completely revealed Him. The record of that revelation is contained in the New Testament. Jesus went back to heaven. Now, God's hope is found in Christians who will work with Him. Even as Paul said, "Christ in you, God's hope of glory". "We are laborers together with God".

God is no selfish worker. The vast reaches of his working arm are extended not for personal benefit, but for the welfare and salvation of his erring children. No labor is too great, no waiting too long, no difficulty shall steer Him away from His purpose to make people fit for fellowship with Himself and each other. He needs human hands to help him.

Those workers who would work with the Eternal Laborer must share His concern for the needy world, His unselfish spirit, His untiring interest. We must seek to understand the yearning of the heart of God for the poor, the starved, the unfortunate, the sin-shackled. We must share actively with Him. Some of us do. All of us should. Without it, we lose our vision of God.

"I listen to the agony of God—
I who am fed,
Who never yet went hungry for lack of bread—
I see the dead,
The children starved for lack of bread—
I see, and try to pray.

"I listen to the agony of God—
I who am warm,
Who never yet have lacked a sheltering home.
In dull alarm
The dispossessed of hut and farm
Aimless and transient roam.

"I listen to the agony of God—
I who am strong,
With health and love and laughter in my soul.
I see a throng
Of stunted children reared in wrong,
And wish to make them whole.

"I listen to the agony of God,
But know full well
That not until I share their bitter cry—
Earth's pain and hell—
Can God within my spirit dwell,
Or bring His Kingdom nigh."

—Author unknown.

On this Labor Sunday, 1950, we find many dark and demonic forces at work, too. God is not the only worker in this earth. The suffering of humanity in many lands must oppress the Christian conscience almost beyond endurance—and thrust him out to work with God. Any "ill-clad body protests every idle machine. A homeless or poorly housed family pulls at the sinews of every idle hand. A slave worker anywhere jeopardizes the rights of all freemen." A human being engaging in any type of fratricide is an anomaly for one who claims God is his Father. Any person on earth, still bound in his sin, is a monument to the sloth of all Christians who are sin-free because of the working of the Son of God who "bare our sins in His own body on the tree."

Under His sovereign dominion, yet in many cases working at variance with God and the good of mankind, the workers of time, death, and sin militate against the purposes of His Christ. God is working for something great and good for every human being, but time, death, and sin let no grass grow under their deadly feet. God needs workers who share His spirit, His compassion, His objectives.

"Time worketh, let me work too.
Time undoeth, O let me do.
As busy as time my work I'll ply,
Till I rest in the rest of eternity.

"Death worketh, let me work too.
Death undoeth, O let me do.
As busy as death my work I'll ply,
Till I rest in the rest of eternity.

"Sin worketh, let me work too.
Sin undoeth, O let me do.
As busy as sin, my work I'll ply,
Till I rest in the rest of eternity.

"Christ worketh, let me work too.
Christ bindeth up, O let me bind too.
As busy as Christ my work I'll ply,
Till I rest in the rest of eternity—but not now."

—Author unknown.

Through the streets of Detroit and Pittsburgh and Vancouver the Great Householder comes seeking workers for His vineyard. Those who want to work will be hired. They will receive just wages in this life, and reap wages for life eternal. Want to work?

You will have great companions: Jesus, Peter, Paul, and the apostolic succession of laborers of every vocation who have caught the secret of life and can say with their Master in a new and true sense, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work."

Research on Rain—"Let's Do Something About the Weather"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill, H. R. 9579, to authorize a research and experimental program in the field of rain-making to be carried on by the Soil Conservation Service and the United States Forest Service in the Department of Agriculture.

The Government is spending hundreds of millions of dollars every year in the field of water conservation and irrigation. It is spending millions of dollars every year to protect and develop our forests. My proposal is that we utilize resources and equipment of the Government and bring together the developing knowledge on the subject of cloud physics and try to develop a practical application of current knowledge and skills in the modifying of clouds.

RELATED TO WATER CONSERVATION

My interest in water conservation, of course, began before I came to Congress and much of the legislation in which I have taken an active interest relates to the conservation and use of water. The so-called Case-Wheeler Act of 1939–40 was designed to aid the construction of small dams.

Numerous flood control studies have been made under resolutions which I have presented to the Committee on Flood Control and Public Works. Many dams, large and small, have been constructed or begun under appropriations which I have proposed and supported. Over 50,000 stock water dams have been built in South Dakota since I was first elected to Congress in 1936 with the slogan "A dam (or live water), some trees, and a watered garden on every farm."

But withal, the conviction persists that the most natural way to use water is in the form of rain, and the best way to get it where you want it is to take it in the form of rain. It is a maxim in water conservation to use water as nearly as possible where it falls, and then use and re-use it as it moves to the sea.

Hence, it has been with more than ordinary interest that I have read various articles on the subject of making rain. Early in July, this year, I read an article in the Country Gentleman, entitled "They Really Do Make It Rain" which convinced me the time had arrived to do something about the weather and not merely talk about it.

So, I suggested to Harry Marshall of the Marshall Flying Service at Rapid City, S. Dak., that if he would undertake a flight or two, I would pay the necessary expenses for some dry ice and operation of the plane to see if there was anything to this talk about getting clouds to shed their moisture.

Mr. Marshall, most interested and cooperative, and O. H. Barnett, of the Fairmont Creamery, supplied dry ice for one of the flights. Members of the local press became interested and E. L. "Paddy" Ingvaldson, managing editor of the Rapid City Daily Journal, flew with Marshall and personally seeded the clouds, using a cup to sprinkle the dry ice.

Jim McKay, of radio station KOTA, and Bob Lee, editor of the Sunday Journal, chartered another plane to follow the rain makers and took pictures of them in their operations.

RESULTS OF OUR AMATEUR EFFORTS

Two flights were made. The first, on July 9, was under what Marshall thought were favorable conditions. The humidity was about 75 percent, high for western South Dakota.

The boys had to go up to 12,000 feet to get above the cloud they selected. Shortly after they started seeding it, the top of the cloud began to puff up and eventually the cloud boiled up light and fluffy to about 18,000 feet, while the lower part got darker.

Eventually the cloud broke loose, about 45 minutes after the seeding started, and rain fell over a strip about 5 miles wide and 15 miles long according to reports turned in later.

The second flight on July 10 had less spectacular results, but possibly contributed as much to our amateur knowledge on the subject. Only a light cloud was found and the humidity this day was only 25 percent.

After this seeding, the boys found themselves in a light snowstorm when they dropped down to the lower part of the cloud. They were inclined to discount this, but reading of the experiments of Dr. Langmuir suggests to me that this was as much to be expected under the conditions prevailing and the techniques used as was the rain of the day before.

Since then, numerous articles have appeared on the subject. Among them:

Precipitation From Cumulus Clouds by Seeding Techniques, by Irving Langmuir, associate director of the General Electric Laboratory, Schenectady, N. Y., in Science, July 14, 1950.

There's Danger in Rain-Making, in Parade, a metropolitan Sunday newspaper supplement for August 27, 1950.

Weather or Not, in the current number of Time magazine, August 28, 1950, which featured Dr. Langmuir on its cover.

Also, in mid-July, the United States Air Force put out a news release on its "project cirrus." This reported on a project conducted by General Electric for the Signal Corps and joined in by naval and Air Force personnel.

An earlier project, Cloud Physics, was conducted by the Weather Bureau, United States Air Force, and the Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I learn.

Life magazine recently carried a short feature on the results attained by New York City in refilling its reservoirs. Dry last spring, they are now back to 93 percent of normal.

The Weather Bureau is guarded, if not pessimistic, in its comments on the cloud physics project, but the Air Force is more encouraging in comment on the later cirrus project.

The general tenor of all the articles, however, is that clouds can be modified, hail possibly controlled, and moisture precipitated by the cooling effects of seeding either with dry ice or silver iodide. High humidity helps.

Since these conclusions tallied with those of Harry Marshall in our little experiment in South Dakota, I decided to discuss the matter with A. E. Jones, of the Soil Conservation Service. He, I found, attended a lecture on the subject by Langmuir a couple years ago.

Jones pointed out the great potential values in forest-fire control as well as benefits to marginal crops and grasses. So, we drew up a bill to authorize a research and experimental program to be conducted jointly by Soil Conservation and Forest Services.

I introduced the bill today so that the Government agencies can study it and prepare their reports for the consideration of Congress in January. H. R. 9379 reads as follows:

A bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct research and experiments with respect to methods of controlling and producing precipitation in moisture-deficient areas

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture, acting through the Soil Conservation Service and Foreign Service, shall conduct such research and experiments and shall take such further action as may be necessary to perfect at the earliest possible date methods of causing rain to fall in deficient areas to provide supplemental moisture for production of crops and grasses, prevention of forest fires, protection of municipal water supplies, and other purposes.

SEC. 2 (a) The Department of Commerce and other Federal agencies possessing meteorological and other records and data pertinent to the accomplishment of the purposes of this act shall make such records and data available to the Secretary of Agriculture.

(b) Any excess Government property and equipment which the Secretary of Agriculture finds suitable for use and necessary in accomplishing the purposes of this act shall be transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture without compensation therefor.

SEC. 3. There is authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Agriculture, from any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums, as the Congress may from time to time deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

In response to my request, the Library of Congress has prepared a digest of various articles on the subject, which, under permission given, I place in the RECORD at this point:

ARTIFICIAL PRODUCTION OF RAIN

GENERAL STATEMENT

It is not yet possible to scientifically measure the results of the experiments designed to artificially produce rain. Some sources, such as Dr. Irving Langmuir,[1] Nobel prize winner, are optimistic about these results while other sources, particularly the United States Weather Bureau, are pessimistic.

In recent years much effort has been devoted to attempting to solve the problems of controlling weather. The two most important efforts were the cloud physics project and project Cirrus. The cloud physics project was a cooperative effort of the United States Weather Bureau, United States Air Forces, and the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics

Project Cirrus was conducted by General Electric Co. scientists under contract with the Signal Corps and the Navy Department with the aid of Air Forces aircraft and personnel. In addition to these tests there are the much publicized rain-making efforts of New York City and numerous other attempts of less significance.

CLOUD PHYSICS PROJECT

The Air Forces and Weather Bureau issued a joint statement of the results of the cloud physics project which indicated that cloud seeding was unimportant in the production of rain.[2]

The release stated:

"The cloud physics project gathered the information during research flights throughout last winter and also on the cumulus or billowy types of clouds common to central Ohio during the spring and summer months. These experiments indicated that cloud seeding did not normally result in precipitation in amounts of economic importance, and that there was little evidence that cloud seeding will start a storm.

"Perhaps the most important development of the experiments was the discovery that the seeding of clouds by water, dry ice, or chemical agents—such as vapor forms of lead oxide or silver iodide—frequently results in the rapid dissipation of those portions of cumulus clouds exposed to the vapor. In 10 out of 79 tests dissipation was noted. The investigators expressed the opinion that this dissipation rather than new development (or precipitation) was the rule."

PROJECT CIRRUS

The reports thus far concerning the results of Project Cirrus experiments are definitely optimistic. Of one experiment, Dr. Langmuir states: [3]

"It has, for example, been determined, I believe, with certainty that substantially all of the rain from the whole of New Mexico that fell on October 14 and 15, 1948, was the result of the seeding operation near Albuquerque. The odds in favor of this conclusion as compared to the assumption that the rain was due to natural causes are many millions to one."

In speaking of certain operations under way in Honduras for the United Fruit Co., Dr Langmuir said: [4]

"This year in Honduras the dry season continued during April and May and there were no general rains. However, large clouds rising to 18,000 feet and often much more formed nearby every day along the Great Divide and usually formed also near Pijol Peak and sometimes near Santa Barbara Mountain. These clouds reached far above the freezing level which was usually at above 16,000 feet."

CLOUDS INCREASE IN HEIGHT

"By seeding with single pellets of dry ice at about 18,000 to 20,000 feet, these clouds could be profoundly modified. The largest clouds usually increased greatly in height and gave heavy rain and the cloud base lowered several thousand feet. The smaller clouds gave moderate amounts of rain of a short duration, and part of the cloud above the freezing level often lifted off and separated from the lower part. By water seeding, using several balloons and making passes into the side of the cloud, these clouds could be made to give rain without increasing in height. In this way, the clouds could be prevented from developing into a thunderstorm.

"By the trickler technique it has been possible to detach the upper portions of large cumulus clouds from the lower part and prevent the growth of the cloud and the development of heavy rain."

Dr. Langmuir has described his thoughts on the factors involved in producing rain as follows: [5]

"For many years, I have developed some philosophical ideas in regard to cause and effect relationships in science. The causality that used to be characteristic of classical physics applies strictly only to convergent phenomena which depend upon a large number of separate particles or separate events which converge to a well-defined average. There are, however, in atomic physics, as well as in human affairs and meteorological phenomena, what may be called divergent phenomena where some large important events grow from small beginnings which produce divergent results. Shower formations such as those in arid regions like New Mexico are good examples of divergent phenomena.

"On this basis, the synoptic situation is important only, insofar as it determines the probability that a shower will occur. It does not directly cause the shower to occur at a given time and place.

"The situation is like that of the evaporation of molecules from the surface of a liquid or solid. A rise in temperature increases the probability that a particular molecule on the surface will evaporate, but it is not the direct cause of evaporation of that molecule at that time and place."

SCHAEFER'S EXPERIMENTS SIGNIFICANT

"Laboratory experiments by Vincent Schaefer have proved beyond question, I believe, that ice crystals never form spontaneously in the atmosphere unless foreign sublimation nuclei are present or unless the temperature is lowered below —39° C. and the air is supersaturated with respect to ice.

"I believe that meteorological knowledge and all observations in project Cirrus are in accord with this conclusion.

"Whenever ice crystals form in clouds having temperatures above —39° C., we may be sure that sublimation nuclei are present. Some air masses contain adequate numbers of such nuclei.

"Other times we know that they are not present in quantities sufficient to account for the development of snowstorms, even when the clouds rise to 30,000 feet or more. In the Tropics we see many cases where clouds have no significant number of ice crystals until they reach the temperature of —39° C. If the cloud rises to a height that gives this low temperature, the supercooled water droplets suddenly change to ice crystals and produce a peculiar kind of anvil top usually in the form of a pancake, a very symmetrical and smooth structureless disk. Because of the heat evolved the top floats away as a cirrus streamer, and it may be said that the cloud acts as though it is pumping cirrus. We occasionally see such clouds in New Mexico, but more frequently in the Tropics.

"Schaefer's experiments have proved that in the atmosphere the number of nuclei can vary enormously, sometimes being only a few per cubic meter and in other cases reaching a few per cubic centimeter, the ratio perhaps being 1 to 10.

"A very important point is this: Since the atmosphere nearly always does contain some nuclei, a supercooled cloud of the convective type will contain some ice crystals when its temperature gets down to the point where the nuclei are effective; but unless there is a chain reaction by which these nuclei multiply in number to an unlimited degree, there will be no possibility of producing a heavy rain shower as a thunderstorm."

CHAIN REACTION NECESSARY

"It is just this fact that a heavy shower begins only when a chain reaction sets up the necessary requirements for a self-propagating storm that, I believe, establishes the conditions which make the beginning of a storm an act of probability, rather than a definite relation of cause and effect.

"For these reasons, I propose the following theory which determines the probability that showers will occur under given conditions."

LANGMUIR'S THREE CONDITIONS

"In order that a shower may occur, it is, first, of all, necessary to have nuclei.

"Second, it is necessary to have a synoptic situation such that cumulus clouds form and lift the nuclei up to a level at which they can turn into ice crystals.

"Next, it is essential that the ice crystals either accumulate or in some way multiply to set up a chain reaction and bring about a run-away effect in the cloud, which causes heavy rain to form.

"Now, in general, there are factors that prevent the growth of cumulus clouds.

"In the morning there is stability in the atmosphere; there are cold layers of air down below. When the air becomes heated by the sun and the lapse rate increases and the conditions are favorable for forming cumulus clouds, only with certain factors present will all the conditions arise that are necessary to establish a chain reaction. This will occur in particularly favorable locations where the nuclei concentrations are just right."

NEW YORK CITY'S EXPERIENCE

New York City, because of a serious water shortage last winter, hired Dr. Wallace E. Howell to attempt to produce rain in the watershed areas of its reservoirs. In summing up the results of his efforts Dr. Howell stated, "I have made rain." [6] He added that his experiments probably had produced "very little rain that would not have fallen anyway." During the first 6 months of Dr. Howell's work, rainfall was 6 percent above normal in the Catskill watersheds.[7] On August 22, 1950, the Catskill and Croton reservoirs were 84.3 percent full as compared to 69.3 percent full a year ago.[8]

FEDERAL LEGISLATION

There has been no specific Federal legislation designed to set up Federal research or cooperation in the field of artificial weather controls. Two bills were introduced in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, S. 1796 and H. R. 4623, to provide indemnity for contractors with any agency of the National Military Establishment against claims arising out of contracts for cloud modification research and development, and for other purposes.

SEEDING OF CLOUDS TO DESTROY HAIL

We have no Air Forces reports of research on the seeding of clouds to destroy hail. However, information on many aspects of the work being done to control weather is not available because of military restrictions. Perhaps an indication of the possible results of seeding clouds to destroy hail may be seen in this story from the Kiplinger magazine: [9]

"In the Rogue River Valley of Oregon, hail is one of the greatest problems the pear growers have. In 1948 hail wiped out half the marketable crop. Some of the orchardists heard of man-made weather, pooled $15,000 and hired two ex-Navy pilots, E. K. Kooser and H. M. Brandau, to try to stop the hail before it got started.

"The pilots began experiments early last summer. Every time they saw a thunderhead rising behind the mountains, they took off and seeded the cloud with a substance, the nature of which is still secret. In each case, the cloud melted into rain. It 1948 hail had done nearly $3,000,000 worth of damage to Rogue River pears. In 1949, there was no damage. Naturally the two ex-Navy fliers have been signed up for another season."

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we are proposing in H. R. 9579 to enter a very practical field that could mean a great deal to the economy of the country and the welfare of the Nation's resources.

World Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 5 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement issued by Dr. Hamilton Holt, honorary president of Rollins College, who has long been a worker and an acknowledged leader in the world government movement, and who is a distinguished citizen of Florida, a distinguished citizen of Connecticut, and a distinguished servant in the public interest.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(This is the first public statement issued by Dr. Hamilton Holt, honorary president of Rollins College, since he arrived in Winter Park to spend the winter. He is an acknowledged leader in the world government movement and is one of the few surviving members of the group of pioneer peace workers who organized the League to Enforce Peace before World War I, and were influential in bringing about, through President Wilson, the League of Nations.)

To the EDITOR:

In the great wave of soul-searching discussion that has swept the world since President Truman's brief statement giving the green light signal to go ahead with the so-called hydrogen bomb, little attention has been given, comparatively speaking, to the President's pledge that this and other efforts for developing atomic weapons will be carried on until a satisfactory plan for international control of atomic energy is achieved. We shall also continue to examine all these factors that affect our program for peace and this country's security.

This pledge, far more important than the decision to make the bomb, is momentous in its implications, for it means that the hydrogen bomb is not an end in itself, adequate to insure justice, peace, and security, but a necessary evil that must be developed, supported, and endured, until at least some sort of world organization is established to control or abolish it.

The President has naturally not specified ways and means, for no man who is spokesman for his country in foreign affairs can commit himself in advance to a detailed formula for future action.

Woodrow Wilson once said to a delegation of us from the League to Enforce Peace who waited upon him at the White House to ask him to endorse the League's program, that he approved of it and wished us God-speed, but if he committed himself to it specifically, his opponents at the coming Versailles Peace Conference would have the advantage of knowing just where he stood, whereas he must be perfectly free to get more or take less than our program without being charged with inconsistency.

Theodore Roosevelt likewise said to me when I urged him to take a certain forward stand in the peace movement, that a man who is or has been President of the United States should not be asked to pioneer at the initial stages of any movement, however good. "Let others sow the seed," he said, "but let him reap the harvest."

But the movement for peace and security has gone far beyond the stage of seed sowing. It is now accepted by most men of understanding and good will throughout the world, that world peace is the outcome of world justice, world justice is the outcome of world law, world law is the outcome of world government, and world government is the outcome of world political organization. This is the logical and inescapable sequence if man's efforts are to bring about peace on earth. So far it has been mostly an ideal that must some day come true by the very laws of evolution. But the atomic bomb and now the hydrogen bomb with terrifying suddenness have transformed this ideal to be worked for, into the most immediate, practical, and pressing problem before mankind.

For the issue is no longer the issue of peace versus war from which nations could recover as it has been throughout the ages—but peace versus the possible if not probable destruction of the human race.

The creation of the hydrogen bomb, while urged in many quarters as a guaranty for peace and security, is in reality not a preparation for peace, but a preparation for war. All expert scientific and military opinion agrees that there is no sure defense against atomic bombs. If follows, therefore, that other nations who fear for their security will be forced to enter the armament race whose logical outcome must be bankruptcy for all save the strongest, and moral bankruptcy at that. Adequate preparedness for all nations is a mathematical, philosophical, and physical impossibility. The fact is, there is no such thing as absolute preparedness. That is why the generals and admirals are never satisfied. All preparedness is relative.

Preparedness will undoubtedly make us better prepared if war comes. But when has preparedness in itself stopped a nation from attacking another, no matter how prepared that nation may be? Of course, making ourselves militarily strong may prevent a small or weak nation from attacking us. But where does history afford an example of even the most powerfully armed nation ever being immune from attack from lesser armed nations when the war lust is aroused? Certainly before both World Wars Germany was the most powerfully armed and militarily trained nation on earth, and yet it did not prevent lesser armed nations from declaring war on her and winning the war. And so, if we become the mightiest military force on earth, that in itself will not make us immune from attack.

The reason why people are often confused over the right and wrong, the wisdom and the unwisdom of preparedness, is that they fail to see the moral implications in the three ways that force can be exerted in international relations and, indeed, in human affairs. First, force may be used for attack, which we call aggression. Second, force may be used to repel attack, which we call defense. Third, force may be used as an agent of law and order, which we call police force.

Force used for aggression is wholly wrong, for it means the aggressor is judge, jury, and executioner in his own cause, and that has long since been outlawed by civilized nations, not only within their own borders but within all political subdivisions within their borders.

Force for defense is either wholly good or a necessary evil, and must exist as long as the possibility of aggression exists. Otherwise a nation courts the tragedy of defeat, dissolution, and enslavement.

Police force is wholly good, for it is the force used to bring the culprit before the law, and law and reason then takes its normal course. Theodore Roosevelt once said, "The function of the battleship is to pound the enemy into insensibility"; and there is no place in that aggressive procedure for reason to play a part. The policeman, on the other hand, uses the minimum, not the maximum, amount of force, not to pound the culprit into insensibility, but to bring him alive before the court and then the court pronounces sentence on the basis of reason and justice.

Let President Truman, therefore, instruct our representatives at the Assembly and Council of the United Nations to urge the calling of a constitutional convention under article 109 of the Charter to revise the charter so that there will be at the earliest possible moment a world government with power to make, interpret, and enforce laws for peace on earth.

A United Nations as now constituted cannot maintain peace for the reason that it is a league of sovereign nations in which each nation is equally sovereign in the same area. It has no world laws and no power to enforce them even if they existed. Its charter is a multilateral treaty signed by 58 separate nations, each one of which by the specific provisions of the charter has the sovereign right at any time of deciding whether it will make war.

If President Truman will now proclaim to the world that the only ultimate way to bring peace on earth is to develop the 58 members of the United Nations from a league of sovereign nations into a world government, then he can say that in view of the pending establishment of such a perfected United Nations we will use the hydrogen bomb if attack comes to us from the aggression of any other nation.

Nearly 100 years ago Victor Hugo prophesied that the day would come when the only battlefield would be the market opening to commerce and the mind opening to new ideas. Nothing will do so much to hasten the coming of that day as for the United States to lead in the establishment of a world government. It is our privilege and duty to do this, not only because it will help to bring us and the world nearer the golden days of peace, but for a higher reason. The supreme issue before the world today is really moral, if not spiritual. It is how to substitute reason for force, right for might, law for war, in the conduct of human affairs. We now have the United Nations, the farthest step yet taken, it is true, by the nations for peace; yet it is but a confederation of sovereign states with no sovereign authority over them.

When our forefathers met at Independence Hall more than a century and a half ago, they took no counsel of cowardice but mutually pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to the document they framed. And what happened? The United States of America happened. So now, let us take no counsel of cowardice, but mutually pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor to the establishment of a world government. We may have to set it up at first without Russia and her satellites, as our fathers set up the United States before New York, Virginia, South Carolina, and Rhode Island joined.

So away with delay and hesitation. Away with self-delusion that makes excuses for nonaction when the bombs tick louder.

The hour has struck. It is not yet too late, but can it be much later?

HAMILTON HOLT.

Wood—Alabama's No. 1 Agricultural Crop

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL ELLIOTT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, 19,000,000 of Alabama's 32,690,000 acres, or 59 percent of its land area, is covered with forests, and therefore devoted to the production of Alabama's No. 1 crop—wood.

Alabama has 33,000,000,000 board feet of saw timber, and 105,000,000 cords of pulpwood, with a stumpage value of more than half a billion dollars. Its harvested value would be several times this amount and its manufactured value many times this amount.

In 1948, Alabama's wood sale values, at the green lumber and raw pulp stages, amounted to $209,000,000. Alabama's cotton and cottonseed, immediately after ginning had a value of $202,000,000. Thus, proof that wood is Alabama's No. 1 crop.

As a part of my remarks, I insert an article by T. D. Stevens and W. K. Livingston, of the Department of Forestry of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, entitled "Wood, Alabama's No. 1 Agricultural Crop," which appeared in the August 1950 issue of the Alabama Lumberman:

WOOD, ALABAMA'S NO. 1 AGRICULTURAL CROP

(By T. D. Stevens and K. W. Livingston, Department of Forestry, Alabama Polytechnic Institute)

Stop for a moment and look around you. The chances are your eye will fall on wood in some form. Wood is man's universal material. We see it in trees, houses, furniture, clothing, paper, plastics and many other items too numerous to mention. In fact wood has a profound influence on our everyday life. Without it life would be very difficult indeed. Despite wood's universality, few people realize the importance of wood to our over-all economy.

Let's consider wood as it relates to Alabama. The total land area of Alabama is approximately 32,690,000 acres. Of this total, almost 19,000,000 are forested. Thus 59 percent or well over half of all the land in Alabama is producing wood. Like cotton, corn, and peanuts, wood is an agricultural crop. The only difference lies in the fact that most agricultural crops can be produced in 1 year, whereas wood to be grown to commercial size usually requires at least a couple of decades.

Wood is Alabama's No. 1 agricultural crop if for no other reason than the fact that it is grown on more acres of land than all other crops combined.

The total wood volume on our commercial forest land is calculated to be 13,620,000,000 cubic feet (table 1). Converting the cubic foot to more common units, we have 33,361,000,000 board feet of saw timber, and in addition, 105,000,000 cords of pulpwood. Based on stumpage value of $10 a thousand board feet and $1.50 a cord, the total stumpage value of the State's forest resource amounts to almost half a billion dollars. Obviously, the harvested value of this resource would be several times, and the manufactured value many times as great.

According to the latest figures available, the annual net growth on Alabama commercial forest land is in the neighborhood of 750,000,000 cubic feet of wood (table 2). On the other hand, cutting is at the rate of 713,000,000 cubic feet per year. These figures indicate that Alabama's forests are producing more than is being harvested. Unfortunately, however, these figures are not as reassuring as they appear at first glance. Considering only saw timber, the present annual drain just about balances growth. Conversely, a few years ago, under the stress of war, cutting far outstripped growth. In 1944, for example, the drain on saw timber was 45 percent greater than the growth. In an expanding economy such as the Nation is currently enjoying, the threat of overcutting is ever present.

All species	2,021	2,930	−909	750	713	+37

[1] From U. S. Forest Service Reappraisal, 1945.

The obvious answer lies in increasing the productiveness of our forest lands. At present cutting in Alabama is in the neighborhood of 2,000,000,000 board feet of lumber a year. The amazing thing about this is that it comes from lands producing less than half of their capacity. Production can best be increased through good silvicultural practices. This means better cutting practices, adequate protection, particularly with reference to wildfire, and artificial reforestation in some instances.

Frequently when comparing the value of wood to other agricultural crops the figures used for wood are those representing the stumpage value of wood removed from farm woodlots. This practice is, of course, erroneous since the true picture cannot be obtained without considering all the wood harvested regardless of land ownership. Furthermore, if comparisons as to value are to be drawn between agricultural crops, they must be made at comparable production levels. For example, one cannot feasibly compare the stumpage value of wood with the ginned value of cotton. If a comparison is to be made with ginned cotton, wood should be evaluated at the green lumber, raw pulp, or similar production stages of other wood products.

Table 3 sets forth the annual values of Alabama wood products at production levels comparable to ginned cotton. As shown in the table, the annual value of these raw products is approximately $209,300,000. In comparison, the annual value of cotton lint and cottonseed produced in Alabama is approximately $202,000,000.

Table 4 gives the values at comparable levels of production for wood and other leading agricultural crops. Table 4 clearly illustrates the importance of wood to the agricultural economy of the State. When acres of forest land are considered as well as raw material value, wood is indubitably Alabama's No. 1 agricultural crop.

The International Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, our colleague, the Honorable LAURIE BATTLE, of Birmingham, Ala., has written a very interesting and thought-provoking article entitled "The International Crisis" which deals with current world problems.

Mr. BATTLE's article appeared in the August 1950 issue of the Merchants Journal. I include the article and commend it to the attention of the House:

THE INTERNATIONAL CRISIS—"WE FACE A LONG-DRAWN-OUT FIGHT FOR OUR EXISTENCE"

(By LAURIE C. BATTLE, Member of Congress from Jefferson County)

As we go about our daily work, thoughts of the international crisis in Korea hang over our heads like an ominous shadow and dominate all of our thinking and activity. It has been over 6 weeks since the Russian-inspired invasion of South Korea, and since the United Nations went into action to repel the invaders.

The safest estimate of this international crisis is that we face a long-drawn-out fight for our existence. Russia is determined to dominate the world one way or another. Her tactics in Korea show the world that she is willing to do it by armed aggression if she cannot accomplish it by insidous infiltration. We face an all-out war if Russia goes much further, or we face the temptation of false security when we win temporary victories. They are equally dangerous and we must be prepared to meet either contingency.

Yet we still believe and pray that the fighting in Korea can be isolated and prevented from spreading into world war III. If this can be done, then we should be capable mentally, spiritually, and physically of bringing about a new era of peace and prosperity because we will have learned that it is necessary to stop aggression before it gets started and threatens the peace and security of the world.

Ever since being in Congress, and particularly since becoming a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee last session, I have suggested and urged that we initiate a stronger policy in the Far East. We did not do so. On the contrary, we gave the Russians an open invitation to go into Korea by stating openly that we would not defend it. Then, of course, they did go into Korea. So we found ourselves faced with the dire prospect of Russia taking over the entire Far East, country by country, as she overran the countries in the west; faced with the reality of Russia getting stronger by the day, while we were becoming more and more impotent. Soon Russia would have been in a position to make a devastating atomic-bomb attack on the United States. We are hopeful that our eyes have been opened in time.

Now for the first time in history, the United Nations' flag is flying over international troops and we, the United States, have been called on to lead this bold venture. It is the first time the Security Council has authorized military action against an aggressor nation. Although America is carrying most of the load now the weight of the other nations on our side will be felt more and more as time goes by. It must be remembered that other fronts are in danger as well as Korea. This action to stop Russia is all the more important when we realize that no single nation can prevent war and preserve peace throughout the world by herself. This action by the United Nations was possible only because of a Russian blunder. When Russia boycotted the Security Council and withheld her usual veto, she made it possible for the Council to take firm, swift, and constructive action in behalf of what is right and honest and decent in the world—in behalf of peace and democracy. Now Russia has realized that blunder, and has returned to the Council tables of the United Nations. It is my deep and sincere hope that she will not be able to block the United Nations' valiant efforts for world peace.

As a result of the tragic invasion of Korea, we should learn the hard lesson that it will be necessary in the future for us to abandon the policy of retaliation and invest our time, money and efforts in a policy of war prevention. Our whole defense is built on the basis of retaliation, on the basis of what we will do after we have been attacked. Our policy has been to wait, to sit back, to take a beating, and then struggle to our feet and whip the offending bully. We have always been saved by time, distance, and strong allies. But we have none of these things between us and the enemy now, and we had better not count on them.

We must first strengthen ourselves, and continue to speed the building up of our Armed Forces so that we will be second to none in power. We must keep developing our equipment so that it will be second to none, and continue an extensive program of research, especially on the atom and hydrogen bombs, guided missiles, and so forth. The stronger we make ourselves, the more dependable we make our allies. And we are in real need of dependable allies.

On the home front, we must gear our economy for the greatest production to help back up our boys on the fighting front. As we see industrial mobilization coming on, we realize that some controls are going to be necessary to insure stability, protection and fair treatment for all. The main lesson in controls that we learned the hard way in World War II is the interdependence of one economic factor upon another. It is impossible to control one segment of our economy without throwing the whole system out of kelter. For example, a policy of priorities and allocations without price control is an open invitation to inflation and economic disaster. Likewise, the price of pork should not be controlled unless the price of corn which the hogs eat is also controlled, and so on.

As this is being written there is much confusion because the President has insisted on allocation, priorities, and credit control, while there has been a demand throughout the country for price and wage controls. Many groups are strongly in favor of controlling every group except their own. However, some groups have advocated complete overall controls on themselves as well as everybody else on the basis that this is the fairest course and the best method of insuring a quick victory. They feel it is also the best way to insure relief from burdensome controls when they are no longer needed, as everybody will be for the repeal of them at that time.

As I said before, if the successful conclusion of this crisis takes total industrial and military mobilization, then I am for it. Time will tell whether or not Stalin is going to set fire to the houses in other critical areas around the world. If this happens, an all-out economic effort will be absolutely necessary to insure military victory. In such case I believe that every segment of our society should share the burden of controls equally. We are now debating this vital issue in the House, and I hope this body will have sufficient time, courage, and insight to arrive at a workable bill that will do the job. We cannot afford to fall short.

In order to keep our economy sound enough to withstand the strain that is being placed on it, a "pay as we go" policy should be adopted immediately. We have a debt of nearly $264,000,000,000 already, and we must not lose the peace by ruining our economy. This would mean a Communist victory, too. The only chance we have of avoiding an economic disaster is to pay as we go. This will necessitate the raising of taxes to meet the demands. In addition to being the soundest policy, it would not be fair to ask our boys to fight a war and then return home to carry the brunt of the war debt.

And what if we are successful in localizing this Korean war. Suppose we take all the immediate steps I have discussed, strengthen our Armed Forces, mobilize our industry, maintain a sound economy, and whip the Communists in Korea. What can we expect for the future?

The loss of lives in Korea today should indicate to us that our foreign policy has fallen down somewhere, and something should be done about it. The responsibility of shaping the course of democracy in the free world we are striving for is too grave a burden for the Executive alone. Our foreign policy must be built on a broader base which will not only bring trained minds with varying backgrounds into use, but will produce a medium through which the public and Congress will feel a direct participation in the formulation of policies which affect them so directly and which they are later called upon to support. To accomplish this purpose I have introduced a bill calling for the creation of a Foreign Affairs Advisory Commission to advise and consult with the President, and thereby broaden the base on which our policy is formed. The Commission would be composed of 12 members, broadly representative of the public and well-informed in national and international affairs, including representatives of the Congress and the Executive. Through this Commission, responsibility would be broadened, and, I believe, a means provided for giving the public and Congress added confidence in the foreign side of our national policy.

What other steps can we take to advance toward the peaceful world we all long for? Annually we spend billions of dollars on our Armed Forces for defense—including the operation of two great academies, Naval and Military, for preparing our officers for war. Why can't we spend a few pennies, relatively speaking, toward the prevention of these wars? I have introduced a bill in Congress which I feel would make a positive investment in peace by establishing an Academy on World Affairs. I propose that this academy train some of our best people from all walks of life and from every section of the country, in national and international relations, so that they may represent our Government ably in the international field. They should be chosen on a basis of merit through open, competitive examinations. To whatever tasks they set themselves, whether in foreign service or here at home, these experts trained in world affairs would help spread enlightened ideas and make a real contribution to world peace.

Freedom-loving people the world over should press the advantage of our combined peace offensive. When today's fight is won—as it will be—let us not stop short of reorganizing the United Nations to make it capable of preventing war under any conditions. World peace must not depend upon a wrong move or blunder by Russia, or by any other greedy nation. Hitler proved that the waiting, appeasement process is too costly and deadly. World peace must be won and preserved by the right moves of America, the UN, and the freedom-loving countries everywhere. I have introduced House Concurrent Resolution 15, calling for the revision of the United Nations Charter to make it capable of preventing war. Otherwise, we are going to find ourselves in a constant struggle for existence, under a progressively higher tax load and in a regimented economy. The UN must be made able to actively take effective police action against aggressor nations. We must equip the UN with a fire alarm system that can detect the smoke of an international clash before it breaks into a four-alarm fire. If we can give the UN a police force—it could serve as the fire department to put out these conflagrations while they are still in the smoldering stage.

There is one very important sphere of action in which we can all take part, which we should not overlook when we are drawing the blueprints for a peaceful world. The idealistic and the best solution to our international difficulties would be a moral reawakening throughout the world. That places a tremendous responsibility upon our religious and political leaders, as well as on each one of us; a responsibility which to date has not been successfully met. Until such time as we are successful in bringing about conditions where nations truly feel that they are their brother's keeper, and until nations will follow the golden rule of "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you," it will be necessary for us to stay adequately prepared to stop an aggressor nation before it attacks us, and it will be necessary to create a police force for the United Nations to keep law and order. These things are necessary in the smallest community. They are also necessary in our world community.

With an all-out effort now to localize this present crisis, together with long-range positive steps for peace as I have outlined, namely, reversal of our retaliation policy, strong armed forces and sound economic policies at home, establishment of a Foreign Affairs Advisory Commission, creation of an Academy on World Affairs, strengthening of the United Nations, and the encouragement of a moral reawakening, I believe we can look forward with more assurance to the peaceful world community we all hope and pray for.

Ladies' Auxiliary, Ancient Order of Hibernians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following resolutions adopted by the Ladies' Auxiliary to the Ancient Order of Hibernians of America, while in convention assembled, Boston, Mass., August 1–4, 1950:

FOR YOUR CONSIDERATION

At the recent sixty-fifth biennial national convention of the Ladies' Auxiliary, Ancient Order of Hibernians of America, held in Boston, Mass., the following resolutions were adopted, which we wish to bring to your attention:

Resolved, That we, the delegates to the national convention of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America, as citizens of the United States of America, interested in our country's independence, honor, and prosperity, whose sons, brothers, sisters, and husbands served in our Nation's Armed Forces in two World Wars, declare anew our allegiance to the Constitution of the United States of America and our confidence in its elected officers; be it further

Resolved, That we, remembering that we protested at another convention of this organization a few years ago, against the recognition and support which our National Government was giving to the godless and tyrannical Government of Soviet Russia, renew our denunciation of communism, whether it is in Russia, its satellite states, or under cover in our own beloved country. We deplore the tendency to support the admission of Communist China into the United Nations because of the terrible consequences which will be sure to result from such betrayal of Christian civilization, as we know that communism everywhere is engaged in a war on God, and His sacred law, and is tireless in its efforts to enslave the souls of human beings and destroy all religion; and be it further

Resolved, That we again arraign the Government of England in the court of public opinion, for having arbitrarily dismembered the Ancient Irish Nation by the Partition Act of 1920, and for having set up a puppet government, which it persists in subsidizing and supporting in the six separated counties of northeast Ulster—a government which brazenly proclaims its un-Christian hatred of the Catholic people in that area, and which continues to violate openly those lofty principles to which England's spokesmen gave lip service while the recent war was in progress and the outcome was still in doubt; and be it further

Resolved, That we express our strong and indignant disapproval as citizens and taxpayers of the United States to the pouring uncondtionally of billions of dollars of the American people's money into the English imperial treasury, while any part of this money is used to bolster up the puppet Government of Northern Ireland, and to prolong the partition of the little island. We demand, as we have a right to do, that financial aid to England be stopped until she abolishes the unnatural boundary in Ireland and restores the six separated counties to the pepole of Ireland and withdraws her garrison from northeast Ulster; and be it further

Resolved, That we request the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives to report favorably on the Fogarty resolution (H. Res. No. 270) now under consideration by the committee, and we exhort the Members of the House, as a matter of justice to the people of Ireland (the truest friends of the United States in the world) and in vindication of avowed American principles, to vote for the adoption of the resolution when it is presented to them for their approval.

Resolved, That the national convention of the ladies' auxiliary to the Ancient Order of Hibernians deplore such socialistic tendencies as the system of medical care, commonly called socialized medicine and sincerely hope that proposed legislation to put such a system into effect be rejected by Congress as detrimental to the health and well-being of all citizens of our country; be it further

Resolved, That we pledge support of Federal aid to education, which provides for all children without discrimination; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of pertinent resolutions be sent to the President of these United States, the Vice President, Secretary of State Dean Acheson; Secretary of the United Nations Trygve Lie; ECA Administrator Paul Hoffman; the chairmen of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate; and the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, and to every Congressman and Senator in these United States.

TERESA L. SCHAAF,
National Secretary.

Wisconsin Convention of Loyal Order of Moose

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 6 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, last Saturday night, September 2, it was my great pleasure to deliver an address before the Wisconsin State Association of the Loyal Order of the Moose. As a member of this organization I have always had the highest admiration for the great fraternal and humanitarian endeavors of this fine, renowned group. We of Wisconsin are particularly proud that a native son, Mr. Willis E. Donley, of Menomonie, has served as supreme governor of the Loyal Order in addition to serving in many other capacities in this splendid organization.

The Racine lodge was host to the convention, and I feel that, aided by the fine work of Convention Chairman Alfred E. La France, they really did themselves proud.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a list of the State officers of the Loyal Order of the Moose in Wisconsin, a list of the officers of the Racine lodge and of their grand auxiliary and, finally, the text of the address which I delivered on September 2.

There being no objection, the address, together with the roster of officers, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOOSE STATE OFFICERS

OFFICERS, RACINE LODGE, No. 437

OFFICERS OF WOMEN OF THE MOOSE AUXILIARY, CHAPTER 631

Mrs. Dorothy Benwell, junior graduate regent; Mrs. Esther Andersen, senior regent; Mrs. Alvina Stroschine, junior regent; Mrs. Irene Andersen, chaplain; Mrs. Adeline Christensen, recorder; Mrs. Viola Fine, treasurer; Miss Bessie Lorentsen, sentinel; Mrs. Margaret Kohlman, argus; Mrs. Dorothy Heegeman, guide; Mrs. Jean Clausen, assistant guide.

THE VOLUNTARY STATE VERSUS THE COMPULSORY STATE

(By Senator ALEXANDER WILEY)

I am profoundly grateful to have the pleasure of being with you today in this critical hour of American history. To be a Moose has always been a source of cherished pride for me; for me to address the Moose is a particular honor.

Once more members of this great organization are going forth to do battle for their country. I want, therefore, at the very outset to express what I know is the prayer of all of this assembled multitude and my own prayer that our Moose members, like our other Americans, return safe and sound from the battle for freedom to which they have gone and to which others will go in the days and months up ahead.

I would, indeed, like to discuss with you today the issues arising out of the tremendous world storm in which we find ourselves. There is, however, so very much in the newspapers and over the radio on this issue that I thought that perhaps we might devote our principal attention instead to the major domestic issues of our time.

However, let me, in passing, just say a brief word concerning the war clouds hovering over the horizon. Naturally every one of us prays that we can prevent the Korean conflict from spreading into a third world war. We know that total war would not really solve any problem. It would only bring new catastrophes of disease, revolution, civil war, and countless other disorders.

WE HAVE NO DESIRE TO DROP ATOMIC BOMBS ON RUSSIA

I have been particularly disturbed at some of the recent loose talk about our taking the initiative and "dropping atomic bombs on Russia," as if that could in a jiffy wipe out all our problems overnight. On the contrary, if we were to take the aggressive, we would not only lose the support of the civilized world but we would let ourselves in for a horrible conflict whose end results no man could see. We would be inviting retaliation bombings of American cities and the mass extermination of millions of our people.

To bomb Russian centers of communism would not eliminate communism from the world. Far from it. Communism, a fanatic, godless crusade, as well as other false isms, would breed on the very conditions of chaos that would result from an American-Russian conflict.

WE MUST HAVE PEACE BASED ON PREPAREDNESS

Our aim, therefore, must continue to be to strive for peace. A peace based on American preparedness, a peace based on the eradication of the Communist menace here at home, a peace based on realistic diplomacy, a peace based on no secret dealings on absolute cooperation with our allies and getting from them willing sacrifices similar to those which we are giving.

Our hearts naturally go out to every American boy fighting in Korea today, and to those allied forces which have already been committed there.

THE SINGLE GREAT DOMESTIC ISSUE

Now, returning to domestic affairs, may I in a nonpartisan and nonpersonal way respectfully submit to you a few facts as I see them on the most important issue facing our people today. I do so with the full recognition that this is an issue which transcends political parties just as the Moose itself is a nonpartisan, nonsectarian, nonpolitical organization. I think, therefore, that regardless of our particular political or religious faith, regardless of our personal backgrounds, you and I can definitely agree that the major issue of our times in the domestic scene is this:

SHALL WE HAVE A VOLUNTARY STATE OR SHALL WE HAVE A COMPULSORY STATE?

Shall we have a state in which individuals can join whatever groups they please, to take actions as they please (so long as they do not harm their neighbors), or shall government decide what the individual should do, where he should work, how much he should earn, where he should worship, if anywhere, what groups he should be associated with, and so forth?

Shall we have a state of "you must" or a state of "you can," a state in which great organizations like the Moose can continue, or shall we have a state in which government presumes that it knows everything and that it can, therefore, eliminate organizations like the Moose? Now, my friends, you and I know the magnificent humanitarian works of this organization. A mere mention of the name house of God or Mooseheaven or Mooseheart brings to mind the great civic contributions which have been made by the Moose. You did not take actions in setting up these great centers of humanitarian endeavors at the order of government. You decided to do so in your own individual Moose lodge, and so did your brother Moose across the country. Now, my friends, if the sphere of government is to be expanded indefinitely, then there will be no place in the America of tomorrow for an organization such as this. Then we will have a Government which thinks it knows everything, and which does everything, says everything, decides everything. We will have a one-party state, a one-clique-in-control state.

DICTATORSHIP DANGER IS NO EXAGGERATION

Does that sound fantastic, improbable? No, my friends, it is the whole trend of these times at home and abroad. Call it statism or totalitarianism or what you will, the end results are the same.

I have faith in the individual wisdom of 150,000,000 American citizens. I have faith in the charitableness of their hearts, in their deep humanitarian convictions. I have faith that they will come to the right decision on political, economic, and social issues. I do not, however, have such faith in government if it arrogates unto itself all power. I do not believe that if government is given monopolistic authority that it will come to similar right decisions—on insurance, on health, on one thousand and one other issues.

WE DO NEED SOME GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Now you and I know, my friends, that individuals acting together or in groups cannot entirely meet the problem of old-age assistance, of child welfare, aid to the blind, aid to orphans, and a thousand other social fields. We have come to expect that the Federal, State, and local governments would take an increasing participation in these humanitarian endeavors. But we have firmly resolved that it is infinitely better for individuals and individual groups to handle the needs of our people by themselves to the greatest extent possible rather than to have government horn into everything.

VOTERS OF ALL PARTIES SHOULD THINK THIS ISSUE THROUGH

To a considerable extent, the coming election in November 1950 will be decided on this issue and so will the Presidential election in 1952. Will we have the voluntary state or the compulsory state? The state in which individuals are supreme, individual dignity, individual initiative, individual resourcefulness. Or will we have a state in which the government knows everything, decides everything, judges everything, orders everything? It is your decision to make, my brothers. Think it out, review it carefully, and then go to the polls and act according to your individual conscience.

In recent years, there has come an increasing reliance upon government, particularly the Federal Government. To a certain extent this has been necessary, particularly in time of war. It has been necessary, yes, in times of domestic depression because it took efforts of the Federal Government to help bring us out of the situation where tens of millions of Americans walked the streets unemployed. However, we do not want to work ourselves into a condition where the Federal Government will hog the whole show perpetually. We do not want any individual in Washington or anywhere else to set up conditions so as to make Federal intervention, Federal meddling, Federal snooping perpetual.

The voluntary state means inevitably a friendly state. A state where men can get together on the basis of common interests or common spiritual convictions, to do deeds of good will. Under the compulsory state there would be no room for such actions.

DO BILLS LEAD TO VOLUNTARY OR COMPULSORY STATE?

And so I want to leave this message to you today. It is more of a challenge than actually a conclusion. I challenge you to think on this paramount issue. I challenge you, whether you be Republican or Democrat, to evaluate bills in your Congress on this basis: Does it contribute to the voluntary state or does it further the trend to the compulsory state?

You know, my friends, there are over 15,000 bills which have been introduced in the Congress thus far. Some of those bills are good, others are very bad indeed. The latter would push Government more and more into the field of private enterprise at a staggering cost to the Treasurer and would push voluntary initiative almost completely out of the picture. This trend toward the compulsory state must be halted. During wartime there is a particular tendency, however, to move in the opposite direction, to move toward complete Government monopoly on everything. We must be wary lest that tendency continue unchecked.

EVALUATING CANDIDATES IN NONPARTISAN WAY

Yes, my friends, when you go to the polls in November, I challenge you to think. Ask yourself in a nonpartisan way: Am I voting for a candidate who is pledged to a compulsory state or a candidate who is pledged to a voluntary state? Mark you, my friends, that a candidate who is pledged for the compulsory state 9 times out of 10 will not indicate that he is for the ultimate elimination of individual enterprise. On the contrary, he will couch his position usually in terms of glittering generalities, in terms of the illusion of temporary benefits; but the end result of his recommendations (whether he realizes it or not) will be the compulsory state. A state in which socialized medicine, socialized farming, socialized business, socialized education—yes, even socialized religion—will exist.

CONCLUSION

I respectfully submit to you that if you evaluate men on the above standards of the tendency of their decisions you will come out with the right conclusion.

It has been a real pleasure to be with you today, and I want to wish you continuing great success in our wonderful Wisconsin Moose organization.

Criticism of the Marine Corps by the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 6 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Writer Says Truman Has Committed Worst Blunder in Career," written by David Lawrence and published in the Washington Evening Star of September 6, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WRITER SAYS TRUMAN HAS COMMITTED WORST BLUNDER IN CAREER—MARINE CORPS BELITTLED WHILE FIGHTING IN KOREA IN TRADITIONAL MANNER

(By David Lawrence)

President Truman has committed perhaps the worst blunder of his career—one that no other President of the United States ever committed since the foundation of the Republic.

Mr. Truman has belittled the United States Marine Corps. He has done so at a time when the marines are fighting in Korea with a spirit and an efficiency in keeping with their traditions.

For the Commander in Chief of the Armed Services in the midst of active military operations to denounce any branch of the service as possessing a "propaganda machine that is almost equal to Stalin's" is to disregard morale and spirit altogether and accuse that service of deceit, fraud, and distortion of the truth.

For Stalin's propaganda machine, lately exemplified by Yakov Malik, is an object of scorn throughout the world, and to imply that the Marine Corps has been lying about its magnificent record of fighting throughout American history is to insult the tens of thousands of marines who lie buried under white crosses in all parts of the world where they have fought so bravely.

WHOLLY INACCURATE

The President went further—he made a contemptuous and wholly inaccurate statement about the status of the Marine Corps itself. He spoke of it as "the Navy's police force," when the unification law specifically gives the Marine Corps the status of a separate unit of the armed services. To speak of the marines as just policemen who guard the decks of warships or do police duty ashore is to overlook entirely their position or their quality as a mobile fighting force. They happen to be attached to the Navy from a jurisdictional standpoint, but this does not mean they act for the Navy alone.

The Marine Corps was not a mere police force when its members turned the tide of battle at Chateau Thierry in World War I and there wasn't a warship of the Navy within a hundred miles of the place where the critical battle was fought.

The Marine Corps was not a mere police force as its foot soldiers swarmed on the beaches of Iwo Jima in World War II in one of the deadliest battles of all history and raised the flag on Mount Suribachi on February 23, 1945. The picture of this achievement is embedded in the minds of all Americans as one of the most dramatic scenes in the history of the United States.

The Marine Corps was not a mere police force of the Navy as its men unflinchingly moved straight into bullets and artillery fire as they landed on the beaches in waves at Tarawa, Guam, Saipan, and Guadalcanal. Marines dropped by the thousands in their tracks, but their comrades never faltered.

WHAT AROUSED IRE?

What have the Marines done to arouse the ire of President Truman? Nobody here can account for Mr. Truman's outburst of temper—his own office associates say they never saw the communication before it was mailed. It was written in response to a respectful plea from Representative MCDONOUGH, of California, Republican, who urged that the Marine Corps Commandant be added to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Mr. Truman didn't know apparently that this very same proposal had been approved by roll-call vote unanimously on February 28 last by the 31 members of the House Armed Services Committee—Democrats as well as Republicans. The recommendation read as follows:

"The Joint Chiefs of Staff structure, as now constituted, does not insure at all times adequate consideration for the views of all services. The committee will sponsor legislation to require rotation of the position of chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff among the services after a 2-year term, and to add the Commandant of the Marine Corps to the Joint Chiefs of Staff as a member thereof."

Mr. Truman in his letter to Representative MCDONOUGH made a curious comment to the effect that "when the Marine Corps goes into the Army, it works with and for the Army and that is the way it should be." But there is no provision in law for the Marine Corps to be taken over by the Army. It works with the Army on joint operations, just as the Navy does or the Air Force does, but Congress specified by law that the Marine Corps was not to be absorbed by any other service or lose its identity.

Mr. Truman declares defiantly that as long as he is President the Marine Corps will remain as just the Navy's police force. This is not the kind of message to be broadcast to the marines now in the fox holes of Korea—nor is it a message to send to the mothers and fathers and relatives of the marines who have died in the service of their country.

Mr. Truman can't impair the glorious record of the Marines. He has only succeeded in impairing his own prestige as Commander in Chief of America's armed services.

Address by Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 6 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a news release of an address I made before the fall meeting of the Pomona Grange, at Washington, Pa.

There being no objection, the news release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, PA., September 5.—Controls needed to stabilize the national economy and to prevent inflation in the present war emergency should be made clear across the board, United States Senator MARTIN said here this afternoon.

In an address before the fall meeting of the Pomona Grange of Washington County, Senator MARTIN declared that controls to be effective must be imposed not only on prices but also on wages and profits at the same time.

"We all know that controls are an encroachment upon individual liberty," Senator MARTIN said, "but they must be resorted to as a means of safeguarding the worker and the farmer from the dangers of runaway prices and a shrinking dollar.

"It is a part of patriotism to give up a portion of our freedom in order to help preserve the essential liberties and freedom of the individual which have made us a great nation.

"It is my firm conviction that less liberty is taken away from the people if ceilings are imposed on prices, wages, and profits simultaneously so that the effects will be shared equally by all elements in our Nation.

"At the same time we must be watchful that wartime restrictions are not extended beyond the period of emergency.

"We have been forced by Communist aggression in Korea into a period when all of us must be prepared for willing sacrifice to build our Nation's defensive strength.

"Freedom in the world is facing its supreme test. We must approach the grim task ahead with full realization that we are fighting a war for survival.

"Nothing less than total victory will preserve the Christian ideals upon which our Republic was founded from destruction by the godless forces of tyranny and dictatorship.

"There will be tragic days ahead. There will be times of discouragement and disappointment. We will have to do without many of the things we now enjoy. We will be required to pay drastically increased taxes and Government services will be sharply curtailed.

"One of the great dangers we face here at home is the threat of inflation which shrinks the value of all earnings and places a heavy burden upon every household.

"Congress has given the President broad powers to fix prices and wages and to control credits so as to check the inflationary pressure.

"But to my mind, to be effective, the necessary controls, allocations, and priorities should not be imposed piecemeal but clear across the board. I am hopeful that the President will recognize the wisdom of that method in order that the people may have to give up no more of their precious liberty than is absolutely necessary.

"In the present emergency and in preparation for the future two things should be kept in mind by the people.

"First, we should follow the time-tested military maxim not to divide our forces.

"We must be united, keeping our strength consolidated and working with the same patriotic objective in view.

"Second, we must remember that 90 percent of the strength of an army or a country is morale.

"We are fighting in a righteous cause.

"We are fighting to uphold the doctrine of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness as a divine endowment granted by Almighty God to all mankind.

"We are fighting to preserve the dignity and the freedom of the individual and the sacred right of religious freedom.

"What is our duty as individuals and as inheritors of a great patriotic tradition?

"Moral and spiritual strength here at home are just as important as military strength on the battlefield.

"I am proud that the membership of the Grange, more than any other group in the United States, represents clean living, God-fearing, 100-percent Americanism.

"Your organization can wield powerful influence to stamp out profiteering, black markets, and all other forms of racketeering, chiseling, and law evasion.

"You can take a place of leadership for good citizenship, good government, and a deeper appreciation of the blessings of the American way of life.

"With faith in God's goodness and with firm resolve to serve our country, each of us, in his own humble way, can contribute to victory."

Confusion in the Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 6 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a thought-provoking article entitled "MacArthur and Matthews Statements Reveal Confusion in the Administration," written by Dorothy Thompson, and published in the Washington Evening Star of September 5, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR AND MATTHEWS STATEMENTS REVEAL CONFUSION IN THE ADMINISTRATION

(By Dorothy Thompson)

General MacArthur's message to the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the speech of Navy Secretary Matthews, in Boston, revealed the confusion that exists in the inner circles of our Government. General MacArthur had to be told that the White House was running foreign policy, and Mr. Matthews had to be rebuked by the State Department.

General MacArthur seems to think that the war in Korea is fought for the strategic defense of the United States in the Pacific. It is not odd that he should think so, because he recently commanded many Americans who fought World War II in the Pacific, from island to island, on the thesis that those islands were essential to Pacific defense against an American enemy in Asia. That is why they died on them.

If that was true from 1941 to 1945, then General MacArthur seems to think it is still true, since geography is singularly free of ideological prejudices. If it wasn't true from 1941 to 1945, an explanation would seem to be in order as to why we fought World War II at all.

MAC ARTHUR CALLED RIGHT

Of course, General MacArthur is absolutely right—on the thesis of World War II. Formosa, in the hands of a hostile power, would be just what he says it would: "An unsinkable aircraft carrier and submarine tender, ideally located to accomplish offensive strategy and checkmate defensive or counteroffensive operations based on Okinawa and the Philippines."

What the general apparently does not realize is that the United States is not fighting nowaday for its own defense. This time we are fighting against sin, for peace, and for the United Nations. These United Nations (without Russia) want us to defend Korea against aggression, but don't want us to defend Formosa, which belongs to China. It belongs to China, because two men at Cairo took it from the Japanese and gave it to the China of Chiang Kai-shek, and it now belongs to Mao Tse-tung, because he took China from Chiang.

Under no circumstances has the United States, who won control of it by the most bloody sacrifices, any claim to it at all. For the United States has abandoned all claims herself, anywhere, in favor of being a global policeman under order of the UN. We no longer have any initiative of our own.

Apparently, we may not decide to let the people of Formosa determine their own fate and withdraw, if they choose, from both the Chiang and the Mao governments to the status of the Philippines. That would taint us with imperialism, no matter how much it might please Formosans. And anyway the decision lies with UN.

MERCENARY ARMIES

The members of UN who want us to be policemen don't want us to engage ourselves deeply in Asia because tomorrow or next day they will need our services in Europe, or the Middle East, or the Mediterranean, or Africa. For the world's greatest power is now up to furnishing mercenary armies of its citizens to carry out UN orders, with whose approval all wars are noble (and for peace) and without whose approval all wars are evil and aggressive.

Mr. Matthews also doesn't grasp the point. He thinks we should go to war directly against Russia and knock out the spider in the central web. Thereafter we could get another UN—one which would work.

This is logical, too, provided Mr. Matthews has a notion of how to win a war against 800,000,000 people occupying the vast central land mass of Eurasia, and how we could get the approval of the free nations in between, whose territory and populations would be involved. For it is their approval that makes a war good or bad.

Military logic, strategical defense, practical considerations—of calculated risk, and possible victory or defeat—no longer determine American policy. We may not choose, extend, or limit our objectives, because we have abandoned American objectives, in favor of war for peace—on any ground chosen by the adversary.

That everybody, even in the inner circles of our Government, has not fully grasped the implications of this policy is not astonishing.

We doubt whether the President has grasped them either.

Federal Aid to Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 6 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Lowell Mellett in behalf of the Federal aid to education bill, which appeared in the Washington Evening Star of Tuesday, September 5, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BOYS THE COUNTRY HAS FAILED TO EDUCATE CANNOT NOW BE USED

(By Lowell Mellett)

What awful irony there is in the statement of Chairman VINSON of the House Armed Services Committee that intelligence standards may have to be lowered in order to bring our fighting forces up to the number now required. And his further statement that pending such action, because of the immediate need for men, young fathers, and others with dependents may have to give up their exemption or deferment status—those, that is, who can meet the IQ tests of Selective Service. And the intimidation of Major General Hershey, head of Selective Service, that it may be necessary to draft again veterans of World War II. The last group of young citizens presumably have the required intelligence, or education, or they wouldn't be veterans.

SHOULD NOT BE SURPRISE

The irony in this is that some millions of America's underprivileged boys are having forced upon them the privilege of staying out of the war. An unintentional working out of a curious kind of justice, perhaps. The country, having failed to educate them sufficiently, cannot use them as soldiers.

Reports of rejections by draft boards have been truly depressing as they reflect the condition, physical and mental, of the Nation's manpower. In some localities, it is said, 6 out of 10 of those called up have been declared unfit. Senator BYRD, of Virginia, remarked on this in a speech to the American Legion the other day, but didn't indicate that the State he rules intends to do anything about it, although it ranks among the country's tail enders in the matter of education and public-health expenditures.

This state of affairs may be a shock to Congress, but it should not be a surprise. It was revealed by the draft in World War II and Congress has been reminded of it in every session since. It has been the most compelling argument offered in behalf of Federal aid to education legislation and in behalf of various plans to improve the Nation's health. But it hasn't been compelling enough. Other considerations have seemed to outweigh it.

BILL HANGS IN COMMITTEE

So as Congress now prepares to adjourn, there remains in a House committee the one best bill ever offered to meet the problem. It is a bill endorsed not only by the President but by virtually all of the country's educators; a bill passed by the Republican Senate in the Eightieth Congress and by the Democratic Senate in the present Congress, a bill that is completely nonpartisan even in its authorship. It is a bill that would be passed by a resounding majority of the House if it ever reached the floor.

But it hangs high and dry in a committee, whose chairman has contrived to make a religious issue of it. The bill would appropriate $300,000,000 annually to aid State educational systems, largely in proportion to need and almost wholly through the public schools. It would permit those few States that assist parochial schools in such matters as transportation and health services, however, to follow their own laws in that respect. The chairman in question chooses to consider this an infringement on our historic separation of church and state. The dispute, ridiculous as it is, has become so warm that the House leaders have been happy to set it aside for another year.

Even if enacted now, of course, this legislation would not affect the situation faced by Selective Service this year or next year. But we are doing many things now on the theory that we may be in for a long war or, at least, a long period of armed preparedness. For that reason the present stupid stalemate over the education bill should be ended and at once.

Listen, Look, and Stop

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 6 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Listen, Look, and Stop," published in the September 6, 1950, issue of the New York Times.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LISTEN, LOOK, AND STOP

Proponents of the McCarran antisubversive bill, which the Senate is now debating, are reported to expect that not more than a dozen votes will be cast against it. If this prediction should prove to be true, we can only believe that not many more than a dozen Senators will have read the text of the measure before voting upon it. For it is hard to believe that any thoughtful Member of Congress who loves freedom, liberty, and democracy as much as he hates communism could support this bill once he has a clear understanding of its contents.

The McCarran bill (S. 4037) is only the worst of a number of antisubversive measures now up for consideratoin. It is all-inclusive, embracing as it does the contents of five separate bills (plus a few new proposals) which deal with everything from registration of Communists to establishment of a new Passport and Visa Bureau in the Department of State. To be sure, some of the provisions of this omnibus bill are desirable, strengthening as they do the existing laws against espionage and violation of military security. But it would be a perversion of the legislative process if the need for this additional protection against specific acts were used as a cloak for the introduction of drastic restrictions, as far-reaching as they are unnecessary, on the basic rights of all Americans. And this we believe is what the McCarran bill (and, for that matter, the less-inclusive Mundt-Ferguson and Wood bills) could do, potentially.

The stated objectives of these measures are, of course, the objectives of all of us who want democracy to live and to prosper. In addition to stopping the aggression of Communist imperialism, we want to neutralize the power to do harm of the Communists within our gates. But surely the way to succeed in this purpose is not to impose such curbs of freedom of speech and press and political association as to render suspect all but the most orthodox, the most conformist. That is not the way democracy grew to its present strength and that is not the way democracy will survive.

As we have stated previously, it is our view that the language of these bills is so broad as to be dangerous, the registration provisions self-defeating, the immigration proposals antidemocratic, and the restrictions on foreign diplomats unnecessary. In their desire, which we share, to do everything possible to defend the security of the United States, neither Congress nor the public should automatically approve every measure that is labeled "antisubversive." What is subversion to Senator McCarran may not be subversion to President Truman, FBI Director Hoover, or Attorney General McGrath. Perhaps that is one reason why the Justice Department has opposed the McCarran bill. In any case, Congress owes it to itself and to the Nation not to be frightened into passage of ill-considered, sweeping laws such as S. 4037, which can do deep and permanent injury to our most treasured institutions.

Thinking of Buying a Home?—Plan Carefully Before Applying for Loan, Cautions VA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, an interesting article appeared in the August 1950 issue of the Gold Star with reference to direct home loans for veterans of World War II, who live in areas of this country where 4-percent financing from private sources is not obtainable. I include the article:

In the face of today's record housing boom and era of easy mortgage financing, Veterans' Administrator Carl R. Gray, Jr., has issued a word of caution to the 13,000,000 World War II veterans who still are eligible for VA-guaranteed home loans under the GI bill.

First and foremost, General Gray emphasizes that veterans should fully understand that a GI loan, like any other loan, must be repaid.

"The VA guaranty, which protects the lender against loss, encourages him to make the loan at a very low interest rate and with only a small or no down payment," Gray states. "But if you fail to make the payments you agree to make, the VA must pay the loss to the lender, and the amount paid by the VA must be repaid by you. Any compensation or pension to which you may be entitled could be withheld in whole or in part until such debt is satisfied."

The Veterans' Administrator also warns the veteran against taking on an obligation too heavy for him to carry. In addition to the monthly payments of interest and principal, he pointed out that the veteran homeowner also must meet the cost of real estate taxes, insurance, repairs, heat, light, water, and other utilities.

Advising strongly against rushing into what may prove to be an ill-advised purchase, Gray reminded veterans that they have until July 25, 1957, to use their right to a guaranteed loan.

Now that the postwar housing shortage is easing off, the Administrator urged veterans to shop carefully before they buy, to make sure they will be satisfied with the quality and condition of the home and its equipment.

While VA makes every effort to assure that the veteran pays only a reasonable price for the home, taking quality and condition into account, the agency cannot guarantee that he will be satisfied with his purchase, Gray added.

Veterans unfamiliar with home construction should seek the advice of a reliable person who knows construction, and competent advice should be obtained in connection with the signing of sales contracts and other documents, the letter warns. Before making a deposit on a home, they should make sure the paper they sign calls for a refund in the event the GI loan deal falls through.

Areas of the country in which 4-percent mortgage financing is lacking, and in which eligible veterans and unremarried widows may qualify for direct Government mortgage loans as provided by a recent act of Congress, have been designated by the Veterans' Administration.

The eligible areas, virtually all of which are outside metropolitan centers, include about 2,200 of the 3,100 counties in the United States. It is estimated that about 4,000,000 veterans, or 30 percent of those still eligible for GI loan benefits, reside in those areas.

The Housing Act of 1950 made available $150,000,000 for such direct home loans to veterans, effective after July 19, in areas where VA found that 4-percent financing from private sources is not obtainable. In addition to location in such an area, the following conditions must be met:

1. The veteran must not previously have used any part of his GI loan guaranty entitlement;

2. The loan may not exceed $10,000;

3. The veteran must be a satisfactory credit risk, and the monthly payments on his mortgage must bear a proper relationship to his income.

4. He must show that he is unable to obtain 4-percent financing from other sources, including loans from the Secretary of Agriculture in the case of farm housing.

As in the case of other GI loans, the VA direct loan bears 4-percent interest, may be made repayable over periods up to 30 years, and the veteran receives a gratuity credit of 4 percent of the amount which ordinarily would have been guaranteed by VA, up to a maximum of $160.

Most VA offices have at least one county or part of a county designated as an eligible area. However, in eight offices no direct loans were authorized. These offices serve Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, and the greater metropolitan areas of New York City, Philadelphia, and Washington, D. C.

The 67 VA regional offices which administer the GI loan-guaranty program in their respective regions have been furnished a detailed listing of the areas in which veterans may apply for direct loans.

Veterans or eligible widows who wish to apply for a direct home loan should write to the loan-guaranty officer at the nearest VA regional office, stating the location and price of the property and the amount of the loan which will be required to finance the purchase or construction of the home. The VA office will supply an application form.

The areas designated as eligible for direct loans were slected on the basis of records showing the relative unavailability of GI home loans for veterans from private sources, as well as upon the recommendations of the regional loan-guaranty officers who are familiar with current lending activity in their regions.

The VA stresses that the mere submission of an application for a direct loan does not assure that it will be granted, even if the property desired is in a designated area. Both the property and the credit of the veteran will have to meet VA standards.

Each veteran is cautioned not to invest in land or materials or make a deposit on the assumption that he will receive a direct loan. Every applicant should wait until he hears from the VA regional office handling his application.

If time and funds permit, changes in the list of designated areas for direct loans will be made as the availability of private capital improves or falls below acceptable standards.

Of the $150,000,000 made available for direct loans, $100,000,000 has been allocated for use in the designated areas. The balance will be allocated to the areas where the greatest relative need is evident as the program progresses.

H. R. 9176

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS B. STANLEY

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Defense Production Act of 1950, H. R. 9176, I wish to include the following statement, copies of which I sent on August 29, 1950, to the newspapers published in the tobacco-producing counties of the Fifth Congressional District of Virginia:

STATEMENT OF HON. THOMAS B. STANLEY, OF VIRGINIA, CONCERNING PENDING PRICE-CONTROL LEGISLATION

I have not advocated and am not advocating that price ceilings be placed on tobacco. I do not consider price control on this commodity necessary or justifiable in view of the high cost of production and acreage control, which limit the net income of the tobacco grower even under the most favorable marketing conditions.

Recently there was presented to the House of Representatives by the Committee on Banking and Currency a bill, H. R. 9176, under which price ceilings could be imposed on tobacco. The original section of the bill before the House was as follows:

"No ceiling shall be established or maintained for any agricultural commodity below the higher of the two following prices: (1) The parity price for such commodity, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, and (adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture for grade, location, and seasonal differentials), or (2) the price received by producers during the period from May 24, 1950, to June 24."

When I saw that under the proposal there would be no alternative but to fix the price ceiling on flue-cured tobacco at parity—about $50 per hundred pounds—since flue-cured tobacco is not marketed during the base period mentioned, May 24 to June 24, I proposed the following amendment on the floor of the House on August 4:

"or (3) if for the year 1950 a producer normally does not market a commodity during the period May 24 to June 24, 1950, the highest price received by producers during the first 30-day period following May 24, 1950, in which such commodity is normally marketed."

I was very much pleased when the Committee on Banking and Currency accepted my amendment and it was unanimously approved by the House of Representatives and the bill, as passed by the House on August 10, 1950, would, in the event price ceilings are imposed, establish the first 30-day period following May 24, 1950, in which flue-cured tobacco is marketed as the base period. This would permit price ceilings consistent with 1950 prices, and considerably higher than parity.

The Senate did not accept my amendment but passed in lieu thereof what is referred to as the Maybank-Robertson-Chapman amendment, which is as follows:

"In the case of any commodity for which the market was not active during the period May 24 to June 24, 1950, the average price received by producers during the most recent representative period prior to May 24, 1950, in which the market for such commodity was active as determined and adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture to a level in line with the level of prices received by producers for agricultural commodities generally during the period May 24 to June 24, 1950, and adjusted by the Secretary for grade, location, and seasonal differentials, or in the case of fire-cured tobacco a price (as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and adjusted for grade differentials) equal to 75 percent of the parity price of Burley tobacco of the corresponding crop, and in the case of dark air-cured tobacco and Virginia sun-cured tobacco, respectively, a price (as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and adjusted for grade differentials) equal to 66⅔ percent of the parity price of Burley tobacco of the corresponding crop. No ceilings shall be established or maintained hereunder for any commodity processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from any agricultural commodity below a price which will reflect to producers of such agricultural commodity a price for such agricultural commodity equal to the highest price therefor specified above: Provided, That in establishing and maintaining ceilings on products resulting from the processing of agricultural commodities, including livestock, a generally fair and equitable margin shall be allowed for such processing. Whenever a ceiling has been established under this title with respect to any agricultural commodity, or any commodity processed or manufactured in whole or in substantial part therefrom, the President from time to time shall adjust such ceiling in order to make appropriate allowances for substantial reduction in merchantable crop yields, unusual increases in cost of production, and other factors which result from hazards occurring in connection with the production and marketing of such agricultural commodity; and in establishing the ceiling (1) for any agricultural commodity for which the 1950 marketing season commenced prior to the enactment of this act and for which different areas have different periods of marketing during such season or (2) for any agricultural commodity produced for the same general use as a commodity described in (1), the President shall give due consideration to affording equitable treatment to all producers of the commodity for which the ceiling is being established."

I am convinced that, in the event of price ceilings being put into effect, tobacco growers would have adequate protection under my amendment to the bill as passed the House. I hope they will receive fair treatment under the bill as passed the Senate. Both House and Senate versions of the proposed legislation have been referred to a conference committee for adjustment of House and Senate differences. If price controls are to be applied, I hope very much that the conferees will accept my amendment.

In any event, I sincerely hope the administration will not place price ceilings on tobacco. It does not appear at this time that such action will be taken affecting the 1950 crop.

Appeasement Policies Held To Be Encouraging Reds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 6 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a thought-provoking article entitled "Truman and Congress Seen Not All Clear on Preventive War," written by David Lawrence and published in the Washington Evening Star of September 5, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRUMAN AND CONGRESS SEEN NOT ALL CLEAR ON PREVENTIVE WAR—APPEASEMENT POLICIES HELD ENCOURAGING REDS TO PUSH AGGRESSIONS

(By David Lawrence)

There's a vast difference between a "preventive war" and action to prevent war and while the first will be deplored as unwise the second will be accepted as eminently desirable.

The truth, however, is that Congress and the President are not at all clear in their pronouncements as to what is being done or should be done to prevent a large-scale war.

This is one of the reasons why some people have sought to explore just what is meant by "preventive war." Actually no administration would ever propose that the United States initiate a war of any kind against anybody. But there are Americans who are wondering if, when a local war starts that could affect us vitally, the United States should follow the road of appeasement or resistance.

There are Americans, for instance, who say that aggression has already started against the members of the United Nations not only in Europe but in Asia. There are Americans who do not consider Communist China an independent country but a tool of the Soviet just as much as are such countries as Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia.

DIFFERENCE OF OPINION

To these observers the real question is how long the United Nations has to wait and how many times the members have to be attacked before aggression will be resisted at the real source. Not a few of the proponents of war against Russia feel that the Soviet started the war in North Korea and that the bombers of the United Nations should be permitted to bomb the sources of supply to the North Koreans even if it means attacking beyond the Korean border in Communist territory.

There is a difference of opinion here on this naturally and the President has announced that American forces will not be permitted to carry on any such war operations which means, of course, that the United Nations will not sanction it either.

Yet in the next few months tens of thousands of Communist-trained soldiers will be slowly fed into the Korean Peninsula. The allied troops are going to be worn down and more and more reinforcements will have to be sent into North Korea from the United States and other countries to meet the drain on our manpower.

It is all very well for American officials to talk optimistically about an end to the Korean war in a few months but the United Nations forces will have to be augumented materially as an unlimited number of troops come through Russian and Chinese territory to help the North Koreans. They have started already.

UNITED STATES BLAMED FOR INACTION

The question of what shall be done to get at the source of the infection will become much more pertinent a few weeks from now than it apparently is today. The United Nations has done little else but talk so far. No action has been taken to require that Communist China and Soviet Russia cease giving aid to the North Koreans. Instead, the Communist argument that China should be admitted to the council of the United Nations is seriously considered by various governments inside the UN. Likewise, though more than 2 months has passed since the Communists in both Russia and China began giving aid to the North Koreans, the UN has failed miserably to do anything about it.

The United States Government is mostly to blame for this inaction. Both the President and the Secretary of State have pussyfooted on the issue. They have not reflected the overwhelming indignation of the American people that American boys are being killed or wounded in Korea as a consequence of Russian and Chinese aid. Instead, there has been a tendency to grow timid about such things as keeping the United States Navy on patrol in the Straits of Formosa.

About the only action taken toward Communist China has been to concede that it was a mistake for an American plane to have strafed some of the territory of Communist China. This is an admission that the President and the Secretary of State do not intend to hold Communist China or Russia responsible if their troops are sent into South Korea to kill American soldiers.

As soon as the American people become better informed on what is happening they will voice their protests and it is most regrettable that the Truman administration has put itself in the position of apparently wishing to appease the Communists in the misguided hope that this will influence the Communists to stop their aid to North Korea. It is, rather, the way to encourage them to become bolder in their aggression.

United Nations and World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 64, it is my pleasure to extend the following resolution passed by the fifty-eighth annual convention of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor on the United Nations and World Peace:

UNITED NATIONS AND WORLD PEACE

Whereas peace is the fruit of justice, justice is the product of law, and law is rooted in government; and

Whereas conflicting governmental units have always ceased their warring when united in a common government, as evidenced by our own Thirteen Colonies; and

Whereas representative federal government is America's discovery and America's contribution to the society of man and has been adopted in principle by the great majority of nations; and

Whereas labor has long recognized a need for a world united under law such as visualized by Samuel Gompers in 1914 when he called for "a world federation competent to do justice between nations and able to maintain the peace of the world": Therefore be it

Resolved, That a Charter Review Conference of the United Nations should be called as soon as possible for the purpose of building the United Nations into a true federation of nations, with a code of international law, a bill of human rights, adequate international police force, and any other machinery not otherwise inconsistent with the sovereignty of nations but found to be necessary for the maintenance of world law and order; and be it also

Resolved, That, should Russia abstain, our Nation should proceed to unite with other like-minded nations in a partial world federation, thus taking a realistic step toward realizing man's dream of a united world and, at the same time, giving to the democratic nations a strength through unity so great as to deter further Russian armed aggression; and be it also

Resolved, That all affiliated central bodies and local unions of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor be requested to use whatever means are at their disposal, including education, political action, and publicity mediums of radio and newspaper for carrying out the purpose of this resolution so that, in this year of centennial remembrance of Samuel Gompers, we can stride forward to the realization of his goal, freedom and security for all men under world law; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution should be sent to the President and the Secretary of State of the United States and to each Member of our United States Congress, and that our parent body, the American Federation of Labor, be urged to take action at its fifty-ninth annual convention similar to that embodied in this resolution.

Address by Hon. James P. Kem, of Missouri, Before State Convention of Missouri Department of American Legion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Some of the Things We Must Do," which I delivered before the State convention of the Missouri Department of the American Legion, in Kansas City, Mo., on September 3, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOME OF THE THINGS WE MUST DO

(By Senator JAMES P. KEM)

Mr. Commander, comrades of the Legion, members of the auxiliary, ladies and gentlemen:

For the third time in a third of a century American boys are fighting on foreign soil.

Often we hear it said that those in authority should be held to account for their mistakes. We have many unpleasant recollections: the refusal to adopt Churchill's soft underbelly strategy to invade the Balkans which would have prevented Eastern Europe falling an easy prey to Russia; the Morgenthau plan that ruined the industry of Germany so that Germany is no longer able to act as a buffer state against Russia; the holding back of our troops before Berlin until the Russians could enter the city; our consent to the encirclement of Berlin by Russian-held territory; the capitulation to the Russians at Yalta and Potsdam. They bring to mind Will Rogers' famous saying: "The United States has never lost a war, but has never won a conference."

It is not my purpose today to look at the past except as we may profit for the future. You will remember that Patrick Henry said he was guided by one lamp, the lamp of experience. I want to speak to you briefly about four propositions that from this point on should not be overlooked. They are mistakes I hope we shall avoid in the future.

I. NO AMERICAN SHOULD BE SENT INTO BATTLE WHO IS NOT ADEQUATELY EQUIPPED

My first proposition is that no American boy should be sent into battle who is not adequately equipped. It is so fundamental that it is not even a debatable question, especially in view of the vast productive resources of our country. Yet we all know what has happened. In Korea our boys were sent into battle with equipment unequal to that of the enemy they were called upon to meet. The enemy had artillery which outranged ours. His tanks threw off our bullets like paper pellets. At first, air cover was wholly inadequate. And this fundamental lack is in large part responsible for the mounting casualty lists in Korea today.

There might have been some slight excuse for this fearful and fateful shortcoming if we had been caught completely by surprise—but our leaders had been warned—they vacillated—they changed their minds about whether or not we should fight in Korea—they had advance knowledge of the Russian plans for world conquest, and the vast armament program which was going on in North Korea. They did have advance knowledge—they were warned—they did vacillate—they did change their minds at the last moment—and they sent our boys in with inferior equipment, to die a hero's death in the rice paddies and on ragged mountain slopes of South Korea.

David Lawrence, nationally known Washington journalist, was so moved by the inadequacy of our equipment and the blundering of our top officials that he said in his syndicated column of August 7:

"Politeness, personal friendship or sensitivity, or partisanship are criminal excuses if they stand in the way of punishment of the blunderers. No other course will satisfy the mothers of the men who are dying in Korea, nor the mothers of the many more young men about to die as a consequence of these mistakes."

Why was the Army not better prepared? Some would have you believe Congress failed to provide the money. The truth is that Congress granted every request made by the present Administration for money for the national defense. Many Members of Congress are now asking what happened to the $50,000,000,000 spent for the cold war in the last 4 years and why more of it wasn't spent for weapons and combat troops. While we don't yet know all the sorry details of the multitudinous ratholes down which much of this $50,000,000,000 was poured, we do know this: We do know that overhead—often referred to as military housekeeping—took $2 out of every $3 spent. We do know that only $1 in every $7 since the war has been spent on arms of any kind. Out of $50,000,000,000, only $4,000,000,000 was invested in aircraft, only $3,000,000,000 for other equipment. Only 5 cents out of every dollar went for research and development of new weapons, to make sure that the United States wins the guided missiles race.

As a result, the country had but one Army division at full strength—the Eighty-second Airborne. Nine other divisions that it had were undermanned and underequipped. Russia has 175 divisions. Much of our Navy was laid up in mothballs, needing 3 to 18 months to be made ready for combat. And the Marine Corps had been whittled down to a shadow of its former strength.

General MacArthur was forced to improvise a military operation. He had to commit small American units piecemeal to be chewed to bits in the desperate effort to delay the invading army.

II. WE MUST STOP ARMING RUSSIA

My second proposition is: We must stop arming Russia.

Recently I presented to the United States Senate evidence that Marshall-plan countries have been making substantial shipments of war material, including arms, to Russia and her satellites—material which we ourselves have refused to ship to those countries. I obtained the information from official sources, the Department of Commerce of our own Government. Some of my colleagues in the Senate said that the information was startling—but nothing happened. The shipments are continuing as before.

As Mr. Winston Churchill said a few days ago: "Fancy going on like this while everything is getting worse, and when we (the British) are literally begging the United States for aid in every form."

Let us take a look at the unpleasant picture. It won't be a complete look, because I was able to obtain information about only three of the Marshall-plan countries—Great Britain, France, and Belgium. But the information I have will give a pretty good idea of what is going on.

Belgium shipped to Russia and her satellites last year: firearms, iron, cast iron, steel, copper, lead, tin, and zinc. Belgium also sent substantial quantities of electrical machinery—articles for electrotechnical use—and measuring and precision instruments.

Last year the British Socialist Government permitted more than $45,000,000 worth of machinery, including electric generators and machine tools, to be sent behind the iron curtain. Substantial shipments of ball and roller bearings also went into Communist hands. As to the military value of ball bearings, many of you will recall that our efforts to knock out the ball-bearing factories at Schweinfurt, Germany, cost us over 50 planes in a single raid.

On September 2, Prime Minister Attlee, of Great Britain, in a fireside chat to the British people, said that Britain will not allow her sales of machine tools to Russia to damage her own defense needs. But nowhere in his speech did he say that the tool deliveries would be halted.

France has permitted all sorts of war material to go to Russia, and other countries behind the iron curtain.

The export to Eastern Europe from the United States of commodities regarded as having direct or indirect military significance have been severely restricted since March 1, 1948. This policy, says our Office of International Trade, practically brought to a halt the exportation of such industrial equipment as machine tools, electrical machinery, and construction, mining, refining, and conveying machinery, which formerly comprised the bulk of Soviet procurement in the United States.

I submit it is essential to our national security that shipments of war material to the Soviet Union from the Marshall-plan countries be stopped. It is tragically absurd for us to pour into Western Europe vast quantities of war materials under the Marshall Plan and the arms-aid program, only to have our friends export the same materials to Russia and other countries behind the iron curtain.

When the ECA authorization was before the Senate, I proposed an amendment which would have shut off further aid to any Marshall-plan country which continues to funnel war materials behind the iron curtain. However, the amendment was rejected. We were afraid of hurting someone else's feelings. Our boys are being killed and maimed for life. Whose feelings are being hurt now?

During World War II our ships and planes were blasted with scrap iron furnished by us to the Japs. Millions of Americans risked their lives facing it.

And yet, here we are again supplying materials of war to an unfriendly and aggressor nation. We must stop—we must stop now arming Russia.

III. WE SHOULD STOP CODDLING COMMUNISM

My third proposition is that: We should stop coddling communism. You will recall that Abraham Lincoln said, "If this Nation is ever destroyed it will not be from without but from within."

(a) The crime of Yalta

To understand fully what has happened in Korea, and why, we must go back to before the end of World War II—to the Yalta Conference early in 1945. For it was at Yalta that the initial decision was made to divide Korea, giving the Reds the northern half of the country and much of its industry.

It was at Yalta that it was secretly agreed to hand over other important lands to Russia, and to give Stalin certain privileges in China. The deal assured that Manchuria—China's richest Province—would later fall to the Communists. The apologists for Yalta say that was the price we paid for Russia's entry into the war. Nothing could have induced the Russians to keep out. Japan was already defeated. Russia was in the war against Japan 6 days. Our boys fought the Japs 1,341 days.

In the light of what has happened, it is not a mere coincidence that one of the top-ranking State Department advisers at Yalta was the convicted perjurer, the Communist spy, Alger Hiss.

The secret Yalta deal was a go-ahead signal to the Communists in the Far East. On top of Yalta, we tried to force Chiang Kai-shek to take Communists into his confidence. The far-eastern policy makers in the State Department claimed that the Chinese Communists were not really Communists—that they were farmers—just agrarian reformers. The whole world now knows how wrong they were, as many of us had contended all along. Are we not justified in believing that our disastrous China policy was another manifestation of the desire of our State Department to coddle the Communists?

Military aid for China was opposed by the State Department in every step of its progress. The President signed the China-aid bill in April 1948, but, because of the slowness of the Executive Branch, it was December, eight months later, before supply driblets began to reach the Chinese forces. The war in China had then been lost.

(b) Our ships in Russian hands

On July 17 the attention of the United States Senate was called to the fact that a large number of our ships which we furnished to Russia when she was our ally in World War II are still in the possession of the Soviet. I obtained the information from the State Department. These ships consist of both naval craft and merchant vessels.

We transferred to the Russians 585 naval craft of various types; of these, 459 are still in the hands of Russia and reported to be in operable condition. We have been able to get back only 28 ships.

Russia still has our mine sweepers, submarine chasers, torpedo boats, tugs, and pontoon barges.

At the end of the war Russia had 96 of our merchant ships; 84 of them are still in the hands of the Soviet Union.

Since I called this matter to the attention of the United States Senate there have been reports that the State Department has made a strong demand for the return of the ships. I haven't heard of it getting any more of our ships back. The question arises: "Why did the State Department wait so long?"

(c) Acheson must go

This leads me to say something about the Secretary of State—perhaps the most controversial figure in Washington—Dean Gooderham Acheson.

On February 6, last, I stated publicly that it was my considered judgment that Mr. Acheson should resign as Secretary of State, and on his failure to do so the President of the United States should remove him from office. Nothing that has transpired since has caused me to change my mind in the slightest degree.

This is the man who in 1939, before Alger Hiss did his deeds of shame at Yalta, stated, "Don't investigate Hiss; I will vouch for him completely," and who kept him in top jobs and finally put him at the head of the United Nations Convention in San Francisco.

This is the man who sent Hiss to Yalta, where Hiss, together with Gromyko, drafted the Yalta Agreement. This agreement is described by our American Ambassador to Poland, Arthur Bliss Lane, in the following language, "As I glanced over the document I could not believe my eyes. To me, almost every line spoke of a surrender to Stalin."

This is the man who said, "I will not turn my back on Alger Hiss," after Hiss was convicted by a jury for perjury in connection with the delivery of State Department secrets to a man named as an espionage agent. There seems to be a logical sequence from "operation pumpkin papers" in the State Department to "operation beachhead" in Korea.

This is also the man who after the Communist victory in China stated, "A new day has dawned in Asia."

I put this question to you: "Do you want Acheson on your payroll?" I hope, my friends, you will join me in saying "Acheson must go."

IV. WE MUST DRAW THE LINE WE MEAN TO DEFEND

My fourth and last proposition is: We must draw the line we mean to defend.

In 1823 President Monroe laid down the famous Monroe Doctrine. He said that the United States would regard as an unfriendly act any attempt on the part of European powers to extend their systems to the Western Hemisphere. For over 125 years the Monroe Doctrine has worked. It has accomplished its purpose, because the Monroe Doctrine drew a line and we stuck to it. It told the nations of the world what we expected of them. And for 125 years no one of them has seen fit to cross that line with hostile intent.

In September 1947 we signed the Rio Pact, committing the United States and other American republics to defend together the Western Hemisphere against aggression. As President Truman said, "We made it clear to any possible aggressor that the American republics are determined to support one another against attacks." In the Western Hemisphere, in clear and unmistakable terms, we drew the line we intended to defend.

In the Far East it was a different story. There our policy makers maintained a hands-off attitude.

Early in 1949 Secretary of State Acheson said that our policy in China was to "wait until the dust settled." We waited, and when the dust had settled the Reds had taken all of China except Formosa.

Then the State Department sent a secret memorandum to its Foreign Service officers saying that it would be useless to send naval units to Formosa and that the loss of the island was widely anticipated.

Last January 5, President Truman declared: "The United States will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa."

On January 12, of this year, Secretary of State Acheson warned against what he called "foolish adventures" in the Far East. He drew a line through Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines and said we would defend them against attack. But he gave no such assurance as to Korea or southern Asia. Mr. Acheson said at that time that the State Department planned to depend on the righteous wrath and anger of the Chinese and other Asiatics to check further Red aggression.

On May 5, Senator CONNALLY, spokesman in the Senate for the Administration's foreign policy, said in an interview that Korea was not an essential part of our defense strategy. Such statements must have been interpreted by Stalin as an invitation to go ahead.

Did the Reds think they had a free pass into South Korea? Stalin evidently was counting on our having adopted—as we evidently did until the invasion actually was under way—the policy advocated by Owen Lattimore. Mr. Lattimore, who has been called the architect of our foreign policy in the Far East, advocated that we let South Korea fall without giving the appearance of having pushed it.

When the Reds made their attack in Korea, the Administration hastily reversed itself. The decision to defend Korea and to send the Navy to protect Formosa represented a complete about face—a complete repudiation of our State Department's program and policy. If we had drawn the line in South Korea and announced that we would defend it, as we are defending it now, we might not be fighting there today.

The boys who are fighting in Korea—their mothers and fathers and friends, all of us—deserve better than that from our State Department.

When President Truman announced his decision to send troops into Korea, I said:

"I intend to support General MacArthur and our military operations in the Far East in every way. It is time for all Americans to close ranks.

"I hope that the Russians will not precipitate a war. Our people desire peace. I am among those who believe, as did a famous British statesman, there is no such thing as an inevitable war. If war comes, it will be from a failure of human wisdom."

While I believe in economy in Government, I have voted for every appropriation presented by the Administration for the armed services. I have said on the floor of the United States Senate that we should not cut down on our own military establishment in order to send billions of dollars as gifts to Western Europe for economic development under the Marshall Plan. I called that putting the cart before the horse. I shall continue to do everything possible to back up our boys in the training camps and on the fighting front.

The war in Korea may be long and costly. It may be only the beginning of a bigger and longer war. But whatever the future holds, we must face the test with courage, determination, and prayer. With God's help, we must win through.

When peace is restored, let us keep it—let us not give it away again.

"Lord God of hosts, be with us yet.
Lest we forget. Lest we forget."

Taxation by Emotion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SPESSARD L. HOLLAND
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, in today's issue of the New York Times I find an excellent editorial entitled "Taxation by Emotion," which gives full support to the attitude and position taken by the Committee on Finance in opposing the imposition of an excess-profits tax at this time and as part of the tax bill now being considered by Congress. I ask that the excellent editorial be incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAXATION BY EMOTION

It is high time, it seems to us, that those Members of Congress who are trying to hitch a free political ride on the pending tax bill cease their obstructionist tactics or be accorded the rebuke by their colleagues that these tactics so abundantly warrant. We refer to those who insist on tying an excess-profits tax—and particularly their pet version of such a tax—onto the legislation as the price of their support.

The devotees of the EPT in the Senate got about all the mileage out of this issue, it would seem, that it was possible to expect. In that Chamber some Members wanted to write such a provision into the measure on the floor, but Senator WALTER GEORGE, chief helmsman for the Finance Committee's bill, vigorously opposed the idea. Senator GEORGE is not opposed to the principle of taxing away windfall war profits (nor, for that matter, are many other people), but he pointed out that the proposed amendment, though it rested largely on an appeal to war emotions, was not a true wartime excess-profits tax at all. He would, he said, support an excess-profits tax, but only if it was "one that he could honestly defend" and only after the people who would have to pay the tax had been given an opportunity to be heard. Senator GEORGE then proceeded to give incontestable earnest of his and his associates' good faith in the matter. He agreed to an amendment which directed the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee to bring out excess-profits legislation at the next session of Congress (when the second defense revenue bill is scheduled for action) and to make that tax retroactive to October 1, this year.

That certainly should have been all the assurance that any reasonable person could have wished, and the Senate did, indeed, accept it as such, by voting its approval of the bill. Now it appears, however, that certain Members of the House still believe they can squeeze a few drops of political nutriment out of the popular (if thoroughly fictitious) issue of meeting the cost of the defense program by "soaking the profiteers." Although President Truman has flatly stated that action on the highly controversial excess-profits tax should be put over until 1951, and although the pending bill, as noted above, carries a directive providing for such a tax on a retroactive basis, Representative EBERHARTER, of Pennsylvania has just let it be known that he means to block immediate House action on the $4,508,000,000 bill.

As we have pointed out before, there is no issue here of whether our corporations or anyone else is to be permitted to turn a potential war emergency to his material advantage. Everyone is going to have to pitch in, so far as taxes are concerned, if the present defense effort is to be put on a pay-as-you-go basis. The established, and sensible, practice is for Congress to vote, without unnecessary delay, a general increase in existing taxes. That is exactly what the pending interim measure does, raising taxes on individuals and corporations alike. It then proceeds to a consideration of other possible sources of emergency revenue.

Arguments that it is necessary to attach an excess-profits tax to the pending bill to prevent inflation and profiteering are purely political. In the first place, corporations don't have to raise prices to profit from a boom, whether it is a peacetime or a war phenomenon. The era of the Nation's greatest corporate prosperity, in the twenties, was a period of steadily falling prices. (The post-World War I boom of 1919–20 occurred, incidentally, at a time when an excess-profits tax was still in force.) In the second place corporations that wished to raise prices would not be likely to be seriously deterred by the consideration that this might involve a tax payment at some time in the future. Furthermore, since the economy has not yet felt the impact of the post-Korean rearmament program, there can hardly be any profits directly attributable to the war in the immediate future. And, finally, the legislation now pending provides that any such profits accruing from the first of next month on will be covered by the excess profits provision of the second (1951) defense revenue bill.

We are as intolerant as anyone when it comes to wartime profiteering; in fact, in one respect we are perhaps more intolerant than some. We object to wartime profiteering of any kind, even when it takes the form of political profiteering.

Suggested Permanent Cure for Car Shortage Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRIS ELLSWORTH
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, on August 21 I introduced H. R. 9480. The objective of this bill is a permanent cure of periodic car shortages on American railroads.

Later in my remarks, wherein I include testimony given by me before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, a summary of the car-shortage problem is made. Before presenting that testimony, however, I shall briefly explain the bill, H. R. 9480.

The bill directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to conduct a continuing study of car shortages and their causes. The results of this study are to be the basis upon which the ICC makes its decisions regarding the operation of the program outlined in the bill.

Provision is made for the creation of a Government corporation to be known as the Railroad Car Reserve Corporation. This Corporation capitalized for $250,000,000 would, under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, acquire freight cars and hold them in storage.

The bill provides that whenever the Commission finds that the demand for cars exceeds the available supply of cars, it then assigns cars from the storage reserve owned by the Corporation to such railroads and to such parts of the United States as are affected by the car shortage. After the car assignment is made and the shortage emergency met in that manner, the Corporation negotiates a lease with the railroad or railroads to which the cars are assigned. The railroads would, of course, pay a reasonable rental for the use of the cars.

When the emergency for which the Commission has assigned the cars comes to an end, the cars will either be returned to the reserve pool or they may be purchased by the railroads.

The bill simply offers a plan to insure the whole economy of our country against the serious losses and damage caused by periodic shortages of railway freight cars.

Shortly after the bill was introduced, the Subcommittee on Transportation of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce heard testimony on it as a part of the continuing study of transportation being conducted by the committee. I appeared at the hearings and made the following statement:

STATEMENT OF HON. HARRIS ELLSWORTH, A REPRESENTATIVE TO CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF OREGON, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON TRANSPORTATION OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE, AUGUST 29, 1950, ON H. R. 9480

Early in January of this year, in fact, on January 16, I addressed a letter to Honorable ROBERT CROSSER, chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, directing his attention and the attention of the committee to the car supply problem in the United States.

There was not at that time a shortage of cars. Traffic was moving entirely in a normal manner. I suggested that the committee, through its Subcommittee on Transportation, conduct hearings on the question of the car supply, with the thought of developing information for the use of the Committee and the Subcommittee on Transportation.

The further thought I had in mind in asking that a hearing be held was that there certainly was every indication at that time, with the statistics available, that there might be car shortages during this year.

As we all know, a car shortage did develop.

In response to my request, the hearing was conducted by your subcommittee, Mr. Chairman, at which I appeared and at which considerable general testimony was heard, and testimony with particular reference to the car supply problem.

I recall that Colonel Johnson, the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, gave some exceedingly interesting testimony at that time.

As to the present situation, I do not think I need to elaborate on that to any extent. That will be done by others. But the car supply is short all over the United States, apparently, judging by the mail I have received. Only today I received another telegram, and I have before me a file some two inches in height, which represents the telegrams and letters I have received in the last 3 or 4 months from people who are suffering from a lack of freight cars.

Today I received a wire from a sawmill in my congressional district at Glendale, Oreg. The telegram was signed by the Robert Dollar Co. The telegram says:

"Today our plant was forced to curtail production and go on two 5-hour shifts rather than continue operating on two 8-hour shifts. This reduction of production is caused by critical car shortage. Year by year, the situation, now unbearable, has gradually become worse and upsets the economy of our Nation, particularly the lumber industry. There must be some way you can bring pressure to bear to help alleviate the situation."

Time magazine summed up the problem rather well, I thought, in its issue for August 14. For the record, and for the benefit of the committee I would like to read one or two paragraphs:

"With the shortage of cars already pinching some sections of the United States, Iron Age"—that is a publication of the iron and steel industry—"has predicted that the United States faces a serious car shortage, potentially the worst in history. Chief reason: The supply of freight cars has not kept pace with the Nation's growth. Though the gross national product has more than doubled in 10 years, the number of freight cars in service has actually dwindled to 1,605,609 from 1,620,655 at the time of Pearl Harbor."

With reference to the telegram I just read from a constituent, who suggests that there must be some way that I, as a Member of Congress, can put pressure on, I think that you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, know full well that there is not very much that a Member of the Congress can do in the way of putting pressure on that has not already been done.

I will go further to say that, from my contacts and discussions with the chairman and members of the Bureau of Service of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and from my discussions with Mr. Faricy, president of the American Association of Railroads, and Mr. Gass, of the car service division of that organization, I have become convinced that there is no pressure of any kind that can be exerted at this time which will have any bearing whatever upon the immediate car shortage problem.

There are things that can be done which might prevent such a shortage in the future, but as to reaching under a hat and pulling out 50,000 freight cars right now—and that is the only way the situation could be relieved—I do not think that is possible.

I shall be interested, however, in hearing statements from the Association of American Railroads and from the Commission, hoping that they may be able to offer some suggestion for immediate relief.

The situation on the west coast, and particularly in western Oregon, is serious. Lumber production is curtailed now, and it may go down to only 70 percent of normal. That means unquestionably a short supply in lumber over the country.

It doubtless will mean higher prices to all consumers and it certainly means a reduction in employment during the peak of the normal lumber manufacturing season.

I have introduced, as you mention, Mr. Chairman, House Resolution 813, calling for an investigation of the car-shortage problem by this committee. I realize that this committee already is operating under a resolution heretofore passed, calling for a complete and over-all study of transportation. I am well aware of the fact that the committee has done a fine job on that subject.

However, I introduced the resolution for the purpose of again calling the attention of the committee to the one particular phase in transportation on which further study should be made.

In addition to that piece of legislation, I also prepared and introduced H. R. 9480. The title of that bill, I think, tells the story very briefly, but completely. The title of the bill states that it is—

"A bill to amend part I of the Interstate Commerce Act so as to make provision for an adequate reserve supply of railroad freight cars to supplement the normal supply in time of temporary shortage or national emergency."

I want to discuss that bill very briefly now, Mr. Chairman, if I may, and then at greater length at another time.

First of all, this question of car shortage has been plaguing the area where I live for the last 40 years. I have in my possession a copy of the minutes of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association board of directors for the year 1916, in which a resolution was passed appointing a committee of members of the board to confer with the Southern Pacific Railroad officials to see what could be done about the disastrous car shortage.

That, Mr. Chairman, was in 1916.

I grew up in the lumber industry. My father was a mill superintendent most of my younger life, and I can recall many years when the mills would shut down through lack of cars. That trouble has recurred from time to time on down through the years.

This bill which I have introduced is based on a very broad, very well understood, and long-established theory, and that is that the Government of the United States believes that it is in the interests of all the people to meet certain deficiencies and services in industries that are of a public-utility nature.

I call your attention to the fact that one of the first activities of the Federal Government was the construction of inland canals.

The Government has gone to the rescue of the United States merchant marine because that service is of value to all the people. It is in the interest of all the people to have a strong and working merchant marine. It appeared some years ago that the merchant marine of the United States could not compete on an equal basis with the merchant ships of other countries. So Government subsidies were introduced into that field.

Many railroads throughout the country and especially in the West, were built as the result of land grants by the Federal Government. Granted, of course, that the railroad companies would have built those lines had it been reasonable and possible as a business proposition to do so, it was proven that could not be done, and therefore, the Federal Government said, "It is in the interest of the Government and the people of the United States that such roads be built."

So the land grants were made.

We are all familiar with the airmail subsidy plan.

Power dams owned by the United States have supplemented existing hydroelectric power furnished by privately owned dams and privately owned systems.

I think even the Panama Canal was in this category since it certainly has not repaid its cost and is in a sense a subsidy to water shipping for the benefit of the people.

We have built large pipelines for the transmission of natural gas.

Last year the Congress passed a bill to improve rural telephone service.

Then lastly, but certainly not the least, the rivers and harbors development is a common activity of the Federal Government and it is always on the basis of doing something for the benefit of shipping and transportation, which is deemed to be in the interest of the whole people.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the essence of my bill. It seems, after these many years of experience, that great and fine as the railroad system of the United States is, there come periods of time when the normal car supply of the railroads is not sufficient to meet an emergency or a peak traffic situation. My bill would permit the Government to supplement the car supply in times of shortage or emergency need.

This year, in addition to the fact that the car supply had run down during the war, we had a coal strike; we had a strike of switchmen on the railroads; we had a peak grain crop; and we had a peak production in the lumber industry in the West. All of those things together resulted in the present car shortage.

I submit this as the theory behind my bill: The Government of the United States should recognize, in my opinion, that the railroad system faces occasionally, as the result of a combination of things, a car shortage. Sometimes it may be caused by any one thing, which makes it impossible for the rail system of the country to meet the demand for rail cars.

It seems to me that if it can be shown, as the result of hearings and study, that the losses suffered by the economic system and the people as a whole as the result of car shortages are great enough to warrant the expenditure of Government funds to help alleviate that difficulty, then it should be done.

I am not for a moment advocating that the Federal Government go into the business of supplying the railroads with freight cars. That is not the purpose of my bill, and I am surprised that that interpretation is sometimes put on it.

I regret that in a story which went out on the press wires after the introduction of the bill it was inferred in the story that railroads could go to the Interstate Commerce Commission after this bill went into effect and obtain freight cars. That specifically is not true.

The bill leaves the discretion in the hands of the Commission as to whether or not an emergency exists and as to where and when units from the reserve of freight cars will be assigned. The Corporation which I have outlined in the bill would be capitalized for $250,000,000. In round numbers, that envisions the construction of 50,000 freight cars.

This may be too many, or it may not be enough. That will also have to be developed by hearings.

But that investment does not represent an outright expenditure; it represents plant investment, not unlike the plant investment of our Grand Coulee Dam and other public assets.

The cost to the taxpayers would be the cost of operating the program, which probably would not run to more than 5 percent of the actual capitalization.

I would think that when the program was under operation, the outlay to administer the program and keep the cars on storage in the reserve, as outlined in the bill, would probably not run more than $10,000,000 a year, most of which would be returned to the Government from leases.

In conclusion, this is the problem I place before the committee: Periods of car shortage represent an inherent weakness in our otherwise splendid rail transportation system. Should the United States Government take positive action to remedy this weakness?

The bill is introduced on that theory. I lay it before the committee with the request and the hope that the committee will conduct hearings and will investigate the problem and then come up with the same type of decision that is reached by the Public Works Committee when it passes upon the merits of public works construction in rivers and harbors.

In other words, if the ratio of benefits to cost is high enough to warrant the Federal Government expending public funds, then the program should be enacted.

If it is found that the annual damages and costs to the people of the country are not sufficiently great to warrant a program of this kind, then the bill, of course, should be set aside.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is a subject worthy of study by the committee. I am hopeful that if this bill is not enacted, the principle will be carefully studied and that if some other way of meeting the problem can be developed, that it will be done.

Chairman J. Monroe Johnson, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and Commissioner Walter Splawn also presented testimony at that hearing. The Commission had not yet had an opportunity to study and make a formal report on my bill, H. R. 9480, since it had only been available in printed form for a few days. Nevertheless, Commissioner Splawn revealed considerable knowledge of it when in the course of his testimony he made the following comments:

In reading the preamble of Congressman ELLSWORTH's bill, H. R. 9480, one is impressed by the caution with which the bill approaches this problem and by the declaration that it is intended to maintain the independence of the individual railroad company and the competitive situation between the carriers.

The preamble accurately brings out this recurring crisis in shortages here and there, and it is particularly acute seasonally in the West and also points out how important it is to have enough cars in case of a war or great emergency and then closes with a declaration of policy, the policy merely being that the Federal Government will maintain a reserve car supply.

This bill then is not drawn to put the Federal Government into the transportation business. It is drawn, as I read it, as an insurance against these recurring crises which are so costly to individual shippers and to particular railroads. It is not a bill presupposing the eventual acquisition of railroad properties by the Government, much less their operation by the Government. It is merely a device of insurance against unforeseeable and recurring crises which apparently it is impossible, under the competition we desire to maintain, to prevent, and completely to forestall.

Now, as I understand this bill, it is an insurance proposition as against a recurring calamity or shortage or crisis in the number of cars necessary, the bill modestly starts with 50,000, some may say it generally starts with 50,000, but experience will demonstrate how many more than 50,000 would be needed. The great problem is to safeguard this corporation you set up against pressures to dispose of the cars on easy terms to somebody and have them out of the reach of the Government and of this corporation when a crisis or shortage develops.

If they are to be used as a pool merely to relieve shortages, then they should be called back promptly after the shortage has been overcome and taken out of competition with the privately owned cars. They should not be used by the Government competitively with the cars owned by the railroads and by the private car companies, but merely be used for the purpose contemplated by this bill, in a crisis, to meet an emergency, and immediately that the shortage has been overcome, they should be called back.

It would be an investment by the public in the interest of the public to prevent the greater loss that results from the stalling of the economy in particular areas, either territorially or industrially as the case may be.

I was deeply impressed by the caution with which Congressman ELLSWORTH approached this problem, and the very same statement he made this afternoon, in opening this hearing. As I take it, he does not come with some remedy all worked out that will cure our ills, certainly, but he comes with a proposition as well thought out as, under the circumstances, time would permit, with a bill as carefully drawn as could be done under the circumstances, and invites the committee to study the problem, to deliberate upon it, to permit the carriers and the shippers to express their views after they have studied and analyzed the bill. I think a saner and safer approach to the problem could not be conceived.

I think it is clear from the statement I made to the committee and from the comments of Commissioner Splawn that H. R. 9480 is not intended to cure the present car shortage which for several months has impaired the economy of the United States. My bill offers a method and a means of effecting a permanent cure for the future. I feel that common sense indicates and years of experience prove that each of nearly 400 railroad systems in the United States cannot be expected to maintain an idle reserve fleet of freight cars to be in readiness to meet an emergency or crisis. They could no more be expected to do that than we would attempt to solve the problem of fire protection by insisting that each householder maintain his own fire fighting equipment. My bill proposes that the Government, in the interest of all the people, be prepared to meet car shortage emergencies just as in common practice we collectively maintain fire departments for the protection of individual property owners.

Genocide

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE R. HOEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial from the Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News entitled "Genocide."

I do not know whether much attention has been paid to the terms of this treaty or not, but I wish to call attention to the broad and dangerous powers conferred under this treaty.

I cannot conceive of the Senate ratifying this treaty in its present form. The popular idea is that the treaty merely prevents mass murders, but when you see the broad general powers which it confers, it is apparent that the United States is surrendering the right to determine the guilt or innocence of people when only one person is killed, or merely some demonstration of power or force that amounts to the intimidation or threatening of a particular group.

Under article II of the treaty there are five crimes listed where authority would be given to deal with under this treaty, to wit:

First. Killing members of the group.

Second. Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group.

Third. Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part.

Fourth. Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group.

Fifth. Complicity in genocide.

It is perfectly manifest that under this broad general definition a riot or any other small disturbance might cause bodily harm, and the denial of a person to membership in a lodge or club, or a decision in any way adverse to the person, could cause mental harm and the offender could be charged with genocide or complicity in genocide and tried by a foreign tribunal.

This treaty would take away from the States the right to exercise police authority in the border of the States and of the Nation. The American people are not willing to surrender this power under the pretense of preventing mass murders, which can be punished under international law, as we have already done in the case of the German war criminals.

This editorial calls attention to a very vital matter.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENOCIDE

We are against genocide just as we are against cannibalism, but we are not in favor of the genocide convention proposed by the United Nations. It has been ratified by 15 nations and needs 5 more. The United States is one of those nations which have not ratified it.

We have three objections to it. First, the definition of genocide is so loosely drawn in the convention as to mean almost anything. Thus it includes "causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group." Would this cover a cartoon ridiculing the Irish or a presentation of The Merchant of Venice or Uncle Tom's Cabin? We don't know but since the convention if ratified would be the supreme law of the land superseding the Constitution of the United States and since it would be interpreted by courts outside our country, we'd rather there should be no room for doubt.

Second, the convention is unnecessary. Genocide is murder of civilians en masse and is punishable as a war crime. Didn't we hang quite a few of the Nazi supermen for it? And if the North Koreans practice genocide on the Christians in their midst, won't we hang their leaders if we win the war and if we can catch them, regardless of whether there is any genocide convention on the books?

Third—and this is our strongest objection—the genocide proposal is a perfect example of getting the cart before the horse. As cannibalism is a byproduct of starvation, genocide is a byproduct of war. If the United Nations can stop war, it will ipso facto stop genocide. If it can't stop war, how is it going to stop genocide? If it can't stop external aggregation, how is it going to stop internal aggression?

It is the business of the United Nations to stop war. That is quite a big enough job for it. It had better stick to its knitting. If it will only reform and strengthen itself so as to make war too dangerous and unprofitable for any aggressor to try it, the world will not have to worry about genocide which is the result of war or a war psychosis.

Free Americans Receive an Exciting Invitation From the Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, many American businessmen—big and small—have long groused and grumbled about the growth of big, expensive, autocratic Government in Washington. Unfortunately, very few of our American business leaders either in our great corporations, our crowded cities, or our smaller communities, have demonstrated the necessary initiative, courage, and resourcefulness to fight back effectively against the Fair Deal schemes to collectivize, socialize, and finally to nationalize the economic system of America.

As a consequence, big government grows bigger and more arrogant while the areas of free enterprise in this country grow smaller and more apologetic.

It is encouraging—positively stimulating—therefore, Mr. President, to be able to include in the RECORD an advertisement appearing in United States News and World Report in which the American Medical Association takes off its gloves, enrolls in the fight to save our American success formula, and invites American businessmen to join in a great national crusade for freedom. America's farmers have already demonstrated they cannot and will not be pushed around by the power-hungry politicians of our Palace City.

Mr. Businessman—it is your next move—unless you are willing to move out of your enterprises in order to let the Fair Deal politicians move in.

Mr. President, this advertisement should receive an enthusiastic response to the invitation it extends. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the advertisement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. BUSINESSMAN: THE DOCTORS OF AMERICA INVITE YOU TO COME ON IN

At a time when Americans are defending freedom from aggressive outside attack, the medical profession believes all business and industry will welcome this opportunity to join in an outspoken defense of freedom on the home front.

Millions of Americans, through more than 10,000 civic organizations, already have voiced emphatically their opposition to socialized medicine, the proven forerunner of a socialized state.

During the week of October 8, American doctors will place a 70-inch advertisement—reaffirming their faith in all American freedoms—in every daily and weekly newspaper of paid general circulation in the country. Ten thousand newspapers, 30 national magazines, and more than 1,000 radio stations will carry the message to all Americans.

CHAIN REACTION—FREEDOM STYLE

The medical profession's $1,000,000 advertising campaign is designed to tell every American the truth about state socialism and the truth about the achievements of our voluntary medical-care system. The campaign affords a splendid opportunity for business to tell its story, too.

On this strong foundation, all friends of freedom can build an impressive volume of tie-in advertising. Every newspaper will be supplied with mats and suggested copy for appropriate ads. Radio stations will have similar aids in planning the most effective presentation of your message.

Americans who care about America are learning that you don't have to drift with the foreign tide of state socialism. You can buck it.

The doctors of America have proved it. When the threat of socialized medicine became ominous 2 years ago, they took their story direct to the people. The people, by the millions, responded with a grass-roots mandate unprecedented in our history.

Join the freedom roll call—the voluntary way is the American way.

NATIONAL EDUCATION CAMPAIGN,
AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION.

County Agricultural Buildings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, in both the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses, I introduced bills to provide for participation by the Federal Government in the cost of constructing county agricultural buildings, where offices of many cooperating State and Federal agencies might be maintained. The Government is spending almost $3,000,000 a year for rent in privately owned buildings for these public agencies, and it would be good business to support a program as outlined in my bill, H. R. 402, whereby title in the county buildings would be retained by the county authorities, but facilities would be provided for Federal agencies. I realize that this program should be held in suspense during the emergency but I call the proposed legislation to the attention of the House, because of the need for making some future provision for a building program.

I recently received from Mr. J. V. Highfill, State director of the Farmers Home Administration for Arkansas, a letter describing efforts of county officials of Yell County which resulted in the construction of an agricultural building, as a war memorial, for that county. Under leave to extend my remarks, I quote the following from Mr. Highfill's letter:

The building, 110 by 40 feet, and costing $14,500, was paid for by the county from reserve funds * * * and was constructed primarily through the efforts of Judge Morris Moore of Dardanelle. The following agencies are housed in the building: Soil Conservation Service, Production, and Marketing Administration, Extension Service, and Farmers Home Administration. The space provided for these agencies is rent free.

* * * Mr. John R. Pledger, our county FHA Supervisor at Danville, worked closely with Judge Moore in bringing to a full realization the facilities now afforded the agricultural agencies. * * *

The building as it exists represents not only a memorial to those patriots who gave their lives in World War II, but it also represents a memorial to the cooperation which can be brought about by careful planning and unselfish devotion to a worth-while project in a rural area.

I know that you have a great appreciation for the thing that has been achieved in Yell County, and the housing of all agricultural agencies in one building. * * * It is my sincere hope that this sort of thing can happen in a great many more counties in Arkansas.

Perishable Surpluses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make available an excellent editorial from the Washington Post of Sunday, September 3, summarizing the existing situation with reference to surplus food commodities and urging, as I have previously done, prompt action by the Senate and by the President. The editorial is as follows:

PERISHABLE SURPLUSES

The Senate has not yet acted on a bill adopted by the House last month to facilitate the distribution among hungry people overseas of certain perishable foodstuffs of which the United States has an oversupply. There is no need here to review the problems and policies responsible for these food surpluses. The fact is that they exist here in mounting inventories; and they must be disposed of either by giving them away or by destroying them. At a time when human beings abroad are in desperate need of these commodities, there can scarcely be any question as to which course we should pursue. Moreover, virtue in this situation can be counted upon to bring its own rewards. Hunger, as Secretary Marshall always insisted, is an ally of communism. The relief of it enables people to assert independence and move toward a solution of their problems.

The bill passed by the House would simply amend the Agricultural Act so as to authorize the Commodity Credit Corporation to pay the costs of packaging perishable surpluses and transporting them within the United States—a cost which the voluntary agencies seeking to distribute them are unable to bear. They would be available first for the relief of needy persons in this country and for nonprofit undertakings such as the school-lunch program; any commodities left over after these needs were met would be donated to governmental, intergovernmental and private welfare organizations for the assistance of needy persons in non-Communist countries outside the United States.

When it is considered that the current storage of these perishable surpluses involves considerable expense to the Government and that large quantities of them must necessarily suffer spoilage or deliberate destruction before Congress can reconvene, the need for prompt Senate endorsement of the House-enacted bill seems altogether plain. The Senate docket is, of course, an extremely crowded one. But there ought to be a few moments before adjournment in which to pass this sensible, humanitarian, and essentially economic measure.

Statement by Frank A. Hecht

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a statement issued to the press by Frank A. Hecht, president of the Navy League of the United States:

PRESIDENT OF NAVY LEAGUE SAYS MARINE CORPS DOES NOT LIKE BEING COMPARED TO NO. 1 ENEMY OF DEMOCRACY—CALLS PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S STATEMENT ON MARINES GRATUITOUS INSULT FROM COMMANDER IN CHIEF

Frank A. Hecht, president of the Navy League of the United States, commenting on President Truman's statement which said the Marine Corps "have a propaganda machine that is almost equal to Stalin's," today said: "Anyone who served in the Navy has a tremendous respect for marines. All marines ask is that they be in the vanguard of the fighting line as they always have been for the last 150 years. Their deeds speak for themselves. The marines fighting and dying in Korea don't think of themselves as naval cops. Neither do the widows or parents of those who were killed at Guadalcanal, on Iwo Jima, or Okinawa. If the Commander in Chief of all our Armed Forces were familiar with the law, he would know that the Marines are not part of the Navy. They are part of the naval service. He should also know that under the law they are charged with primary responsibility for amphibious warfare, for fleet landings, for securing and holding beachheads and many other functions. Never has there been such a gratuitous insult from the Commander in Chief to one of our fighting forces. The President owes an apology to every marine, to every ex-marine, and to the widows and parents of marines who died fighting for their country. They don't like being compared to the No. 1 enemy of democracy."

Governor Lee, of Utah

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by Mr. Gail Martin for the New Leader publication of July 8, 1950, in answer to several articles appearing in national magazines concerning Governor Lee, of Utah.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEE OF UTAH: CHAMP OR SCAMP
(By Gail Martin)

The State of Utah has been signally honored. Within less than a month, five national magazines have burst forth with long and handsomely illustrated articles on the life and works of its very own Gov. J. Bracken Lee. This effusion represents more praise and publicity than has been lavished on all Utah chief executives since statehood was won in 1897.

The articles in Time, Life, Newsweek, the American Magazine and the Saturday Evening Post sustain a single note of thanksgiving and joy. At last in the remote and sparsely settled State of Utah, a stalwart, farseeing statesman has been discovered—one who turns a deaf ear to all pressure groups and untiringly spreads the gospel of reduced Government services and spending.

To report that Utah residents are a bit nonplussed by such adulation for their Governor would be an understatement. Many who have smirked at his reckless statements and inept executive acts during the past 15 months are beginning to wonder if they have wronged a great and good man. Independent-thinking Republicans, who had rebelled at the Governor's broken promises and inconsistencies are scurrying back to the party fold.

But discerning students of public affairs are suspicious. Why, they ask, should five powerful weeklies, with a combined circulation running into millions, pool forces to elevate an inexperienced, poorly informed and frequently bungling politician to the dizzy pinnacle of national fame?

Are these articles part of Grand Old Party publicity sounding the overture for the 1950 congressional and 1952 Presidential campaigns? Does Republican strategy call for glorification of some erstwhile businessman like Governor Lee as restorer of the lost ideals of economy and efficiency in government in order to promote big business' aim of smashing the hard-won social benefits of the New and Fair Deals? Is it because Brack Lee's whole political philosophy so closely parallels the Taft-Wherry-McCarthy line that the Utah Governor has been selected as the ideal personality to dramatize the virtues of Republicanism?

No one knows for sure, but the claims made for Governor Lee's administration in the five magazines are so far from its actual accomplishments to date that astute observers are convinced a little snooping would turn up some curious facts. Everyone admits that Brack Lee is a cagey opponent. He tells all his audiences that he is a humble man, bewildered by all the national publicity—he is no politician; he believes only in governmental economy and efficiency. He says all this in such a straightforward, modest, and plausible manner that you can't help believing him—unless of course you chance to remember the Baconian precept that men customarily employ language to conceal, not communicate, thought.

Brack is also no amateur in the use of the McCarthy smear technique. He has a wholesome respect, he tells audiences, for those who openly declare themselves to be members of the Communist Party. But he has no respect for those who deny allegiance to communism, and yet invariably come up with some plan borrowed from communism or socialism whenever they frame a policy for the Government. In one speech in Los Angeles, he out-McCarthied McCARTHY himself when—the chief executive of the State of Utah—he confessed that he feared the Democratic Party more than the Russian Government.

Governor Lee stands for good roads, good schools, good hospitals, old-age pensions—all the good things, in fact—thereby qualifying as a man of good-will to all, even as a do-gooder. The trouble is that he always winds up such touching avowals with the rhetorical question: "But can we afford them?" He boasts proudly that the United States has the best schools, the best roads, the best medical facilities in the world. But the implication of his words always seems to be that such perfection needs no improvement—especially when improvement means more government and more taxes.

The gap between his expressed intentions and his performance is so great that critics have come to the conclusion that Lee's political philosophy calls for reducing governmental functions to the medieval level of merely keeping the peace and enforcing payment of debts. They are convinced he would like to restore to private industry services the Government has supplied for decades and, in general, return to horse-and-buggy economic and political principles in an atomic age.

STATE NEVER INDEBTED

Governor Lee and his publicity brigade talk as if Utah had never had honest, efficient government until he came to office. But a visit to the State treasurer's office reveals that, after 25 years of Democratic administration, Utah is one of the few States with no bonded indebtedness. During the administration of Lee's predecessor, Gov. Herbert B. Maw, more than enough Federal bonds were purchased and deposited in the State sinking fund to liquidate completely the remaining $700,000 of State obligations. When Lee took office January 1, 1949, Utah had an untouched reserve of $5,000,000 in its emergency relief fund and an appropriated but unexpended $4,000,000 in its building fund.

The Democratic-controlled 1949 State legislature sent Governor Lee an appropriation bill for 1950–51 calling for the expenditure of $2,800,000 less than anticipated revenues. The same Democratic legislature passed two measures that will add $1,600,000 in new revenues to the estimated surplus of $2,800,000. Yet Governor Lee deleted a total of $3,800,000 from the appropriation bill by line veto, eliminating or crippling 25 vital State services.

Had kind fate in the form of a district court decision not intervened, the Utah State Agricultural College would have had to withdraw the farm extension service lifeline it had maintained for the Utah farm industry since statehood. Rather than spend $400,000 for continued farm extension service in 1950–51, the Governor was prepared to toss overboard the United States Department of Agriculture grants-in-aid, and wreck a service of inestimable value to the State's agricultural industry.

In pursuing an "economy" policy unequaled by any Utah Governor—Republican or Democrat—Brack has shown himself the consummate politician. He never orders a Government service vital to the people or industry discontinued outright. Rather he will call in a department head and say: "Now I don't want you to discontinue any of these programs, but you can save the necessary funds by cutting out the graft, waste, and duplication in your department."

Following this strategy, he deleted at one fell swoop from the 1950–51 Department of Agriculture budget a $25,000 item for bovine tuberculosis or Bang's disease inspection, which had been carried on for decades in cooperation with the Federal Government. Bovine tuberculosis reduces the calf population and milk production, and decimates range and dairy herds.

But economy-minded Brack, who is death on State services supported by Federal grants-in-aid and evidently cares little about the health of Utah's citizens and the welfare of one of its great industries, whacked off the funds to finance this long-standing program.

For the sake of a few thousand dollars, the program to control chicken pullorum, which wipes out poultry in great numbers, suffered the same fate. So did the soil conservation program, which, for a biennial expenditure of $5,000, safeguards lives and property against disastrous floods. The weed-control program was also bluepenciled at a time when competent agricultural authorities were warning that noxious weeds not only cost the farming industry at least $20,000,000 annually, but if unchecked, may destroy before long the fertility of all Utah farmland.

This is but a partial list of Governor Lee's disastrous "economies." Virtually every sort of socially beneficial Government service—health, education, highways, water conservation, and others—has been stricken by the Lee "efficiency and economy program." Only those budget items affecting the Governor's office have escaped the ax. True, the American magazine ecstatically announced that the first thing "efficiency-and-economy-loving" Brack did, on assuming office, was to lop $27,000 off the appropriation for maintenance of the gubernatorial mansion.

But State records show that Governor Lee, in January 1949, recommended the same $32,500 asked by his predecessor, Governor Maw. The 1949 legislature trimmed his request by $2,500, leaving Brack $30,000 to keep house with. Yet the American magazine would have admiring citizens believe that Brack is maintaining the Governor's mansion out of his own pocket.

When Lee first took office, the daily press approvingly quoted him to the effect that, hencetforth, Utah's Governor would not burden taxpayers by maintaining an expensive Cadillac for his private use. The new chief executive would supply and drive his own car. Forthwith, the Governor's handsome 1946 Cadillac, which had just been overhauled and put in tip-top condition, was sold for $1,500. This price, Democrats charge, was about $1,500 under the market for a used car of that type.

On the heels of the favorable newspaper publicity which naturally followed, the State finance commission received a requisition from the Governor's office for the purchase of a new 1949 Cadillac. The commission, consisting of hold-overs from the Maw administration, sent the purchase order back to Governor Lee with a note stating that the budget did not provide sufficient funds for the purpose. This minor deviation from the widely trumpeted Lee "economy" program received little mention in the press. Neither did the fact that, as soon as he had appointed a new economy-minded finance commission, the Governor purchased a new Cadillac.

LEE'S APPOINTMENTS

Brack Lee doesn't play politics. He says so himself, so it must be true. He also claims that he stoutly resists the influence of all pressure groups—labor, teachers, farm, cultural, social service. Yet no one has ever heard him say that he objected to being pressured by big business. As an opponent of politics, waste, and duplication of effort in Government, he might be expected to show a record studded with brilliant examples of devotion to his lofty principles. Here, for the benefit of posterity—and, particularly, the readers of Time, Life, et al—are a few highlights of what must be accounted a very sorry record, indeed:

1. One of Lee's first official acts was to employ an attorney in the Governor's office at $500 a month during the legislative session. Other governors had limped along with the legal advice of the lower-paid State attorney general's staff, and a messenger to run errands to the legislature. One critic commented sourly afterward: "Any messenger boy could have helped the Governor arrive at decisions as wise as those he reached with the aid of his special attorney."

2. Lee has employed an executive assistant at $500 a month for work that had been always done by the Governor's secretary at $333.

3. He appointed as chairman of the State board of agriculture a man with a business background, who made no pretense of having ever been either a dirt or a gentleman farmer. When farm groups bitterly protested the appointment, the Governor high-mindedly announced that he wanted the board to include representatives of all types of farming—even people who sold machinery and supplies to the farmer.

4. He appointed a State engineer with only 1 year of college engineering background, most of whose experience had consisted of construction work for the State's largest mining corporation. Even Republicans wonder if the Governor could not have found a man better qualified by education and experience to administer the State's water-conservation program, upon whose success will depend Utah's prosperity and growth in the years to come.

5. Appointments to the University of Utah board of regents all consisted of citizens in the higher-income brackets of finance, mining, utilities, and manufacturing. Not one representative of labor has landed a place on this highly important body.

Have 15 months of Lee incumbency produced results as happy as the national magazines would have readers believe? The State's bill for salaries for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1949, was reported in the daily press as $33,000 larger than the year before. The number of employees was smaller, indicating that salary increases were responsible. Brack Lee cannot be wholly blamed for this advance, since he held office for only 6 months of the period. But the new record of expenditures supports the claim of his Democratic opponents that the Lee administration's savings won't amount to peanuts.

Many citizens see in Governor Lee's "courageous assaults on State spending and his rejection of plans to get Federal money for State aid"—to borrow the words of a newspaper editorial writer—something far more insidious and destructive than a drive for economy and efficiency. They see a determined, systematic, and ruthless scheme to undermine faith in the peoples' power to act by the democratic process to improve their lot; and an attempt to smear as wastrels, incompetents, and selfish politicians all Government servants.

A recent article in the Saturday Evening Post reported that Governor Lee has one serious criticism of our social and economic system. "Since the New Deal," Governor Lee is quoted as saying, "it is no longer possible for an honest man to make a million dollars. And I resent that."

This statement explains a good deal about Governor Lee. He truly and sincerely believes in helping the rich get richer. He probably wouldn't have the poor get any poorer, for, as he assures us, he is essentially a man of good will. But all his public acts seem to point one way—to a speedy return to the Dark Ages, when the serfs froze and starved, and the jolly knights and barons lived off the fat of the land.

A Challenge to America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VIRGIL M. CHAPMAN

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, the eloquent and inspiring address delivered on the 4th of September 1950, by the able and distinguished junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] at the annual convention of the American Legion, Department of Oklahoma, in Oklahoma City, Okla.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Thank you, Commander Dick Warren; Comrades of the American Legion, it is a great pleasure to be here; it is a high honor to address this audience.

I speak to you as a buddy and as a friend. I am, of course, both aware of and grateful for my identity as the junior Senator from Oklahoma. The views I express are, however, my own and are in no wise binding on the Congress.

With this in your minds, I would like to talk with you about the condition of our great country as I see it, and its position and responsibilities in the world in which we live.

The great Roosevelt once said: "The state of this Nation is good; the heart of this Nation is sound; the spirit of this Nation is strong; the faith of this Nation is eternal."

In recent weeks, I have heard and read the views of many who feel otherwise. They are jittery about the unity, security, and preparedness of our Nation. Some even dolefully ask: "Who killed Cock Robin?" I would like to answer all of these fine, but I believe, mistaken people here and now—it is my positive conviction that Cock Robin ain't dead.

In fact, using Cock Robin as the symbol of the mighty power of this, the greatest Nation on the earth, I would say he is about the livest bird I know. I am persuaded that some who indulge in mournful soliloquy and ask: "Who killed Cock Robin?" are in reality more interested in convicting him of a misspent youth than in priming him for a healthy future.

Some people seem to get a limited satisfaction out of pointing a finger of scorn and trying to fix the blame on somebody for something. However, they are much wiser as to what might or should have been, than as to what should be. Knowing so well that my own hindsight is better than my foresight, I am aware that many others are the same.

I believe our country will be better served by a new and fiercer resolve to make her stronger today and tomorrow, than by merely finding fault with some weakness of yesterday.

I would not shield anyone who should be censured. I would not forgive anyone who should be punished. But our first job is to work and build and prepare until we are impregnable. Then, let those who will, devote what time they may, to who did what and when.

During the past 5 years, our country has spent $49,000,000,000 on national defense. This is an all-time record for peacetime expenditures.

This has made it possible for this Nation to have 1,461,000 fighting men in her Armed Forces. I am proud to say to you that they are the best-fed, the best-clothed, and the best-equipped fighting men on the earth. Every American is proud that his Government has provided them with fair pay and the best food, clothing and equipment that money can buy. Twenty of the forty-nine billion dollars has gone for these items alone.

Another $13,000,000,000 has been required for the maintenance and operation of our aircraft, our fleets, and military installations.

Another $8,000,000,000 has been spent in research, development of new weapons, including atomic bomb tests, maintenance of the National Guard and Organized Reserves.

During this 5 years, we have spent nearly $2,000,000,000 each year for additional munitions of war—ships, planes, tanks and guns.

We now realize that we must accelerate our spending; we must double the personnel and we must vastly increase the munitions. This we will do.

Ah, my friends, we know the dangers that confront us. They are real. They are deadly, but they are recognized by all Americans everywhere. The concern of our people is as real as these dangers are.

I think Americans are more alert and more vigilant today than ever before, and I know that an alert and vigilant America is a secure America.

In our generation, the tides of aggression and conquest have overrun many lands and subdued many people. America has been the rock of Gibraltar against which those tides have beaten in vain. They have been thrown against us with all of the fury of hatred, greed and selfish ambition. Each time we have hurled them back in failure and defeat. We have seen our Nation emerge stronger from each impact, stronger by reason of a more vital spirit and greater vigilance in the hearts and minds of our people. Our Nation stands today:

"Like some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale and rides above the storm;
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

But, my comrades, we cannot rest now nor falter here. We face an even sterner task today than those which have already tried us so sorely. Tides of evil propaganda roll against the bulwark of our freedom today. The tides of aggression we knew in yesteryear were physical, and their purpose was to subdue only our material strength. Today's aggressors would use their false propaganda to lull the minds and seduce the will of our people. Then they would unleash their raw and brutal power to make us their slaves.

My comrades, the time has come for the people of this Nation and the world to strip the mask of hypocrisy from the face of the men in the Kremlin.

The premeditated insults to the western world constantly spewing from the mouths of the Molotovs and the Vishinskys are daily reminders of their intense hatred. Lenin and Trotzky and Stalin have declared over and over again that western civilization as we know it must be destroyed. Their avowed purpose is to conquer and dominate the world by revolution from within or conquest from without.

Their record confirms this; their actions prove it.

In 1939, only 17 days after Hitler invaded Poland, Stalin attacked and seized eastern Poland.

In 1943, the Baltic States—Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania—were occupied and taken over.

Czechoslovakia was ravished and forced under Russian control. Albania was grabbed by one sweep of the bear's paw.

In February of 1945, Stalin, Churchill, and Roosevelt met at Yalta. There are those who blame Roosevelt for what was agreed to at Yalta. But the tragedies that have been complained of, were in violation of that agreement, not in accordance with it. In less than 30 days, and before the ink was dry on the paper, Russia broke her pledged word in her brutal subjection of Rumania and Bulgaria.

In the meanwhile, we had shattered the Japanese in the Pacific. Yet 4 days before the Japs surrendered, Russia declared war on Japan and used this as the excuse to seize Manchuria, march into Korea, and begin the conquest of continental China.

In 1939 Russia controlled about 170,000,000 people. Today she dominates over eight hundred million. In 1939 Russia controlled 8,000,000 square miles of territory. Today she dominates nearly thirteen million. Today one-fourth of the globe and 32 percent of the world's population are subject to the will of one man—Russian Premier Stalin.

Russia has done this all in 11 years. Eleven years in which she used every trick in the book.

She used the veto power in the United Nations 43 times. Counting only the major offenses, Russia violated her agreements 88 times in 10 different countries.

The roll call of Russian conquest up until June of this year reads like this: Finland, Poland, Rumania, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Czechoslovakia, eastern Germany, Austria, Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, China, Mongolia, and Korea—down to the thirty-eighth parallel.

In most of these instances the Soviet Union's scheme was to establish and control puppet regimes. Deceitfully from behind the iron curtain, she pulled the strings.

But your Government watched these maneuvers like a hawk. Both from within and from without the sounding board of the United Nations, it exposed and denounced each and every move. It did everything possible short of war. A thorough clean-up would have required a full-scale war and the use of unlimited American troops.

But, wherever the Soviet Union, or its puppets, did not possess actual military control, the United States Government has successfully thwarted Russian aggression.

Moscow's plans to master Iran were defeated.

Russia failed in her campaign to force Turkey to cede territory and accept Soviet control of the straits.

She was frustrated in her efforts to conquer Greece through guerrilla activities.

She was denied a foothold in the occupation of Japan.

She was barred from a voice in the control of western Germany, particularly the Ruhr.

We beat her to the draw in her purpose to capitalize on economic weakness and political uncertainty in western Europe.

We stopped her cold both in France and Italy.

Her most dramatic failure was in her all-out effort short of war to blockade the Western Allies out of Berlin. I do not think that any more far-reaching or significant peacetime victory has been won in our lifetime than that of the Air Forces of the United States and her allies in maintaining the Berlin airlift.

Then, my comrades, without warning and without provocation, early on the morning of Sunday, June 25, 1950, strong military forces from behind the iron curtain hurdled the thirty-eighth parallel and invaded the Republic of Korea. This free and independent republic had been established by the United Nations after a free election was held early in 1948. At the very time of the attack the UN Study Commission was right there trying to work out a peaceful solution.

On June 25 that Commission, still in the invaded area, sent its report to the United Nations, which, in the language of President Truman, "made it unmistakably clear that the attack was naked, deliberate, unprovoked aggression without a shadow of justification."

Continuing, the President said: "The attack on the Republic of Korea, therefore, was a clear challenge to the basic principles of the United Nations' Charter and to the specific actions taken by the United Nations in Korea. If this challenge had not been met squarely, the effectiveness of the United Nations would have been all but ended and the hope of mankind that the United Nations would develop into an institution of world order would have been shattered."

Mr. Commander and comrades, the United Nations was faced by the stern proposition that it must either meet and stop that ruthless and bloody aggression or close up shop and go out of business.

The United States of America also faced a critical decision. As the leader of 53 peace-loving nations, and in her own sovereign capacity, she had to meet this challenge. She had to stand up for the peace of the world and the security of her own firesides or back down in abject futility.

Let us make no mistake, my fellow Americans, all of us, as individuals and through our Government, have been working to secure peace ever since the last shot was fired in World War II. We hate war and all of its aids and purposes. We love freedom and liberty. We adore justice and we are dedicated to the achievement of a peace "that will permit all the men in all the lands to live out their lives in freedom from fear and freedom from want."

But we do not seek the peace of the craven or the coward. We spurn the peace of the conquered or the vanquished. We do not want the peace of the sepulcher of our hopes and aims and ideals. We will not accept the peace of the tomb in which we must witness the burial of the American way of life.

We helped create the United Nations. We helped breathe into it the breath of life. We have glorified it with our hopes. We have fortified it with our physical power. We have endowed it with our spiritual resources. We yet believe that it is the best hope for an abiding peace that the mind of man has ever conceived or his hand fashioned.

Mr. Commander, I do not subscribe to the views of those who would bar the doors of the United Nations to Soviet Russia. It is true that her representatives have done all within their power to defeat its purpose. It is true that they have proven themselves so unworthy that, if its sacred premises could be defiled by wicked men, the representatives of Soviet Russia have defiled it.

But we must continue striving to keep Soviet Russia inside the United Nations. Just as surely as the United Nations is the best instrument to achieve the peace, Russia is, in the final analysis, the nation with whom that peace must be made.

Discouraged as we may be with our efforts thus far; certain as we are that heretofore and now, Russia has worked to sabotage peace rather than promote it, I am certain that our efforts must continue. They should be aimed, first, to the people of Russia, and second, to the rulers of Russia. Certainly if we are to do this we must maintain official contact with them.

Our efforts must ever be to prevent war, never to provoke it. To succeed we must wage peace, not conflict. To start a so-called preventive war would be to confess failure and invite disaster.

I declare to you every day that passes in which the United Nations still meet and in which Russia's representatives still participate, means that world war III is prevented at least another day. Each such day is a dual victory. It is another day in which the shedding of American blood has been held to a minimum. It is another day in which we have demonstrated to ourselves and proven to the world that our first and primary objective is to secure an everlasting peace. It is another day in which the western world grows stronger and the slave world becomes comparatively weaker.

Ah, I know that as we watch the strutting and the hypocrisy and the false accusation of a Malik or a Vishinsky, we are tempted to take a lash and a scourge and drive them from this temple dedicated to peace. But I agree with Warren Austin, who said the other day that he would much prefer to see more diplomats with more ulcers than to be saddened by more bullets in more GI's.

I am, therefore, convinced that we must continue to labor for peace in the Council chamber of the United Nations. I am just as positive that we must continue to accelerate our military preparation to meet our duty and commitment to the United Nations. That which we preach in the one instance, we must practice in the other. As we are alert in the forum we must be prepared in the field.

America lives in a present and faces a future different from any she has ever known. At the conclusion of World War II, feeling that we had achieved victory in war and the opportunity for peace, we laid down our arms. We left them rusting on the battlefields around the world. Our fighting men who had marched triumphantly on a hundred fronts marched happily home. Their fondest desire was to again become a part of our civil life and claim its benefits for their own. We believed that our allies either desired or would accept that which we cherished most—peace and good will among men.

We now know that we can no longer proceed on that basis.

We now know that we must reconstruct our concept of what is required of us.

We now know that if there is to be world peace, we, and we alone, have the power and the might and the confidence of others to lead the free peoples of the world into achieving that peace.

We now know that we cannot let Soviet Russia and her satellites gain that leadership by superior force or by cunning or by our default.

We now know that we must rearm until we are the strongest military power in the world.

Ah, I know how men can feel that these days are dark and that these times are stern. There have been dark days in Korea for our fighting men these past weeks. It was on a dark day when the American commander in Korea sent that awful order to tens of thousands of America's finest sons, "Hold the positions you now occupy or die." The Americans who received that order were men and boys from the firesides of Oklahoma and every other State in this land. Each and every one cherished life and home, love and liberty, with a zeal equal to mine or to yours. Each and every one was loved by wife and mother, father or brother, sons and daughters. Few times in the history of this Republic have days been so dark, or the situation so critical, that an American commander was compelled to say to his men, "Stand or die."

You and I have learned, and history will show how well the spirit of that order has been obeyed. But in standing up to it, many Americans have died.

When the Persian hordes invaded Europe in 400 B. C., their drive was irresistible until they met Leonidaes and his gallant Spartans at the Pass of Thermopolae. At the beginning of that fight, Leonidaes gave the same order to his soldiers, "Stand or die." The hordes of Persia were stopped at Thermopolae, but those soldiers of Sparta died in stopping them.

There is an inscription on that battlefield today. It reads: "Stranger, go tell the Lacedaemonians that we lie here, in obedience to their command." That dramatic message has thundered down the centuries. It is cherished wherever courage and heroism are known. It is whispered wherever brave men have been tried.

Mr. Commander, the response of American soldiers who have died and are now dying in Korea is thundering in our ears today. It is beating its message into men's hearts wherever national security is cherished or prayers for peace are offered.

What is our answer? What is the answer of 150,000,000 Americans? Mr. Commander, there can be but one answer. We likewise must hold the positions we occupy or die.

Fifty-three nations—peace-loving nations—march today under the flag of the United Nations. The hundreds of millions of people of those 53 countries must support the United Nations and give it the power to successfully hold aggression at bay, or the United Nations will disintegrate and fall apart. It must hold the position it occupies or it will die.

It is no easy task which confronts us. It is the biggest job that a peacetime America has ever been called upon to do.

If our fighting men and their comrades can survive in the battle hell in Korea; if they can live in the mud and the muck, in the heat and the grime and the filth of bloody war in a foreign land; if they can march through to glorious victory there—who are we to shrink from the responsibilities that are ours here, or shirk the job that is given us to do at home?

The struggle is fierce and titanic. It is to determine if freedom can be kept by those who have it, and won by others, or if it must be lost by all.

The struggle is to determine whether men shall control their governments or become the puppets and pawns of government. It is to determine whether man can own his property and be protected in that ownership by his government, or whether both he and his property shall become the chattels of that government.

Since Russia respects neither God nor man, this struggle will decide whether man, created in the image and likeness of God, is to have the freedom to worship that God, or be enslaved by those who deny both the existence of God and man's right to worship Him.

It is to determine whether man is to stand erect under the banner of democracy or be shackled by the chains of tryranny.

But, thank God, there is an awful and yet a glorious truth about this struggle. The awful truth about it is that Russia cannot win it, never. The glorious truth about it is that a united and vigilant America cannot lose it, ever.

The Boys in Room 1106

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I have a friend in Arkansas. Believe it or not, he is the national Democratic committeeman, Dr. R. B. Robins, for whom I have profound respect and admiration.

Dr. Robins sent me a copy of an article entitled "The Boys in Room 1106," which he has written for the August issue of Medical Economics. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BOYS IN ROOM 1106

(By R. B. Robins, M. D., as told to Martin Keeler)

Meeting at midnight last May 15 in a small room of the Hotel Stevens, Chicago, a doubtful quorum of Democratic National Committee members pulled a fast one on the party rank and file. They adopted in the party's name a resolution reaffirming the 1948 Democratic platform, but containing this joker:

"In order to avoid socialized medicine in the United States, we endorse the President's program for broadened Federal activity in the entire field of health and medical care and the adoption of a pay-as-you-go insurance program to put better medical care within the financial reach of all Americans."

Behind these 51 words lies a significant story. It's a story of (a) slick abridgement of party rules, (b) socialist semantics with a two-way stretch, and (c) Machiavellism in medico-politics.

To begin with, the committee's action was unauthorized. The Democratic Party rule book clearly states: "The duties and powers of the national committee are derived from the convention, and no convention has authorized the formulation of proposals which might be construed to be in the nature of platform declarations." This rule book adds: "The Democratic National Committee has no authority, expressed or implied, to prescribe issues for the Democratic rank and file." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 3d sess. of 71st Cong., p. 6616).

The 1948 platform, framed at the party's Philadelphia convention, made no reference whatever to compulsory health insurance. Yet the 1950 platform, framed by the boys in room 1106 at the Hotel Stevens, endorses it.

Or does it? Here we get into the shadowy science of semantics, the pet of the socializers, dealing with word connotations and nuances.

Note, for example, the use of the phrase "pay-as-you-go." It's intended to give the Ewing scheme a coloration of financial soundness and plain American good sense. In truth, of course, the scheme is anything but pay-as-you-go. To support it, billions annually would have to come out of the United States Treasury's general funds—adding appreciably to the Government's yearly operating deficit. That deficit is financed by Government borrowing, a mortgage on the future.

More important, note the phrase "to avoid socialized medicine * * *." That's a semantic sockdolager.

Correctly or incorrectly, compulsory health insurance has been tagged in the public mind as socialized medicine. And in the public nostrils socialized medicine has begun to develop an odor. According to the latest Gallup poll, for example, the Nation's voters oppose the administration's health plan by a 3-to-2 count.

But the socializers' strategem of giving their wilting rose a new name isn't as amateurish as it seems. It involves a high order of political trickery.

Let me tell you what went on at Chicago what led up to the shenanigans there, and how they bear on this fall's congressional elections.

Some weeks before the committee met, it printed and began distributing (at party expense) 200,000 copies of a booklet called Better Medical Care That You Can Afford. I suspect the text was prepared by the Committee for the Nation's Health, a private lobbying group for nationalized medicine; it would not be the first time the Democratic National Committee had distributed CNH literature. But the point is, despite the absence of a compulsory-health-insurance plank in the party platform, this booklet was and is a brochure for compulsory health insurance—bearing the national committee's imprimatur.

It is now clear that a handful of committee brass in Washington had already decided for the committee as a whole that it would go down the line for the Ewing scheme.

The Chicago meeting was called ostensibly as a national Democratic conference and Jefferson jubilee. General sessions were scheduled for Saturday, May 13, at the Blackstone Hotel; a rally was slated for Monday evening, May 15, at Soldiers' Field. At the Saturday morning and afternoon sessions, it was casually announced that a third such session would be held at the Hotel Stevens after the Monday evening rally. Many committeemen missed these announcements because they were attending other special sessions; I was attending the luncheon and panel discussion on welfare legislation.

I had with me five leading authorities on medical economics, whom I wanted to have a hearing. They were Dr. Paul R. Hawley, director of the American College of Surgeons, former Blue Cross-Blue Shield head, and one-time chief medical officer of the VA; Dr. George F. Lull, general manager of the AMA; Frank G. Dickinson, Ph. D., AMA economist; Edward O'Connor of the Insurance Economics Society; and John W. Neal, attorney for the Illinois State Medical Society. But I'm afraid I led them on a wild goose chase.

The welfare panel was beautifully stage-managed. Presiding was Mrs. India Edwards, vice chairman of the Democratic National Committee. By prearrangement, an enthusiastic foursome—Oscar Ewing, Representative Andrew Biemiller, of Wisconsin, the AFL's Nelson Cruikshank, and Manhattan physician Theodore Sanders—rendered love's old sweet song for compulsory health insurance.

WHO'S AFRAID OF AMA?

Each speaker had 15 minutes. Oscar Ewing took the lead in doing the customary hatchet work on the AMA. Congressman BIEMILLER voiced his amazement at "the circus tactics used by the huckster hirelings of our dignified doctors." After a solid hour of such goings-on, I was given the floor for exactly 5 minutes * * *.

ROBINS. "Well, I must say the members of this panel have done a pretty good promotion job. They're good salesmen for their ideas. And we're all agreed on one thing: We're for insurance. But I'm for voluntary health insurance, not compulsory. I don't like compulsion. I like freedom.

"I know that some of you will be surprised to know this, but I happen to be one of Jack Ewing's physicians."

EWING. "I didn't know it."

ROBINS. "Well—I'll tell you about it, Jack—I'm his endocrinologist. The other night, Jack met my wife and me. He told her, 'You know, Doc keeps my glands of internal secretion working.'"

I went on to challenge the committee's authority in promoting the compulsory program. I expressed my opinion that, if pursued, this policy would cost the Democratic Party control of Congress this fall. I answered the panel speakers' remarks about the AMA lobby fund:

"You know, we Democrats talk about pressure groups. One of the greatest pressure groups in this country today is Jack's agency, the Federal Security Administration. They use tax money—your money and my money—to promote their pet schemes."

I concluded by introducing my five guest experts:

"I hope that, in true democratic fashion, Mrs. Edwards will permit these gentlemen to ask questions. They are willing to answer questions, and I hope that she will permit them to make pertinent comment on any question in order to clarify it. * * *"

Mrs. EDWARDS. "I am afraid your time is up, Dr. Robins. According to the rules, no one may speak except Members of Congress or members of the national committee, and then for 5 minutes only. These distinguished gentlemen (Dr. Hawley, et al.) may have the floor to ask questions. If we may have the same courtesy at an AMA meeting, I will be very glad."

She continued, however, with a little speech of her own in behalf of compulsory health insurance. Thereafter some 15 other committeemen rose to say what they thought of doctors in general and me in particular.

It was Oscar Ewing's hour of glory. Observing from the head table were such other party moguls as W. Stuart Symington, head of the National Security Resources Board; Mrs. Perle Mesta, Minister to Luxemburg; Leon Keyserling, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers; and Cabinet members Oscar Chapman, Maurice Tobin, Jesse Donaldson, and Charles Brannan.

Such was the background for the final coup, the quasi-secret midnight meeting on Monday, at which the health resolution was passed. I'm told that only a handful of committee members were present. The escape clause ("In order to avoid socialized medicine * * *") was introduced by Ed Kelly, Illinois committeeman and former Chicago mayor. He had a special reason: Illinois' SCOTT LUCAS, Democratic floor leader of the United States Senate, up for reelection this fall, wanted to get off the compulsory-health-insurance hook. Now he can state piously that he's dead set against socialized medicine—yet stay mum on the more specific issue.

The Ewing group, of course, immediately recognized the Nation-wide usefulness of the Kelly suggestion. Now any Democratic candidate, before an audience that is anti-compulsion, can take a stand like that of Senator LUCAS; before a procompulsion audience, the same candidate can forget his semantics and plump for Federal medicine by whatever name he chooses.

That, in gist, is the fall campaign strategy of one faction of the Democratic Party. Will it work?

It will not.

PRIMARIES POINT WAY

Senator CLAUDE PEPPER took his trouncing for the Democratic renomination in Florida before the boys in room 1106 came up with their rose-by-another-name stunt; but I'm sure it couldn't have saved him. Florida doctors, working quietly and methodically in behalf of PEPPER'S opponent, Representative GEORGE A. SMATHERS, were not to be denied. Listen to this, from an editorial in the United Mine Workers Journal:

"In 44 years of covering political campaigns, your editor has never witnessed such effective solicitation of votes as demonstrated by Florida doctors, druggists, dentists, hospital staffs, insurance companies, and pharmaceutical representatives, aided and abetted by other professional men."

Private medicine's drive to save itself via the ballot box got under way in September 1949. An election was held in Pennsylvania to fill the congressional vacancy created by the death of Representative Robert L. Coffey, Jr., a Democrat, from the Johnstown district in the western part of the State. Coffey's mother, the Democratic nominee, came out for the Ewing health plan. JOHN P. SAYLOR, Republican, opposed it. Doctors thereabouts, Democrats and Republicans alike, promptly formed a healing arts committee. It plugged SAYLOR in newspaper ads, radio spots, and publicity releases. SAYLOR won by 8,400 votes, compared with Coffey's 12,000 majority the previous year.

This sort of thing has been gathering momentum. A number of Democratic candidates—e. g., well over half the party's congressional aspirants in Indiana—have openly renounced compulsory health insurance. Many others may soon follow suit.

I sincerely hope so. For I am a Democrat, and I don't like to see Democrats go down to defeat before Republicans. But that's what they're going to do this fall if they persist with this compulsory health insurance business.

Soil Conservation as Exemplified by James G. Sanford

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VIRGIL M. CHAPMAN

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article by one great conservationist about another great conservationist. The article was written by Mr. Tom Wallace, editor emeritus of the Louisville Times, Louisville, Ky., who for a generation has been an outstanding advocate with tongue and pen of the conservation of the soil and other natural resources which constitute the greatest material heritage we can hope to transmit to those who are to come after us in this land we call America.

The subject of this article, Mr. James G. Sanford, is a sterling citizen and excellent farmer of New Castle, Henry County, Ky., whom I have known for the past 30 years as an outstanding example of what a practical, intelligent farmer can accomplish in the field of soil conservation. Mr. Sanford loves the land and appreciates the obligation of his trusteeship to transmit it to future generations richer than when it came into his possession.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Times of February 8, 1950]

THE STORY OF JIM, A FARMER DEVOTED TO HIS LAND—WONDERING WHAT WILL HAPPEN TO HIS WELL-CARED-FOR ACRES AFTER HE IS GONE CAUSES HIM TO WORRY

(By Tom Wallace)

My friend, Jim, who is by 7 years my junior, has a deep-seated sorrow. He is not old for his age. His wife has the beauty-from-within that time enhances rather than mars. Her face is framed by silvery hair that seems prematurely grey because it softens lines which hair dye would make harsh. The sort of loveliness that is hers runs through her clan, among the women, and contributes to the pride and happiness of numerous husbands.

Jim has enough worldly goods to satisfy any reasonable man, and he is reasonable. He gives, regularly—declaring it fun—10 percent of his income. He says he could provide for himself and his wife from one-fourth of his farm, devoted to orchard grass and sheep, comfortable livelihood, including winters in Florida. He proves it by figures as to hay, seed, and sheep. So why should he be grieved about anything?

The source of his sorrow may be revealed in six words, the title of a comedy, "You Can't Take It With You."

What will become of his farm when he dies? How will it be treated? They are the questions in Jim's mind, and he is feeling low about the future. A man cannot live always, and someone, sometime, may be treating Jim's farm as a majority of 7,000,000 farms in the United States are treated, despite all that is said orally and in print in behalf of better treatment of land.

Jim's farm lies like a group of seashells laid convex side up. Each natural division is bordered by trees, not as thoughtfully guarded as the fields and meadows they separate—Jim is no forester—but still numerous after nearly a half century of Jim's occupancy of the land and valued by him as old friends. Between the meadows brooks trickle, most of the year, not in dryest weather. Because the brooks are not wholly dependable Jim has made ponds—commuters would say lakes—in several of the meadows. He is proud of the fact that after rains his ponds are clear. That proves that there is no erosion on the watersheds.

Jim agrees with Patrick Henry's profoundest statement: "The greatest patriot is the man who stops the most gullies."

Political speeches are invariably those most widely remembered. Everyone knows Henry's expressed preference for death as against life without liberty, but 999,999 persons in 1,000,000 never heard of the immortal Virginian's observation about gullies.

Jim doesn't think everything in farming depends upon the specialized education which colleges of agriculture present. He believes a good general education worth more. It develops initiative, self-reliance, he says, whereas specialized education develops a tendency to believe the last bulletin the last word; a disposition to try a new variety of tobacco seed each year.

A graduate of Notre Dame, Jim holds that Notre Dame's football successes reflect the thoroughness of a seat of learning.

"If I were educating a son I should have him graduate from a good liberal arts college," says Jim, "and if he then wished to farm he could do so at advantage."

Jim does not believe in fads, one of which in Kentucky, he says, is Kentucky Fescue 31, called the wonder grass.

"It's a soil depleter and you must have a legume in it to make livestock like it. It is easier to get fescue on a farm than to get rid of it, and nobody needs it who has orchard grass, Korean lespedeza, bluegrass and good land. Of course, if you are trying to make a pasture of a bog, that is something else."

Jim and I walked over his farm, among his ewes and lambs, his ponds, his strips of woodland. Often I narrowly missed losing my nose, or mournfully seeing it swell to three times its normal size, when Jim, thrilled by a sweeping view as we entered a new enclosure or crossed the crest of a hill, amplified his gesture of delight with his cane, which he waved in a wide half circle. I hadn't the heart to mention my anxiety. What is a nose, even a bunged nose, compared with a truly great love? Jim loves his farm as Whistler loved his mother.

There are no terraces on Jim's farm. He contends that if rolling land is rightly treated the soil does not run down hill with every rain or any rain. He proves it by, among other things, the size of his tobacco barn, which he has added to until it measures 140 feet long. It would not hold his entire crop last year. He had to hang tobacco in his cattle barn. His tobacco was not grown in the old-fashioned way on new ground, but in the new-fashioned way on old ground.

I have said that Jim loves trees. He will not agree with me that it would pay to fence his woodlands, which are narrow strips along intermittent water courses. Fencing them would require a great deal of wire and many posts, but timber deteriorates where livestock tramp the ground and rub against tree trunks.

Jim laughed away a lumberman who offered him $500 for his walnut trees, saying they were worth $2,000, but that it would cost $1,000 to cut them, and that he and the farm owner would split the other $1,000.

"Let 'em stand," said Jim. "They were here when I came. They will be here when I go if all I could get for them would be $5 each. The woods looks better with them than it would look without them."

It is not necessary when walking over Jim's farm, dodging his waving walking stick, to ask where his boundaries run. That is plain from the fatness of his nurtured soil. When he is not walking about with his cane scattering every little mound of sheep manure to improve its fertilizer value, he carries a long-handle pointed dirt shovel. If he detects the beginning of erosion in a swag he does a little agricultural surgery with his shovel and the wound in the soil is cured. Where there are gullies in much similar land, there is a mat of bluegrass on Jim's land around which the plowman plows, losing a bit of time but keeping a shield between the soil and storm water.

Jim could sell his farm for five times what it cost him. Not all of that increase reflects passing of time, or improvements in buildings. Most of it reflects the care Jim has devoted to his soil. Thinking about what may be done to his beloved 300 acres after he is gone is something he cannot avoid. If he had a son, or if he had a nephew who wished to be a farmer, he would be relieved of worry.

"If I were 50 years younger, Jim," I said, "I would suggest that you give your farm to me. I'd take care of it. You would get it off of your mind."

"But as matters stand," said Jim, "the best thing you can do is to preach keeping soil on rolling land by contour plowing and by the gully prevention I practice in pastures. Come here sometime in summer and you can drive all over this farm in a car and not feel a bump. If that were true of every farm in this county, farming would be more profitable. By the way, what are we going to do about sheep-killing dogs? I have lost 11 ewes this winter killed by dogs. One of them we had to shoot. Dogs had torn her up and left her living, but she could not have recovered."

Next to his land, maybe, Jim loves his sheep. He does not have to mow his meadows for weed control. His sheep control the weeds. But a sheep is only a sheep. Land stirs Jim's emotions. I avoid saying "deepest" emotions. Jim's wife, possibly, reads newspapers.

Aiding Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Aiding Russia," published in this morning's Washington Post. More than 2 years ago we stopped the shipping from this country to Russia of machine tools and other tools which would help in the making of war. Certainly the billions of dollars which we are spending in the way of ECA aid and other aid in foreign countries should not be used for the purpose of permitting those countries to send machine tools to Russia, particularly in view of the fact that we have stopped doing so ourselves. I approve heartily of what the editorial says, and I hope the State Department will do everything in its power to stop countries whom we are aiding from sending to Russia and its satellites machine tools and other equipment, with which it would be possible to manufacture weapons of war.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIDING RUSSIA

The unfavorable impression on American public opinion which was created by Mr. Churchill's charge that machine tools suitable for repair of tanks are being shipped to Russia has been heightened by Prime Minister Attlee's maladroit defense of the business. According to Mr. Attlee, exports of machine tools "regarded as of key importance for strategic purposes" were halted a year and a half ago, except in case of contracts already concluded before that date. However, as a spokesman for American machine tool manufacturers explains, "all machine tools of whatever nature, are used in war production * * * the types withheld can be built on the machines received." Moreover, the British are still shipping tools of high strategic value under contracts entered into before April 1948 and they also permit Russian inspectors to enter plants manufacturing these tools for the Soviet Union.

More than 2 years ago the United States stopped shipments of all types of American machine tools to Russia and her satellites. Since then this country has spent billions of dollars to assist the economic recovery of Great Britain and other western European countries, and is preparing to pour out additional billions to strengthen their defenses against Russian aggression. Consequently, when the British use scarce labor and raw materials to manufacture goods having military value for the use of a potential enemy, the United States has a right to protest.

The most alarming aspect of the disclosures in regard to Anglo-Russian trade is the patent reluctance of the Labor Government to put a stop to these shipments for fear of being accused of reneging on its trade agreement with Russia. What an excuse when Russian tanks may be killing British soldiers at this moment in Korea. Russia's reaction certainly can be disregarded in view of the critical international situation. And a country dependent on outside aid to strengthen its defenses should, as a matter of self-interest, either forego exports of strategic materials and equipment or else confine its exports of such goods to friendly nations. Since the Anglo-Russian trade deal was concluded, the world picture has undergone a transformation. Any government that continues to encourage trade expansion in these times for the sake of income, in disregard of political consequences, betrays "infirmity and disconnection of thought and action in shaping defense plans," to quote Mr. Churchill.

No doubt the Labor Government, prodded by American officials and under political attack on the home front, will take steps to halt machine-tool shipments to Russia, possibly by requisitioning them for home use. But that is a minor concession to public clamor, since Great Britain and her colonies export many other products that have high strategic value to Russia and her satellites. Unless trade in all such products ceases Great Britain will unwittingly become an economic ally of the country against which the Atlantic Pact nations are arming for self-defense. What does the North Atlantic Treaty organization mean if the members of it cannot even develop a common policy on trade with aggressive Russia?

Medal Honors Carolina Hero

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE R. HOEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, a news dispatch in the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer reciting the award of an Oak Leaf Cluster to a gallant and heroic North Carolina soldier, Lt. Logan C. Weathers, who was killed in action on August 2, 1950, in Korea.

It so happens that Lieutenant Weathers is from my home town of Shelby, N. C., and has had a brilliant war record. He won a Distinguished Service Cross for his heroic action in leading a costly assault in desperate fighting on Okinawa in 1945. Now he becomes one of the early death casualties in the Korean war, following his daring and courageous action in seizing a rifle and single-handed knocking out an enemy machine-gun nest. His act is properly described as exhibiting extraordinary heroism and his conduct adds glory to American arms. I feel a personal pride in his achievement, and his home county honors his memory.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEDAL HONORS CAROLINA HERO

EIGHTH ARMY HEADQUARTERS IN SOUTH KOREA, September 4.—Lt. Logan C. Weathers of Shelby, N. C., who won a Distinguished Service Cross for leading a costly assault on hill No. 79 on Okinawa in 1945, died a hero's death in Korea and won posthumously an Oak Leaf Cluster to his D. S. C.

Killed in action on August 2 on the southernmost front near Haman, Lieutenant Weathers had been all over the Korean front in an armored car attached to a reconnaissance platoon which worked in conjunction with the Twenty-fourth Division, the first American infantry outfit committed in Korea. On Okinawa he had been a member of the Seventy-seventh Division which cracked the middle of the Sjuri defense line.

Lieutenant Weathers' outfit was spearheading an attack by the Nineteenth Infantry Regiment on enemy positions near Haman when he was killed. An enemy concentration of mortar and bazooka fire included a direct hit upon Lieutenant Weathers' vehicle, in which his arm was partially blown off.

ATTACKS NEST

"At that instant the infantry came under terrific enemy machine-gun fire and, despite his serious wound, Lieutenant Weathers seized a rifle and single-handed, knocked out an enemy machine-gun nest," the citation for his second DSC said. "He silenced the machine-gun nest but during this action he was killed by sniper fire. Extraordinary heroism displayed by Lieutenant Weathers is an inspiration to all and reflects the highest credit on himself and the military service."

Three days prior to his fatal engagement, Lieutenant Weathers had been one of the last to leave Sinju—6 hours after the enemy seized the city—and he brought back word that three precious American medium tanks, equipped with 90-millimeter guns, had been unable to function because they lacked proper fan belts and voltage regulators. The tanks had to be destroyed because the Army supply service sent the wrong-sized fan belts and mistakenly substituted a box of 45-caliber pistols for the requested voltage regulators.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 31, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I again come to tell of still another Sunday night telecast program of Battle Report—Washington, which each succeeding week seems to become established more and more as a part of the regular function of government. In this case, however, the entire expense is borne by the National Broadcast System and not one cent is paid by the Federal Government.

Battle Report—Washington is, as you all know, a nonpolitical bipartisan program put on each Sunday evening at 8 wherein the Honorable John R. Steelman, Assistant to the President, presents top-flight Federal officials from the executive departments of Government who can and do speak authoritatively on matters of national interest which come under their personal direction and administration.

Last week in a cloak room discussion with respect to the latest telecasts, Democrat and Republican Members alike agreed that it was one of the best constructed and presented programs and certainly the most helpful public service ever projected over the air.

Mr. Speaker, from a friend in New York City I received a news clipping telling of last week's program. The article was written by Mr. John Lester, special feature writer and commentator on national happenings on radio and television.

Let me call upon Mr. Lester to tell my colleagues of the splendid work now being done in behalf of the national interests by Ted Ayers, the director of the program, and all the other splendid members of the NBC staff who, with the aid and assistance of our genial, good, and never-tiring friend, John Steelman, are each week giving to our people this splendid television teledocumentary from the Government here in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, there is a vast area of these United States still without television. In order that the libraries, colleges, schools, chambers of commerce, and citizens throughout the land who receive the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may enjoy the benefits of this new news feature, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks I include therein, first, Mr. Lester's article entitled "Capitol Talent Stars in Video Show"; and second, the NBC Battle Report—Washington.

Mr. Lester's article reads as follows:

RADIO AND TELEVISION—CAPITOL TALENT STARS IN VIDEO NEWS SHOW

There is on NBC television each Sunday at 8 an excellent program titled "Battle Report—Washington."

It's probably the only program of its kind, which, if entirely true, is unfortunate since Americans deserve more of this sort of thing.

In brief, it's an advanced type of news commentary, one that's handled by top-drawer Capitol officials, men who actually make news, and not someone reading copy torn from a newsroom teletype machine.

In addition, Battle Report—Washington, is a direct report to the American people by the same officers and men who advise and confer with the President.

As such, it reaches down to lift each of us right into a White House or congressional conference room, and TV program-wise it ranks with the celebrated UN coverage, Mrs. Roosevelt's famous Sunday evening television teas, Meet the Press, and the Presidential Cabinet's recent report to the public, in the matter of public service and public interest.

Among the Battle Report's guests in the weeks of its brief existence, have been John R. Steelman, who's about as close to President Truman as anyone we know; Steve Early, Presidential secretary, confidante and currently Under Secretary of Defense; Warren Austin, American delegate to the UN; Senator BRIEN MCMAHON, and under secretaries and assistant secretaries of various governmental departments by the dozens.

Scheduled to appear, of course, is Mr. Steelman, who is now a regular on the program, and who sounded its keynote when it began.

He announced that he, together with the program's producers and others who'd speak on it from time to time, believed there's a necessity for letting the American people know what their Government is doing, where their money is going, and why.

He said he felt there was no one better fitted for this task than those in Washington who are actually responsible.

This is, of course, not only true but, at times, painfully true.

Mr. Speaker, what follows is the script of the broadcast with the voice of President Truman introduced by electric transcription and video:

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON

(Production, Ted Ayers; script, Lou Hazam; commentary, Robert McCormick; film, NBC, United States Navy; technical director, Sherman Hildreth; art, NBC, Joseph Ferrier.)

(The voice of President Truman: "My fellow citizens, tonight I want to talk to you about Korea, about why we are there, and what our objectives are. It is your liberty and mine which is involved. What is at stake is the free way of life.)

ROBERT MCCORMICK. Once again, NBC Television turns its cameras upon Washington, where, just 46 hours ago, President Truman made his report to the Nation on the crisis in Korea. Korea, where the President's eight-point program for peace is reflected in flames. Against the background of the President's speech on Friday, and to amplify with vital detail some of the facts he touched upon then, we bring before you now top Government officials—civilian and defense. But, first, by way of preface to this fourth Battle Report, Washington, here is the assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. JOHN R. STEELMAN. Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. Tomorrow is Labor Day—a day set aside each year to honor those whose labors have brought so much to every American home. In his Labor Day statement, the President said in part: "We have good reason for special observance of this Labor Day. It should be a day of thanksgiving for past accomplishments and present opportunity; but it should also be a day of solemn dedication to the tasks that lie ahead of us. This year, especially, Labor Day symbolizes our facing forward as a nation in the heroic tasks we have assumed, with other free nations of the world, in the cause of peace." To most of us, tomorrow will be a holiday. It will be a day when we can break the routine of our daily lives and seek relaxation in any way we choose. But there will be no holiday for the heroic men in Korea. Their work goes on 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. I hope you will remember them. I hope you will remember that the President has said this day should be one of "solemn dedication," and resolve to do your part to build a world of peace. One of the reasons this Nation has become great is because we are all on the same team—labor, industry, agriculture, Government. We are all working toward one goal—a world of peace in which all shall have equal opportunity. Tonight I want you to visit with me, four men on the team. The Federal Security Administrator will tell you about the new social security law. Three flag officers of the United States Navy will take us behind the scenes in the Navy building and show us how that branch of the service is carrying on the struggle to keep us free. The shadow of tyranny obscures a large part of the world. These men have dedicated their lives to the task of keeping that shadow from falling upon us, so that we can remain free to speak our own thoughts, to worship God in our own way, to choose our own work. May the days ahead bring us hope and success because we have labored unceasingly toward our goal of peace in the world.

(The voice of President Truman: "We have the ability and the resources to meet the demands which confront us. Our industry and agriculture have never been stronger or more productive. We will use as much of this economic strength as is needed to defend ourselves and establish peace.")

ROBERT MCCORMICK. Vital to the economic strength of which our President speaks, is another and older war in which we are engaged at home. To report to you on this war, our scene shifts to New York City. Here, where he is standing by to address, within the next hour, the National Committee for Labor Israel, our cameras pick out Federal Security Administrator Oscar R. Ewing.

OSCAR R. EWING. I want to tell you about American progress in a different kind of war—a war that is so much a part of our own homes that our pay checks, our bank statements, our grocery bills might also be considered battle reports. I mean our fight against want and need and poverty—our fight for a decent living—our fight for what we call security. In democratic America we are winning this war. Social security is a reality here. Communist propaganda says Russia's social security is better than ours. Well, let's compare the two. Last Monday the amendments to our social-security law were approved by President Truman. Three out of four American workers are now covered by the Federal law. In Russia, only two out of four Communist workers are covered. In America persons entitled to benefits can demand them as a matter of right. This is not true in Russia. There the worker gets no benefits if he leaves his job without permission. Extra benefits are given workers who show high production records. Even maternity benefits vary according to length of service in a single enterprise and according to the output record. What happens when a worker dies? In America his children get monthly payments until they are 18. In Russia payments stop when the child is 5. In America the average monthly payment to the retired worker and his wife under the amended law will be $75 a month. In case of a worker's death his surviving wife and dependent children receive regular monthly benefits. Under the old law 35,000,000 American workers were covered. The new law extends coverage to an additional 10,000,000 Americans—most self-employed persons, such as shop keepers and the like, regularly employed farm workers, regularly employed domestic workers, as well as other large groups. Under the new law a person now 65 needs to have worked only 1½ years to be covered, and this work may have been done at any time after 1936. Dollar for dollar, the United States spends more than twice as much per person for social security and social insurance than the Soviet Union. What does social security mean for the American people? It is a powerful weapon in our war against want and need and poverty. It helps give millions of our people peace of mind—protection that they have earned for themselves in the American way. This is Oscar Ewing, speaking for the Federal Security Agency. I now return you to our Nation's Capital.

(The voice of President Truman: "These United Nations troops are still outnumbered. But their hard and valiant fight is bringing results. We hold a firm base of about 3,500 square miles. For weeks the enemy has been hammering, now at one spot and now at another, sometimes at many points at once. He has been beaten back each time with heavy loss.")

ROBERT MCCORMICK. Yes, beaten back with the help of the United States Navy; and here—only last week returned from the war front (he visited with Admiral Sherman and General Collins)—is Rear Adm. Robert Pierce Briscoe, Assistant Chief of Naval Operations, in charge of our fleet's readiness, with a first-hand report for you.

Admiral BRISCOE. When the North Korean Reds invaded South Korea on June 25 the Navy had 19 combatant ships stationed in far-eastern waters—1 carrier, 2 cruisers, 12 destroyers, and 4 submarines. Today we have more than 150 combat ships in the battle area, and their numbers are being constantly strengthened. These additional forces are required to support the United Nations' effort in Korea and to maintain a neutrality patrol in the Straits of Formosa in accord with the President's order to prevent attack upon Formosa by the Chinese Communists or attack upon the mainland by Nationalist China. While no action has occurred in this area to date, an effective force must be in readiness there, since Korea and Formosa are separated by some 900 miles. For the surface Navy in Korea, two separate and distinct problems are presented. On the west coast the shore line is ragged and treacherous, dotted with hundreds of islands, and honeycombed with coral reefs, shoals, uncharted sand bars, and mud flats. Moreover, the tidal range on this coast is extremely high—varying from 20 to 30 feet—whereas on the east coast the shore line is straight, the land falls abruptly into the sea, and there is deep water right up to the shore with a very small tidal range.

On the west side of Korea, therefore, the problem of our surface vessels in blockading the coast, furnishing gunfire support for our troops, and in bombarding railways, roads, and supply points is complicated by these geographic features. We have solved this problem by an effective liaison between our heavy ships, our coastal craft, patrol airplanes and carrier aircraft. The United Nations naval forces—which consist not only of our own Navy, but vessels from France, England, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, the Netherlands, and, of course, South Korea—are everyday drawing the noose tighter and tighter around the enemy's throat to the extent that no enemy waterborne traffic is in existence. On the east coast, the Navy has an ideal, tailor-made job. As I said, on this coast the water is deep and our cruisers and destroyers can get in close and use their big guns with excellent effectiveness. Here the coastal road and railway hugs the shoreline as it runs northward. We have been able to operate off this coast with cruisers and destroyers and to close this artery at will—demolishing tunnels and bridges, and shooting up any troops or convoys that chance to come down it, either day or night. One of the most favorable comments I can give you as the result of my trip to Korea is the splendid coordination that has been worked out between Army units ashore working with our Navy offshore. Four destroyers, you see, have the same fire power as an entire battalion of artillery, and in terms of hot metal they can deliver three times the weight of shells in the same period of time. For example, in the Yondok-Pohang area, the Army units ashore asked for naval gunfire support. Sometimes a naval gun can hit a target that an artillery piece ashore cannot touch. Recently in Pohang the Communist troops were hugging a side of a hill out of range of mortars, where Army artillery couldn't touch them. So the Army control party called for naval gunfire support. We moved in off the beach and were able to splatter the reverse slope with shellfire, and effectively broke up numerous enemy attacks before they got underway. As the tide of of the Korean war eventually turns, this effective, working liaison between our foot soldiers ashore and our United Nations Navy will become stronger and more effective. The war in Korea has been eloquent evidence that American sea power, properly balanced with land and air power, is vital against an enemy which itself has no navy.

(The voice of President Truman: "In less than 8 weeks, five divisions of United States troops have moved into combat, some from bases more than 6,000 miles away. More men are on the way. Fighting in difficult country, under every kind of hardship, American troops have held back overwhelming numbers of Communist invaders. Our naval and air forces have been carrying the attack to military bases and supply lines of the aggressors.")

ROBERT MCCORMICK. But while we are attacking the supply lines of the aggressors, our own supply lines must be kept flowing with equipment by men expert in the art of logistics—men like the Director of Logistic Plans for the Navy—Rear Adm. Harry Thurber.

Rear Admiral THURBER. There is nothing mysterious or new about logistics. We can recall Napoleon's brief description of logistics—an army marches on its belly. Supply of the inner man is only one phase of logistics. It is a sizeable item. For example, ships of the Navy—directed Military Sea Transportation Service have carried to Korea some 10,000 tons of combat rations for our ground forces, including, among other items, 2,000,000 pounds of canned bacon, 3,000,000 pounds of canned beef and gravy, and over 1,000,000 pounds of luncheon meat (or Spam to those who remember). Today, logistics deals with production of weapons and equipment, procurement and storage of matériel, transportation of personnel and supplies, construction of shore facilities to support the military forces, and maintenance of equipment. In short, logistics is the art of supplying the means to win a war.

When Korea was invaded, the Army, Navy, and Air Force had military personnel, tanks, ships, aircraft, and stockpiles of supplies available in the Western Pacific. These were not enough to fight the campaign we faced, but they proved sufficient to delay the onrushing Reds. Additional support for our thin line had to be supplied from the continental United States, 5,000 miles away. For the Korean operation, fighting support of that magnitude had to be carried largely by sea. At the outset a highly praiseworthy airlift speeded personnel and critical items to the battle area, at a rate of over 75 tons a day. Sea transport soon augmented this by over 12,000 tons a day. In the first month, the sea line carried to the Army, Navy, and Air Force over 40,000 personnel; over half a million tons of cargo—from tanks and bulldozers to ammunition for the Navy's devastating shore bombardments, Air Force and Navy bombs and rockets for long-range bombing and machine-gun ammunition; and over 2,000,000 barrels of fuel—aviation gasoline, motor gasoline, Diesel oil, fuel oil, and just plain grease. By way of comparison, the sea line supplied in July the equivalent of a train of 600 coaches, 6,000 boxcars, and 10,000 tank cars, all loaded to capacity. Or, if you want to count fuel alone, sea transport initially carried fuel that would fill the Empire State Building three times. This mammoth logistic task was accomplished by the combined efforts of all hands. During July our supply pipeline to the Far East was large. In August, this pipeline was much greater in size. In September and October it will expand even more. You might ask—what have we got left if another Korea develops, or a widespread war occurs? I can only answer that we are making every effort to meet such a situation. This means that we all, as taxpayers, must contribute to that effort. We all must contribute to our fighting increased military efforts as insurance that we and our children will not be forced to exist their way, but will continue to live our way.

(The voice of President Truman: "We believe the invasion has reached its peak. The task remaining is to crush it. Our men are confident, the United Nations command is confident, that it will be crushed.")

ROBERT MCCORMICK. And a good part of that confidence that we will crush the North Korean invaders is born of havoc wrought upon the enemy by the Navy's air arm. For an informative statement of what we are accomplishing in Korea with our carrier jets and helicopters—as well as some hitherto unrevealed information on Navy air rockets—meet the Deputy Chief of Naval Operations for Air, Vice Adm. John H. (Long John) Cassady.

Vice Admiral CASSADY. The Korean war has demonstrated once again the importance of sea power. Even though North Korea has, relatively, no Navy, it is obvious how impotent we would be in Korea without our Navy. You will remember that one of the greatest sea battles in history—Okinawa—was fought against a Japan which by that time had lost its navy. Every military leader is continually trying to strike a happy medium between new weapons and old weapons. It can be disastrous to cling too long to old weapons and old methods—and it can be equally disastrous to convert too soon to new weapons. We are constantly striving to find that happy medium. It is true that our carrier task forces still cling to those century-proven old weapons—mobility and surprise—and we cling to our old method of close coordination of air-group attacks. However, built around these timeless axioms of warfare, we have modernized and greatly increased our effective striking power since World War II. First of all, we are now using jet aircraft on our carriers in Korea. Their performance has been amazing. The 600-mile-per-hour Grumman is now proving its mettle. This fighter packs a heavy rocket wallop in addition to its four 20-mm. machine guns. It can carry a sizable bomb load. Launched from carriers operating off the coast of Korea the Panthers are able to spend hours over their targets.

Another innovation since the last war has been the helicopter. These peculiar looking air vehicles are now very much in evidence in Korea, both ashore and with our ships. In addition to their combat missions, such as artillery and ship gunfire spotting, many GI's owe their lives to the timely rescues made by these "windmills." Many a downed airman snatched out of the water or from isolated territory behind the enemy lines prefers to call this contraption "angel." Perhaps the most red hot weapon in use today is the entirely new tank-busting gadget called the "ATAR." Here is a weapon which is a perfect illustration of service unification. Early in the current conflict reports reached the Pentagon that our rockets were bouncing off enemy tanks, doing little or no damage. The experts in the Navy's Bureau of Ordnance had been playing around with some ideas and thought they had a ready answer. The Inyokern workers set up a "made by hand" assembly line and in 7 days produced this rocket. Two days later these rockets were in Japan being used by Air Force pilots against North Korean tanks. The second shipment went to marine pilots on a Navy aircraft carrier off Korea. The first eyewitness report from a marine pilot said that shortly after the rocket hit a Red tank there was an intense explosion from within and the tank burned furiously. I cannot tell you how much armor this rocket penetrates, but more than a foot of steel won't stop it. Needless to say, this rocket is no longer hand made, but it is in mass production. These new developments enable us to do a better job. Our closely knit attacks are getting results by hitting hard at the enemy's air power, his supply lines, his troop concentrations. We now have several aircraft carriers off Korea. They are hitting factories today, bridges tomorrow. They are continually expending strong effort in direct support of ground troops. With the Air Force they are assuring that no enemy aircraft reaches a position from which our forces, our supplies, our communications can be attacked. The marine squadrons operating from carriers and land bases are concentrating almost entirely on the close support of troops. Our land-based and sea-based patrol squadrons are again proving their worth. That scoreboard you have just seen is all that is necessary to point out that your Navy is again on the firing line and doing its part in the defense of your country.

ROBERT MCCORMICK. Thus the Nation, America—as top Navy and civilian officials have come before you to report, moves into the sixty-first day of the war—and this, at the close of a week which only 5 years ago saw the victory that we hoped would bring peace to the Pacific. As our newspapers now regularly list our casualties in Korea, it is fitting that we think upon the final words of our President.

(The voice of President Truman: "The task which has fallen upon our beloved country is a great one. In carrying it out we ask God to purge us of all selfishness and meanness, and to give us strength and courage for the days ahead.")

ROBERT MCCORMICK. Until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another teledocumentary, this then, against the background of battlefront Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your fourth Battle Report, Washington.

A Tribute to the National Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on Thursday, August 31, it was my pleasure to attend the practice firing of the One Hundred and Ninth Antiaircraft Artillery Brigade which was in training at Camp Haven, outside Sheboygan, Wis. Seeing those Illinois boys in action, seeing the only antiaircraft artillery unit which protects Chicago, gave me a tremendous feeling of pride in the guard units of the 48 States.

The One Hundred and Ninth did an outstanding job of marksmanship in blasting away at targets towed by planes of the Michigan National Guard and airplanes of our own dear Wisconsin Air Guard. I ask unanimous consent that the text of a statement which I have prepared on this subject be printed at this point in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. WILEY's statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MINUTE MEN OF AMERICA

(By Senator ALEXANDER WILEY)

Mr. President, in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page A6344 may be found the text of an address which I delivered the previous Thursday night in the Armory at Sheboygan, Wis., before some 3,300 Wisconsinites and members of the Illinois National Guard, their friends and families.

The experiences which I had in beholding the teamwork of the One Hundred and Ninth AAA Brigade will long be remembered. As I peered through the binoculars watching the powerful 90 millimeter antiaircraft guns firing away at aerial targets, and as the ground shook with the tremendous concussion of the firing of these weapons, I felt that I was truly watching America's minute men of 1950. They were in the inspiring tradition of the men who went out from their homes to the battlefields of Concord and Lexington in order to protect all that they held dear.

To me it is almost a miracle that citizens working in a wide variety of occupations practically the entire year can don Army uniforms and within a minimum of time, click in brilliant military precision with modern weapons at guard training.

I want to pay well-deserved tribute to the outstanding commander of the One Hundred and Ninth AAA Brigade, my good friend, a great American, Brig. Gen. Julius Klein. In all my years of observing the handling of military units, I have never seen a general look after the needs of his men so closely, so carefully, and so effectively.

When I came on Thursday, the 31st, the troops had been operating for practically seven continuous days in unusual heavy rains, but in spite of the unfavorable weather conditions, in spite of high winds and mud, the boys really did a great job, and the people of Illinois can well be proud of them.

TRIBUTE TO GENERAL MAC ARTHUR

On August 30, General Klein sent a message to his former commanding officer in the Pacific, one of the truly towering figures in all of American history, Gen. Douglas MacArthur. I should like to quote from that message at this point:

"SCAP TOKYO, JAPAN.

"GEN. DOUGLAS MACARTHUR: Five years ago today you redeemed your pledge to the American people by accepting the surrender of the Japanese aggressors and erased the shame of Pearl Harbor, Corregidor, and Bataan. We who were privileged to serve with MacArthur, as were many members of my command, will cherish that high accolade forever. The citizen soldiers of the One Hundred and Ninth Antiaircraft Artillery Brigade salute you today and wish you well. We salute you as our great battle commander, whose military and moral courage mark the most glorious chapter of our history and also as a great statesman. God bless you and permit you to come home soon with victory and honor for a well-deserved rest. A grateful America awaits your coming.

"JULIUS KLEIN,
"Brigadier General."

General MacArthur cabled back: "Thanks and deepest appreciation for your inspiring message."

I know that the response from Tokyo must have been a tremendous thrill to all the officers and members of the One Hundred and Ninth, when one considers the fact that at that very moment United Nations Commander Gen. Douglas MacArthur was engaged in one of the most trying battles of his life in defense of the beachhead around Pusan.

WISCONSIN'S WARM HOSPITALITY

The people of Wisconsin in the surrounding area showed to the visiting Illinois boys the traditional hospitality which has become a hallmark of Wisconsin tradition. The fine newspapers like the Sheboygan Press, the Manitowoc Herald-Times, the Two Rivers Reporter, did an outstanding job of carrying accounts of the Illinois visit, as did of course the great press of Chicago, Ill.

On Thursday evening, the 31st, the troops convoyed into Sheboygan where they were treated to a professional show of wonderfully wholesome entertainment by a cast headed by the famous Willie Shore. This fine comedian highlighted an all-star review which gave to the boys of the One Hundred and Ninth the high type of entertainment which they so well deserved after their gruelling training. This is symbolic of the job done by American show business at the present time and during the First and Second World Wars, in keeping high the morale of our fighting men.

My own address that evening was preceded by comments by General Klein and by those of a great executive of a great State, the Honorable Dwight H. Green, former Governor of Illinois. There were also brief comments by the distinguished chief of staff of the Illinois National Guard troops, Brig. Gen. Kenneth Buchanan, who spoke on behalf of the commanding general, Maj. Gen. Richard Smykal, who had joined with us in observing the training, but who had to return to his State.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS

Among other distinguished guests at that day and other days' sessions were an outstanding jurist, Judge Robert Crowe, formerly of the Illinois Supreme Court (whose own lad, Second Lt. Thomas G. Crowe, is an aide to General Klein); Mr. Benjamin Weintraub, president of the Chicago Motor Coach Co.; and Mr. Allen F. Gellmann, president of the Elgin-American Co., of Elgin, Ill. The last-named leader came to this country as a humble immigrant and his record of achievement in his adopted land—achievement in creating jobs, achievement in giving high-quality goods to the American public, achievement in philanthropic and humanitarian endeavors—is the type of inspiring saga which features American life.

CONCLUSION

I look back to my experience at Camp Haven with deep pride because I recognize that all over America young men and their commanding officers are in training today, ready, prepared, awaiting the call to duty. They are taking time out from their lives in evening training sessions at armories and in summer encampments in order to be prepared for any emergency which may arrive.

I have devoted this much attention in detail to this particular training encampment because I feel that it is emblematic of the very finest in American National Guard life. In paying tribute to General Klein and his boys, I feel that I am also indirectly expressing the gratitude of my heart and the hearts of the American people for every member of the National Guard in Wisconsin and all of the other States. God bless you each and every one, and if you are called into Federal service, may you return safe and sound and with the satisfaction of a job well done.

Tribute to Wilkes County, N. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE R. HOEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, a letter from the president and manager of the Wilkes Chamber of Commerce, North Wilkesboro, N. C., addressed to the editor of the American magazine, New York, with reference to a recent article appearing in the American magazine, entitled "Millions in Moonshine."

This letter is in answer to the many misrepresentations appearing in this magazine article. The author of the article in the magazine ignored the facts and indulged in extravagantly magnifying the production of liquor, evidently for the purpose of making a good story.

This article does a grave injustice to one of the best counties in North Carolina and to one of the finest sections in our whole country. The people of Wilkes County are intelligent, independent, industrious, and self-reliant, and the county has very fine agricultural and industrial resources which have been developed and are now in a flourishing and prosperous condition.

It is unfortunate that writers of articles in magazines would seize upon some incident and magnify it out of all proportion so as to discredit a fine community.

In order to correct these false impressions, I am offering this letter from the officials of the Chamber of Commerce of Wilkes County giving the facts.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILKES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, INC.,
North Wilkesboro, N. C., September 4, 1950.

Mr. SUMNER BLOSSOM,
Editor, the American Magazine,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: In a joint meeting of officers and directors of the Wilkes Chamber of Commerce, along with representatives of the town of North Wilkesboro and the Wilkes County commissioners, we were directed by this group to write you this letter regarding an article appearing in the September 1950 issue of the American magazine, entitled "Millions in Moonshine," by Vance Packard. We note that Mr. Packard is a member of your editorial staff, and presume that he wrote this article under the auspices and direction of the American magazine. Is this true?

It is quite evident from this article that Mr. Packard and the American magazine were not interested in giving a true picture of the type of people and activity of Wilkes County. Instead, it appears that the purpose of this article is to smear Wilkes County, to glorify the work of the ATU agents, and to greatly overplay the liquor business, almost excluding from his article the predominant commercial, industrial, and agricultural activities of the county.

From what source did Mr. Packard get his information, and what concrete evidence does he have to support such condemning, ridiculous, and far-fetched statements as—

1. "The backbone of this woodland county's economy is the manufacture and sale of illicit whisky, which is a multimillion-dollar industry."

2. "You see more bustling prosperity, with fewer visible signs of productive capacity to account for it, than you'll find anywhere else in the United States."

3. That "high-tailed cars" are a trade-mark of Wilkes County.

4. That "there is even an occasional small furniture or coffin factory."

5. That in going over the county you find "an occasional chicken farm, orchard, or sawmill."

6. That it is typical to find the Wilkes County people living in Daniel Boone-type cabins, with luxurious, high-powered cars, with the men counting money running into hundreds of thousands of dollars and planning new distributing outlets for the moonshine, while barefoot women do the plowing.

7. That you can smell fermenting moonshine mash while standing in a churchyard; that by walking from Antioch Church near Wilkesboro in almost any direction you will find a still, or the remains of one, before going a mile.

8. That "much of the backwoods land in Wilkes County is owned by undivided estates or by nice old ladies in Winston-Salem who haven't been in the county for years."

9. That "souping up cars for the moonshine trade is a major industry within itself in the county and keeps many garages busy."

We challenge Mr. Packard, or any other person connected with the American magazine, to come to Wilkes County and show us proof of the statements listed here. Mr. Packard was quite right when he wrote that the chamber of commerce would never admit that the backbone of Wilkes County's economy is the "manufacture and sale of illicit whisky," because, frankly, such a statement is a gross inaccuracy, as the facts in this reply will indicate. Furthermore, since your magazine went to the trouble of sending Mr. Packard to Wilkes County to collect information, apparently almost exclusively from the ATU agents, would your magazine likewise be interested in sending Mr. Packard back to this county so that some of our citizens might show him other phases of our activity, particularly as it applies to the type of people and the agriculture, industry, and commerce carried on by these people. May we now furnish you with a little factual information pertaining to these statements we have enumerated, which either Mr. Packard did not take the trouble to find out about, or did not consider spectacular or dramatic enough to have what he considered the necessary reader appeal?

Pertaining to statements (1), (2), (3), and (4) enumerated in this letter, why did Mr. Packard choose to omit, or to make insignificant, such information about Wilkes County as—

A. The timber and forestry resources and furniture manufacturing: In 1947 approximately 200 sawmills in Wilkes County cut more than 46,000,000 board feet of lumber for commercial purposes and 73,000,000 board feet for all purposes. This county is reported to have led the State that year in the number of sawmills, and is still one of the leading counties in North Carolina from the standpoint of timber resources. In connection with timber, located in the North Wilkesboro area we have 14 manufacturing plants engaged in the manufacture of furniture and building supplies. (This is what Mr. Packard refers to as "an occasional small furniture or coffin factory.") Including the value of Wilkes County's 303,100 acres of woodlands as a timber resource, the return to the timber owners, to the sawmill operators, to the furniture and building material manufacturers and to the hundreds of workers employed in these plants is in actuality a multimillion-dollar business, and, by comparison, makes the liquor business seem infinitesimal.

B. Poultry industry: Wilkes is ranked either the first or second county in North Carolina in the poultry industry, and one of the leading areas of the South. This county produces about 35 to 40 percent of the State's entire poultry supply. This industry, including sale of poultry, eggs, and feed, and the amount of poultry used for home consumption, amounts to about $35,000,000 per year. (This is what Mr. Packard refers to as "an occasional chicken farm.")

C. Fruit growing: The thermal belt which extends through Wilkes County is regarded as one of the finest apple-growing areas in the Nation, and produces some of the finest quality apples from the standpoint of flavor and color that can be found anywhere. Wilkes is the largest producing county of the famous Brushy Mountain area, which in 1948 sold for commercial purposes approximately 850,000 bushels of apples, and which this year is reported to have one of the best and largest crops in its history. (This is what Mr. Packard refers to as "an occasional orchard.")

D. Dairying and livestock: Within the last few years Wilkes County has shown a marked increase in milk production and the raising of livestock. Wilkes is reported to now have more than 7,000 milk cows with an annual production of nearly 30,000,000 pounds of milk. In addition to two other dairy processors (Woodside and Meadow Brook) located in the county, Coble Dairy Products, Inc., one of the largest milk processors in the South, has a modern plant located in Wilkesboro worth approximately $150,000. Mr. Packard completely ignores this phase of our economy, except for the inference that when local farm women call these 7,000 cows, it is usually to warn of the approach of Federal revenuers.

In addition to the timber, poultry, fruit, dairying, and livestock interests of Wilkes County, the records of the Census Bureau, United States Department of Commerce, show that in 1939 there were 30 industries in Wilkes County, and that in 1947 this number had increased to 61—slightly more than 100-percent increase. None of these industries include the liquor industry referred to in the article, but do include in addition to the manufacture of furniture and building supplies, industries engaged in the manufacture of mirrors, dairy products, soft drinks, textiles, foundry products, mills and mill parts, processed poultry, concrete products, pottery, ice, etc. Statistics from the United States Census Bureau reveal that in 1949 the income from payrolls in Wilkes County was $11,300,000; the value of manufactured products was $15,400,000 for the year ending May 31, 1950; in 1949 the retail and service sales amounted to $21,300,000. The average wholesale sales in the county are about $25,000,000 annually. Although we are proud of our existing industries, commercial and agricultural development, we still have room for a great deal more and will gladly welcome and cooperate with any appropriate, desirable industry which might be brought into this area.

If you will inquire of the officials of the Southern Railway System, we believe they will inform you that their branch line to north Wilkesboro is one of the best branches of the Southern Railway System from the standpoint of freight tonnage. Also, this area is served by some 40 to 50 separate lines of motor truck carriers. You will find by thorough investigation that an insignificant amount of this freight carried by the railroad and these commercial truck carriers is sugar and fruit jars used in making liquor.

Regarding statement No. 5 on page 1, referring to high tailed cars as a trade-mark of Wilkes County is about like finding one bad apple in a barrel of good apples, and labeling the whole barrel rotten. The same goes for Mr. Packard's ballyhoo about souping up cars for the moonshine trade being a major industry within itself.

As to statement No. 6, we don't know how long Mr. Packard visited in Wilkes County, but from the mouths of persons who have lived here for many years, we don't find such conditions at all typical, and, in fact, it is rather difficult to find a situation which, by the wildest imagination, even remotely resembles the one described.

Referring to statement No. 8, the Wilkes County tax supervisor completely refutes this statement, and informs us that the great majority of backwoods land in Wilkes is owned by persons with timber and furniture manufacturing interests, or farmers—not by undivided estates or nice, old ladies in Winston-Salem.

If Mr. Packard and the American magazine wished to present a factual, fair, and complete picture of Wilkes County, they could not have ignored the many fine things being done by our schools, churches, civic organizations, agricultural agencies, chamber of commerce, and others to stimulate and improve the general welfare and standard of living of the people of Wilkes County.

In citing this information, it is not our intent or desire to overlook and ignore the fact that Wilkes County has its weaknesses and some things of which we are not very proud. However, we believe you will find some undesirable conditions prevailing in any county or metropolitan area; yet, we don't believe it is fair to any locality to label it by overplaying and dramatizing such conditions to the almost complete exclusion of progressive and desirable aspects of that locality. We believe that you will find that most of the people of Wilkes County appreciate fair, unbiased publicity portraying the true life of its people as a whole. If the American magazine should be interested in writing a story giving all-round coverage to the industry, commerce, agriculture, and people of Wilkes, the chamber of commerce will be most happy to cooperate with you and will enable you to make a thorough study of the county.

Incidentally, and by coincidence, Collier's (September 9 issue) carries an article about the poultry industry of Gainesville, Ga., entitled "Chickens in the Wind." Will you and your editorial staff please read and reread this article so you may contrast between the objectives of the writer of this article and those of Mr. Packard in his article, Millions in Moonshine. Wilkes County could have appropriately been the scene for such a poultry article.

What does the American magazine propose to do about this biased, unfavorable, and derogatory publicity it has given Wilkes County? Are you willing to retract the false and damaging impression given by your article, Millions in Moonshine, by publishing another article on Wilkes County giving proportionate coverage to the other aspects of our economy?

Very truly yours,

PAUL OSBORNE,
President.

Both Stupid and Dishonest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, the situation in China and Korea today is the direct result of the action of Secretary Acheson and his State Department advisors. It is the natural consequence of stubbornly following a mistaken policy in the Far East. Our present debacle in Asia could and should have been anticipated. It was not anticipated because our State Department experts—Acheson, Lattimore, Jessup—deliberately closed their eyes to facts presented to them more than 2 years ago. They refused to listen to the advice given them by such outstanding authorities on Asia as Generals MacArthur, Chennault, and Wedemeyer, men who had had long first-hand experience in connection with the Asiatic situation; Dr. Wellington Koo, Chinese Ambassador to the United States; William C. Bullitt, a former American Ambassador to Russia; and many more that might be named. These men, all with first-hand knowledge of the situation developing in Asia, issued warnings that, if heeded, would have prevented the mess we have in Asia today.

Mr. Speaker, who is responsible for the situation in the State Department? The answer of course is the man who appoints the State Department heads; the man who has the final say-so in all foreign policy matters; the man who has full and complete responsibility for any and all mistakes because he has full authority, and one cannot have full authority and shirk full responsibility.

In the final analysis, therefore, President Harry Truman is responsible for the present debacle in Asia; he is the one who has been making the final decisions to write off Manchuria, China, Korea, Formosa, as not vital or necessary to our defense line in Asia; and then overnight, without a moment's notice, he ordered General MacArthur to send troops to defend South Korea.

This sudden reversal on the part of the President is a confession that he had been wrong in his attitude concerning Asia; that he had been following bad advisers on matters concerning Asia; that he now sees his mistakes and recognizes the fact that they were serious, costly mistakes; and that now he has decided to rectify those mistakes at the cost of thousands of American lives, and billions of tax dollars.

Mr. Speaker, as a logical result of this sudden conversion, of his right-about face in Asia, President Truman should now cut loose from the men who have led him astray and select new advisors on Asiatic problems, men who have had long first-hand experience with the problems of the Far East. The American people expect the President to make a change in the State Department very soon, and they hope and pray that the change, when made, will be a wise one.

Mr. Speaker, the following editorial taken from the Tulsa Tribune of Saturday, August 26, 1950, entitled "Stupid or Dishonest?" is a very clear exposition of how we got into the mess in Asia and it also places the responsibility upon the proper shoulders. Because I am in full accord with every statement in the editorial, I include the same as a part of my remarks today. It follows:

STUPID OR DISHONEST?

(By Richard Lloyd Jones)

A little army of gallant American boys, heavily outnumbered and outgunned, have fought a brilliant action of withdrawal in Korea. True to their American traditions, our soldiers over there have been brave. The reason for our defeats in that foreign and unnecessary war is not the fault of our soldiers. Their military masters have for years made every effort to impress upon our Government in Washington the obvious encroachments made by communistic imperialism in Asia.

Who then is responsible for the series of blunders that have made the Korean campaign disastrous? Disastrous because we now talk of a war over there that will last at least a year. And there are threats of other Asiatic wars being hurled at us like Pearl Harbor surprises.

The American people themselves have blundered into electing a government that is not smart enough to outwit the murder-minded men of Moscow.

Some weeks ago the President of the American people assured us that the prospects for peace were never brighter. What a fool statement.

What kind of a Secretary of Defense have we in Mr. Johnson who so recently boasted that "should Russia attack us at 4 o'clock we would be ready to meet her at 5." Did he lie, or is he that dumb?

What kind of a guardian of our national security is our Secretary of State who overrules our military chiefs of staff and General MacArthur, and who said that Formosa is none of our business? Somehow it becomes some of our serious business when foreign armies explode against us.

What kind of defenders have we who spoke so happily of new and irresistible weapons which were not even in blueprints when they assured us that they had stockpiles of them? Our officials have lied to us.

Are our citizens now alerted enough to be alarmed? Are we ready to be as valiant as citizens as our sons are as soldiers? Our boys are dying because we have listened to political liars.

It is the irrefutable fact that it was our New Deal diplomacy that gave Russia the free hand in Asia and allowed China to be overrun by communism. And even now the New Deal's fair-haired Asiatic expert, Owen Lattimore, insists we should admit the Communists of China into the councils of the United Nations.

The tragic inadequacy of Mr. Truman, the incompetencies of Mr. Acheson, and the dumbness of Mr. Johnson are only some of the outrages we have voted upon ourselves by putting New Dealism into our National Capitol.

Military unpreparedness and the wanton waste of our taxpayers' money to build up armies to oppose us are only part of the products of our own voting.

The bugles blow and the drums rattle. Hopeful youths, who should be engaged in building self-reliant lives, are on foreign soil. They are being compelled to lay down their life ambitions, lay down life itself, because we voters have not been smart.

It has not been our national leaders who have alerted us. It has been the Communists who awaken us with surprise attack. It is the Communists right here at home, protected by our New Deal leaders. They have placed us in jeopardy.

Who would have guessed 20 years ago that in the Congress of the United States there would arise the need for a Committee on Un-American Activities?

This committee started out with little money and less encouragement to look into a few specific cases that seemed unimportant. But this committee in the House of Representatives has survived ridicule and rebuff. Its labors have grown because the work before it became alarming. By 1939 this Committee on Un-American Activities grew to a position of first rank, and today it is the most discussed of all our congressional activities.

What has happened that in the confines of our own geographic limits, among our own voting citizens, there should be such traces of treason and sedition that we have to be concerned more about our enemies here at home than our enemies abroad?

Why did Franklin Delano Roosevelt, when seeking the Presidency for the fourth time, mark that committee's chairman, Mr. Dies, for purge? Why did the politically aggressive Mrs. Roosevelt mark that committee's secretary, Robert Stripling, for a purge of her own? Why did this President's politically active wife try to get her protégé, Joe Lash, into the naval intelligence when the Navy would not have him because of the record that Mr. Dies' committee had found against that chap? Why was a Hiss defended by two Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States? Where is Hiss now? Enjoying liberty on bail. And the legal machinery of our Nation is more concerned with legal colons and commas than in bringing a betrayer of public trust to the punishment a traitor deserves.

That Judith Coplon. Another running around out on bail. And the mischief which such untrue citizens have done is now killing our boys in Korea and it is threatening the very life of our country.

If we, the people, are so stupid that we allow political charlatans to move us into defenseless positions we are certain to lose all the freedoms that once made us the greatest power on earth. Not until we elected these charlatans to public office have we grown so weak that now we talk of enduring wars. And while our boys are being drafted we have politicians asking for our votes in November to send them to Congress to sustain the New Deal and Fair Deal operators of outrage.

We cannot be impressive abroad when we are no longer impressive here at home. We are a benevolent people by tradition. We have taxed ourselves to feed the starving Hindus. Poor creatures. We have taxed ourselves to give money and materials to the French and to the English to see each in turn trade our gifts to our enemies. We are hated abroad when we should be respected and loved for our generosity. But we cannot be respected abroad if we fail to respect ourselves.

We elected a little man to a big job. He has put little men into big jobs. Our boys are dying in battles that never should have been. They are dying in a war that could have been prevented. By draft we are now draining the youth of the land because we, the people, have not been smart enough to elect honest men who are capable of being leaders. Men honest enough to investigate, repudiate and punish the Pendergast type of ballot-box stuffers and election thieves.

It is no longer a party matter. We are not interested in whether a candidate calls himself a Republican or a Democrat. It is time the people demanded that every candidate who seeks a seat in Congress answer: Are you with us or are you against us? Are you an American or are you an irresponsible apologist for these outrages?

Time was, and not so long ago, when we were self-reliant enough to rid ourselves of our enemies here at home. We have been led into a criminal indifference to our enemies here, and everywhere.

We, the people, have been gullible victims of political charlatans. We have lost our self-reliance. Are we smart enough now to vote our freedoms back?

Crusade for Freedom Movement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include the following statement which I made at Holyoke, Mass., on September 6, 1950, and the text of a speech by General Eisenhower, launching the Crusade for Freedom movement:

For several weeks I have been doing everything in my power to obtain the facts about the specious and vicious Communist peace propaganda known as the Stockholm peace petition and have reported those facts in Congress and to my constituents. I have been greatly encouraged by the outstanding action taken by the press and radio of the First District of Massachusetts and of the Nation in advising the public of the full facts. The clear and decisive actions taken by organizations of Americans, including our farm organizations, our labor organizations, our veterans organizations and our civic organization have been most effective.

While I had hoped and have urged that the House Committee on Foreign Affairs take prompt action upon the resolution which I introduced, expressing congressional condemnation of this Stockholm peace petition and alternative constructive action by patriotic Americans who sincerely wish to work for peace in this world, in view of my experience, I am not particularly confident that such action will be taken. I regret that, and shall continue my efforts to provide such a recommendation for the American people.

However, I have read the text of the address by General Eisenhower Monday night in Denver, launching the Crusade for Freedom movement. It contains so much of lasting value not only to all Americans but to all people in the world who are still free that I am making arrangements to have it made available to anyone in the First Congressional District upon request to my office. This Crusade for Freedom is headed by another great American, Gen. Lucius Clay. The plea has been made to each of us in the words of General Eisenhower that "Your dollar or dime will help him (General Clay) provide the means of bringing the truth to a region vital to our welfare." It will make it possible to expand an existing and powerful voice which is now in operation in western Germany, known as Radio Free Europe. General Eisenhower said: "The Crusade For Freedom will provide for the expansion of Radio Free Europe into a network of stations." Then he went on to say—and I am sure this will appeal to everyone in the first district—that "They will be given the simplest, clearest charter in the world: 'Tell the truth.' For it is certain that all the surface-bright but core-rotten promises of communism to the needy, the unhappy, the frustrated, and the down-trodden cannot stand against the proven record of democracy and its day-by-day progress in the betterment of all mankind. The tones of the Freedom Bell, symbol of the crusade, will echo through vast areas now under blackout." I cannot urge too strongly that each of us make this crusade a matter of individual and personal interest. First, we can insure its complete success by making certain that we and all our friends and neighbors sign the freedom scroll. Certainly some of us can volunteer to circulate it throughout our communities. Next, I know that everyone in the first district will welcome the opportunity of giving something toward the program of the Crusade For Freedom. I hope that it can be made a matter of major importance for our veterans organizations, our civic clubs, our farm organizations, our labor organizations, our schools and, in fact, every group in the district. While ample funds are necessary, I am convinced that it is even more important that everyone in the district be given an opportunity to participate and that the pennies of school children are just as important as the dollars of adults.

Finally, this can well be a means of providing a ringing answer to the efforts of those few traitors in our midst who have been sponsoring and circulating the Communist peace petition with the announced purpose of presenting the signatures of millions of Americans to the United Nations on October 24.

TEXT OF GENERAL EISENHOWER'S ADDRESS IN DENVER LAUNCHING THE CRUSADE FOR FREEDOM MOVEMENT

Americans are dying in Korea tonight. They are dying for ideals they have been taught to cherish more than life itself. But it will be written and said tonight in Warsaw, in Prague, in Moscow, that they died for American imperialism.

Unfortunately, millions of people will believe this devilish libel against American soldiers, who have taken up arms in defense of liberty. A second time in a tormented decade. Those millions will hear no other version but a hissing, hating tirade against America. We think it incredible that such poison be swallowed; but those people, behind and beyond the iron curtain, have seen so much political wickedness and cold-blooded betrayal, such godless depravity in government that they find it harder to believe in our peaceful intent and decent motives than in the calculated and clever lies that communism is spreading every hour, every day, through every broadcast and newspaper that it controls.

CAMPAIGN OF HATRED

This slander against our purposes and our men in Korea is merely one example of the campaign of hatred that is being waged against America and freedom around the globe. We face not only ruthless men, but also lies and misconceptions intended to rob us of our resolution and faith within and of our friends throughout the world. Communists teach that America is a vicious enemy of humanity. They have embarked upon an aggressive campaign to destroy free government, as in the young Republic of Korea; because regimentation cannot face the peaceful competition of free enterprise.

The Communists leaders believe that, unless they destroy our system, their own subjects, gradually gaining an understanding of the blessings and opportunities of liberty, will repudiate communism and tear its dictators from their positions of power. They know that free labor and management consistently out-produce communism in the material things that humans need and want, and hold out a superior appeal to man's spiritual aspirations. They know that, for the mass of humanity, America has come to symbolize freedom, opportunity, human happiness. They have a mortal fear that this knowledge will penetrate eventually to their own people and others in the world.

Communistic aggression, inspired by fear, carries with it the venom of those who feel themselves to be inferior. This accounts for the depth of their hatred, and the intensity of their thirst for power.

To destroy human liberty and to control the world, the Communists use every conceivable weapon; subversion, bribery, corruption, military attack. Of all these, none is more insidious than propaganda. Spurred by this threat to our very existence, I speak tonight as another private citizen, not as an officer of the Army, about the Crusade for Freedom. This crusade is a campaign sponsored by private American citizens to fight the big lie with the big truth. It is a program that has been hailed by President Truman, and all others who have heard of it, as an essential step in getting the case for freedom heard by the world's multitudes.

Powerful Communist radio stations incessantly tell the world that we Americans are physically soft and morally corrupt; that we are disunited and confused; that we are selfish and cowardly; that we have nothing to offer the world but imperialism and exploitation.

JAMMING TACTICS

To combat these broadcasts the Government has established a radio program called the Voice of America. But the Communist stations overpower it and outflank it with a daily coverage that neglects no wave length or dialect, no prejudice or local aspiration, weaving a fantastic pattern of lies and twisted fact. They confound the listener into believing that we are warmongers; that America invaded North Korea; that a Russian invented the airplane; that the Soviets, unaided, won World War II; and that the secret police and slave camps of communism offer humanity brighter hope for the future than do self-government and free enterprise.

We need powerful radio stations abroad, operated without Government restrictions, to tell in vivid and convincing form about the decency and essential fairness of democracy. These stations must tell of our aspirations for peace, our hatred of war, and our constant readiness to cooperate with any and all who have these same desires.

Only then can we counteract the Communist deceits that are being spread with every weather, crop, and news report.

One such private station—Radio Free Europe—is now in operation in western Germany It daily brings a message of hope and encouragement to a small part of the masses of Europe.

The Crusade for Freedom will provide for the expansion of Radio Free Europe into a network of stations. They will be given the simplest, clearest charter in the world: "Tell the truth." For it is certain that all the surface-bright, but core-rotten, promises of communism to the needy, the unhappy, the frustrated, the down-trodden, cannot stand against the proven record of democracy and its day-by-day progress in the betterment of all mankind. The tones of the Freedom Bell, symbol of the crusade, will echo through vast areas now under blackout.

In this battle for truth, you and I have a definite part to play during the crusade. Each of us will have the opportunity to sign the freedom scroll. It bears a declaration of our faith in freedom, and of our belief in the dignity of the individual who derives the right of freedom from God. Each of us, by signing the scroll, pledges to resist aggression and tyranny wherever they appear on earth. Its words express what is in all our hearts, your signature on it will be a blow for liberty.

GENERAL CLAY DIRECTOR

My friend, Gen. Lucius Clay, one of our great Americans, is directing the crusade for freedom. Your dollar, or dime, will help him provide the means of bringing the truth to a region vital to our welfare.

Even we, ourselves, sometimes overlook or forget factors of the utmost importance in the global situation, and which have direct bearing on our own security and prosperity.

Most of us have been enjoying a long week end, terminating in this day dedicated to free American labor. How depressing it is to realize that on this Labor Day, 1950, one-third of the human race works in virtual bondage. In the totalitarian countries, the individual has no right that the state is bound to respect. His occupation is selected by his masters, his livelihood is fixed by decree, at the minimum which will give him strength to work another day. His pleasures and his thoughts are restricted to those of glorifying the bonds that hold him in servitude.

MUST MEET THREAT

Because representative labor leaders of America know the record of communism in beating down labor, they have long been in the forefront of those fighting the spread of this vicious doctrine. But communism goes further than the exploitation of labor. Unless the individual accepts governmental mastery of his life and soul, he can be convicted without trial; he can be executed without right of appeal; he can be banished to live out his life in a slave camp.

The people behind the iron curtain have no conception of a free press, or free discussion, or of our right to go to a church of our own choosing, or any church at all. Their schools and periodicals are little more that propaganda mills. The people know nothing except that which their government says they should know, and the effort to learn more is punished promptly and without mercy.

This is what the Soviet planners contemplate for all the world, including America.

We must meet this threat with courage and firmness. Unless we look, with clear and understanding eyes, at the world situation of today, and unless we meet with dynamic purpose the issues confronting us, then we will lose the American birthright. The system of government established by our forefathers will disappear, the sacrifices of American patriots will have been in vain. The world will go back to the days of master and slave, of darkness, ignorance and savagery. The American record, from Washington to the day of disaster, would be only a blank page in history.

We, American citizens can assure that this will never happen to us if the fervor of our devotion to freedom is equal to the seriousness of the threat. Amid these dangers, personal participation by each in public deliberation and activity is necessary to our safety. Each must make it his responsibility to see that we remain strong morally, intellectually, materially. Our material strength must comprise a healthy, devoted and prosperous population, high productivity, financial stability, and such military power as can meet aggression on respectable terms.

Young and old, business, labor, professional men, 150,000,000 of us must rally as one man behind our country and freedom. America is exactly as strong as the initiative courage, understanding and loyalty of the individual citizen.

The die has been cast in Asia, but we are in no limited conflict. Free Europe, struggling for moral and economic recovery, is still a tempting target for predatory military force. We must give real support to all aspects of the military aid program and reexamine, at once, our troop strengths in critical areas.

SPARTAN FRUGALITY

All this means that we must resolutely tighten our belts, both nationally and individually. We must insist upon facing up to the task of paying for the accomplishment of these vital measures, else the Soviets will take heart from their success in bringing us further inflation and closer to economic ruin.

We must have efficiency and economy in all governmental expenditures; and we must concentrate all our resources to assure victory in this bitter and probably prolonged struggle. Until it is won we must practice Spartan frugality in all nonessential matters, so that we may make the greatest possible contribution to the defense of our way of life. All lesser considerations must wait. We cannot tolerate politics as usual any more than we can tolerate business as usual.

Success in such national crises always requires some temporary and partial surrender of individual freedom. But the surrender must be by our specific decision, and it must be only partial and only temporary. It must be insured that, when the crisis has passed, each of us will then possess every right, every privilege, every responsibility and every authority that now resides in an American citizen. It would do no good to defend our liberties against communistic aggression and lose them to our own greed, ignorance, or shiftless reliance on bureuacracy and the Federal treasury.

In the dangers and trials ahead, our ultimate security lies in the dynamic purpose and unshakable unity of the United States and the free world, a unity that depends upon common understanding of and common veneration of freedom. But these can live only where there is access to the truth. Thus truth becomes our most formidable weapon, a weapon that each of us can help forge through the Crusade for Freedom.

And let us never forget that for those who have lost freedom there is no price or cost or sacrifice that can even faintly reflect its value. But it is still the core of America's boundless heritage. It will remain so for as long as we, plain American citizens, are ever ready to guard it with vigilance and defend it with fortitude and faith.

Symbols of Immortality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, James Patrick McGovern, of Washington, D. C., has written a poem entitled "Symbols of Immortality." In times like these, when spiritual leadership is doubted, when materialism obscures our ideals, and when war and a highly mechanic civilization blind us to the kinship of man and nature, it is fitting for us to be thoughtful. I ask unanimous consent that this poem be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

SYMBOLS OF IMMORTALITY

Our immortality shines on the earth,
Mirrored by the poet, prophet, seer,
And all whose genius makes their vision clear
To marvel at our universe and birth.
As long as nature is the home of man,
And skies are more than dust and light alone,
And human minds reach to the farthest zone
Of thoughts and dreams beyond our finite span—
So long no science chains us to the sod,
So long our earth-born beauty transcends clay.
The joy and sorrow, the faith and hope, which sway
Life are so heartfelt and so true that God
Must be both our creator and our guide,
And in His image we are deified.

Fourteen Unanswered Questions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, during a recent visit to my district I was beseiged with questions about the conduct of our Government in Washington.

The American people are deeply worried. They are asking questions, but they are not getting answers. I could not answer many of them because I have raised similar questions myself and have never been able to get the answers from the administration.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting some examples because they disclose how gravely concerned our people are regarding the world situation and the course of events in Washington. The questions follow:

First. What happened to the $95,000,000,000 spent on national defense since World War II?

Second. Why did only $1 out of every seven defense dollars go for combat equipment between 1946 and 1950?

Third. Why did President Truman limit the Air Force to 48 groups when the Republican Eightieth Congress ordered the Air Force expanded to 70 groups?

Fourth. Why, if communism was a menace in Asia, were there only 6 General Pershing tanks, only 30 propellate (tactical) combat planes, only 1 aircraft carrier, and not a single combat marine in the Japanese area when we entered the Korean conflict?

Fifth. Why did President Truman on December 15, 1945, officially announce that unless our ally, China, admitted Communists to its Government China would get no more American aid?

Sixth. Who was best serving America—the administrations which for 50 years defended the open door in China, or the Truman administration, which abandoned China to Soviet exploitation?

Seventh. Why, when Congress had voted $10,500,000 military aid for South Korea 8 months earlier, had South Korea received only $200 worth of Signal Corps wire when the Communists struck, June 25?

Eighth. Whose advice was the administration following when it asked last year for $150,000,000 in economic aid for South Korea—that of its long-time adviser, Owen Lattimore, who said in July 1949 that "The thing to do is let South Korea fall but not to let it look as though we pushed it—hence the recommendation of a parting grant of $150,000,000"?

Ninth. Why did Secretary of State Acheson virtually invite the Communists to take Korea, Formosa, and the balance of China by announcing January 12, 1950, that they were beyond our "defense perimeter"?

Tenth. On what basis did President Truman declare—only 27 days before ordering American troops into Korea—that we were closer to a permanent peace "than anytime in the last 5 years"?

Eleventh. Which was wiser—the administration's appeasement policy that enabled Russia, in the 5 years after World War II, to extend its domination from 170,000,000 people to 800,000,000 people, or Republican insistence on a firm anti-Communist policy?

Twelfth. After the Korean Communists are pushed back to the thirty-eighth parallel, then what?

Thirteenth. What will the administration do in Asia in the future—return to appeasement?

Fourteenth. What hope can there be for peace under this administration?

Complaints Against the Military Sea Transportation Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, supplementing my remarks of September 1 with regard to the manner in which the Military Sea Transportation Service is building up a shipping fleet of its own and manning this fleet with unscreened, inexperienced crews, I want to call the attention of Congress to a letter which I have just received from Mr. Vince Malone, president of the Marine Firemen's Union. Mr. Malone's letter points out the manner in which the offices of the United States Employment Service and the California Unemployment Compensation Insurance Agency are being used to perform the functions of a press gang in obtaining crews for MSTS operated ships. The tactics described by Mr. Malone are certainly a violation of the rights of the seamen so impressed. Such treatment is a poor reward for the wholehearted cooperation given by the maritime unions and their members in this crisis. The preferential treatment of suspected subversives which Mr. Malone mentions is likewise to be condemned. The enactment of the Knowland amendment to the social security bill prevents the Secretary of Labor from dealing with this situation as it should be dealt with. The congressional investigation which I demanded on September 1 is more than ever needed, in view of these facts.

Mr. Malone's reference to the sinking of the Benevolence, in connection with Mr. Harry Lundeberg's statements in his letter printed with my September 1 remarks, also merits serious thought. Mr. Malone's letter follows:

MARINE FIREMEN'S UNION,
San Francisco, Calif., August 30, 1950.

Hon. JOHN F. SHELLEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have a couple of problems that we would like you to work on.

The first is the question of MSTS bearing down on our men who desire to ship on vessels that are covered by union collective-bargaining agreements.

You are well familiar with the reasons why our men do not want to sail on MSTS ships. There is a difference in conditions, notably the $7.50 per month which is paid on every job by steamship companies to our welfare fund.

Furthermore, our men have been through a very rough period during which, if they did not have unemployment insurance to fall back on, many of them would have starved. They feel that when the crisis is over—which possibly might be by next spring—there will be a mass tie-up of ships, and they will be out on the street again. They want the cushion of unemployment insurance to tide them over.

The situation is that the MSTS employment office here calls the United States Employment Service, stating that they have a number of jobs available in certain categories. Sometimes the number of jobs is specified, and, we understand, at one time they did specify 30 jobs in the engine-room department. The USES, which has no qualified seamen waiting around, then notifies the California unemployment compensation office.

The compensation office then gives the men a referral card to go down to MSTS. This referral card is not a job assignment—merely a referral. In many cases our men tell them where to stick the card, and unemployment insurance checks are stopped as of right now.

When our men go down to 33 Berry Street they stand in line for several hours, are questioned somewhat superciliously, and are told that their qualifications, etc., will be checked, and they will be called on in due course. From 2 to 5 weeks later they may receive a note calling them to report for assignment. If they then turn it down the unemployment-compensation people are notified and they are chopped off unemployment insurance.

In other words, if a man wants to chisel he can accept a referral card and keep on drawing his unemployment compensation for several weeks and then get dropped when he turns a job down.

The victims of this species of blackmail are mainly the members of the Sailors Union of the Pacific and Marine Firemen's Union. The MSTS want no part of anybody from the Marine Cooks and Stewards, so the M. C. and S. swampers go on drawing their unemployment compensation because they are poor security risks, while our guys are given the well-known bird.

We think that with the continual uprise of manning requirements on ships under our agreements we shortly will have to make strenuous efforts to go out and recruit back those men who dropped out of the union because of poor shipping conditions and who have written in by the hundreds asking for the opportunity to ship.

What is happening is that while we are squawking like hell for ships, stating we have a fine pool of men to draw on, MSTS is trying to press gang our men. Eventually, when we, in turn, need men the MSTS people will raise their hands in holy horror and say, "What the hell were those so-and-sos crying about; they have no men to ship."

You know that the average American will cooperate in helping to win the war, but if he is blackjacked around, then he is not so keen to throw in his wholehearted support.

We ourselves are wiling to work night and day to rustle up the men to keep our ships moving, but we think it is a bum deal when our men and the sailors are given this rat race while the perks over in the Marine Cooks and Stewards get what is tantamount to preference on unemployment insurance because they are tainted with the label of subversive.

We think you should also stress the necessity for funds to adequately prepare the ships in the reserve fleets. The old adage "penny-wise and pound foolish" was never better exemplified than in the present emergency. Many vessels which have been pulled out from the boneyard have been delayed because of necessary repairs.

The American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. chartered the Belgium Victory in New York, and, coming around, she had condenser trouble and had to put in at Norfolk for repairs.

The Purdue Victory, chartered by the Chamberlin Co., was taken out in the Gulf. Her economizers went haywire and she had to be escorted back by towboats.

The Cuba Victory, of American President Lines, was delayed 3 days in the Canal.

The main trouble on practically all these ships seems to be that some overzealous soul was carried away with the idea of putting consol oil in and on everything. They even filled the boiler feed lines, boilers, etc., with this oil, which meant that it took from 4 to 5 days to steam out the lines and boilers, and even at that there are pockets of oil left which raise hell with the boiler tubes, condensers, etc.

It would appear that when laying these ships up in the future such brain waves should be tossed in the ash can. It should be readily apparent that with the amount of money spent to recondition these ships and the delays, it would have been much wiser to have taken care of this a year or so ago.

Finally, there is the matter of the crash between the Mary Luckenbach and the Benevolence. The Mary Luckenbach is an NMU ship. We have an agreement with the Luckenbach Gulf people, but the NMU have the agreement with the Luckenbach North Atlantic outfit.

Looking at it from a more or less unbiased viewpoint, we wonder what the Mary Luckenbach was doing over in the wrong side of the channel, why each ship was going full speed ahead in the fog, and why no fog horns were blasting by each vessel; and why the Benevolence failed to get her lifeboats off.

We happened to have one of our men who was a member of the crew of the Benevolence. He told us that he was in the engine room at the time of the crash, and when he got up on deck everything was in confusion. Only one lifeboat was lowered, and he lowered it. There was a great deal of confusion and no one around to give orders.

If the ship had been hit several hundred miles offshore, the loss of life would have been terrific. I do not think there is any ship afloat—Navy or merchant ship—that would not have been able to get a flock of lifeboats over and have life rafts, etc., slung in the water to take care of the biggest majority of the people on the ship.

Another puzzle is the delay of an hour and a half in the case of the Mary Luckenbach lowering her lifeboats.

It seems to me that some of the gold braid should be yanked off the officers on both vessels. It would do them good to sail in the bilges for a while.

With best wishes.

Yours truly,

V. J. MALONE, President.

This Is No Time for Politics as Usual

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the sine die adjournment of Congress at this time. I realize to remain in Washington places every Member of Congress at a disadvantage in his campaign for reelection. It gives an opponent a distinct advantage because he has an open field to carry on his campaign. However, no matter what the effect may be it is the duty of Congress to remain at the post of duty ready and willing to do whatever it can to supplement the heroic service being rendered by our boys at the fighting front in Korea. We should not put personal interest above the performance of duty. The boys in Korea cannot adjourn to return home, neither should we do so.

This is no time for politics as usual. The situation is such that all must think and act in terms of the national welfare. We are faced with a situation so serious that it approaches crisis proportions. There is only one course for voters to follow in the coming election. That course requires us to cast aside all thoughts of partisan politics and think seriously of the conditions that now face our Nation. Are we satisfied with those conditions? No. Who could be satisfied when our boys are dying in Korea, outnumbered and ill-equipped, all of which is the result of a bungling, wasteful and extravagant administration. The present administration has spent our tax money to make jobs for faithful party workers instead of weapons and equipment that would give us security against an aggressive communistic movement, and, enable our boys now on the fighting line to have a chance for their lives.

The people are asking why are we short of tanks, aircraft, artillery, weapons and munitions? What has been done with the billions of dollars appropriated by Congress since World War II? Why are a mere handful of courageous boys, inadequately equipped, expected to do the work of what requires an army of well equipped, trained men in numbers sufficient to meet the vast forces that now confront our fighting men? Why didn't the President and his military advisers know the danger that existed and prepare to meet them? It seems unbelievable that our administration leaders did not know of the vast military preparations that were under way in North Korea. The truth is that under the leadership of Hiss, Lattimore, and all the other advisers of that kind, the Administration has not been willing to come to grips with communistic aggression and treat it in a realistic way.

The unparalleled extravagance and profligate waste of the present administration has long been a source of worry to thoughtful citizens. It has now caught up with us. We are in the midst of a great emergency and find ourselves in short supply of everything that we need to maintain our national security and make an aggressive stand against communism.

Furthermore, we find to our sorrow that the coddling attitude of our administration toward communism has encouraged it to raise its ugly head in Korea, and, as a result our boys are dying there in a valiant effort to uphold our principles against great odds. Who is responsible for this sad state of affairs? Think it over. Should any administration guilty of such blundering be kept in control of our Government? The call goes out to the people of this Nation, regardless of political affiliation, to drive Communists, fellow travelers, pinks and Reds out of Government, and, to help in the effort to provide a defense that will give a sense of security to our people.

We must do all within our power to remove from our Government the theory that communism is only a "red herring." We must acknowledge it as the danger it is, and, strike it hard. Realizing that patriotism is not the asset of any one political power the call goes out to all, regardless of party affiliation, Republicans and Democrats alike, to join hands and remove this menace from our midst. Let us show to the world that the spirit of America is not dead but liveth.

Resolutions of the Department of Arkansas, the American Legion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. C. GATHINGS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, the Arkansas State Department of the American Legion recently held its State convention in Little Rock, Ark. Many significant and timely resolutions were adopted during the course of the meeting. Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the full text of these resolutions:

Whereas the Civil Service Commission's regulations covering section 12 of the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944, as amended, provide veterans must be fully qualified to gain precedence over a nonveteran serving under the same type of appointment, the American Legion feels that this fully qualified clause has been overlooked by some Federal agencies and has virtually nullified the spirit and intent of Congress and the American Legion in providing appropriate preference for veterans in cases of reduction-in-force; and

Whereas the Federal Civil Service Commission has recently slightly modified the fully qualified clause dealing with reduction-in-force regulations, it is the opinion of the American Legion that current regulations are not adequate to protect the interest in the reduction-in-force procedure and should be further strengthened to provide that preference employees who meet the minimum qualification requirements of a position held by a non-veteran employee has the legal right to displace a nonveteran employed in the particular assignment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Arkansas Department, the American Legion, in convention assembled at Little Rock, Ark., August 20–22, 1950, That the Civil Service Commission be requested to further modify its reduction-in-force regulations so as to further comply with the spirit and intent of section 12 of the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944, as amended, and that all reduction-in-force appeals filed with the Commission during the period that this fully qualified clause was in the regulations may be either reopened by the veteran or readjudicated by the Commission on the basis of whether the veteran meets the minimum qualifications of the position in question.

Whereas present laws and regulations do not provide for relief or aid to the widow and minor children, or minor children of deceased veterans of World War II, unless such deceased veteran was drawing disability compensation at the time of death; and

Whereas the highly sacrificial nature of the services rendered to this Nation during World War II by veterans thereof requires the Government of this benevolent country to discharge a duty to the widows and minor children of deceased veterans of World War II, and to keep their widows and minor children from hunger and want: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Arkansas Department, the American Legion in convention assembled at Little Rock, August 20–22, 1950, That we memorialize the Congress of these United States to enact laws and provide for regulations by which the widows and minor children of deceased veterans of World War II shall be entitled to assistance from this benevolent Nation in order to keep them from hunger and want in recognition of the high nature of the services rendered as befitting the benevolence of a Nation now enjoying the benefits of the services rendered by those who now sleep in death.

Whereas the regional office of the Veterans' Administration in Little Rock is widely scattered because of inability to obtain enough suitable floor space in any single building, causing added expense in operations and inconvenience to war veterans; and

Whereas consolidation of the Regional Office Medical Division with the VA hospital has been efficient and economical in many cities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Arkansas Department, the American Legion in convention assembled at Little Rock, Ark., August 20–22, 1950, That we do hereby urge the transfer and coordination of the medical division of the Little Rock region office to the new General Medical and Surgical Hospital insofar as it is practical and will work to the best interest of war veterans.

Whereas thousands of veterans who have initiated their training and have been forced to discontinue their training, through no fault of their own, and others who have entered or completed a basic training program, such as prelaw and premedical courses and basic academic courses preparatory to vocational courses, will not as a result of overcrowding of schools be enrolled in the advanced phase of their training as of July 25, 1951; and

Whereas Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, provides that an eligible veteran must have initiated his course of training by July 25, 1951, or four years after the date of his discharge, and contains no requirement, either written or implied, that a veteran must be physically in training on July 25, 1951, or 4 years after the date of his discharge, and remain in continuous training thereafter; and

Whereas the Veterans' Administration has published a regulation which states that an eligible veteran must have commenced and actually be pursuing his course of education or training on July 25, 1951, or the date 4 years after his discharge, whichever is later; and

Whereas the Veterans' Administration regulation is directly contradictory to the language and intent of Public Law 346, Seventy-eighth Congress and will prevent thousands of worthy veterans who have initiated their training or completed the preparatory phase of their training from completing training necessary for the attainment of their occupational objective: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Arkansas Department, the American Legion in convention assembled at Little Rock, August 20–22, 1950, respectfully recommends that the Congress of the United States amend the statutes to clearly express its intent regarding the veteran's right to training after July 25, 1951, to provide that an eligible veteran who has initiated his course of training by July 25, 1951, or 4 years after the date of his discharge, whichever is later, may continue his training continuously or intermittently, full time or part time, until completion of his education or training and attainment of his occupational objective or the exhaustion of his entitlement or until July 25, 1956, whichever is earliest, provided that the veteran's training shall continue to be satisfactory.

Whereas it has been called to our attention that the War Department is closing, or planning to close 18 of our veterans hospitals, and curtail the facilities of many others; and

Whereas, the present facilities cannot adequately care for the veterans who now need hospitalization, as many are on the waiting list who need attention: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Legion in national convention assembled at Los Angeles, Calif., October 9 to 12, 1950, go on record as being opposed to the closing of any veterans hospitals, or the curtailment of any existing facilities until the veterans who are now in need can be adequately care for.

Whereas the laws governing military secrets and the protection of the Constitution of the United States of America have become obsolete under the progress of the Nation, and under existing law the Constitution and the construction of the Constitution is permitting its own destruction. Foreign enemies and American citizens under the influence of foreign agents are trying to destroy America and the American way of life and are claiming protection under the Constitution and laws pertaining thereto, while they are destroying the very instrument under which they cry for protection: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by Arkansas Department of the American Legion in convention assembled at Little Rock, August 20–22, That the national legislative committee of the American Legion be requested to prepare and submit to the Congress of the United States of America bills which would provide in effect that—

1. Any person or persons who shall knowingly and willfully transmit either verbally or in writing, either directly or indirectly any military information to a foreign country, or its representative or agent, shall be guilty of treason and when so found, shall be sentenced to death.

2. Any person or persons who shall aid or abet agents or representatives of any foreign country, either directly or indirectly, against the peace and dignity of the United States of America, if found guilty shall be sentenced to 5 years at hard labor, and fined not less than $5,000.

3. Any person or persons who shall publish or cause to be published any information pertaining to secret military projects, except upon the written authority of the National Security Council, shall be sentenced to not less than 5 years and not more than 10 years, and fined not less than $2,500.

4. Congress enact legislation making all evidence obtained by the FBI through wire tapping or any evidence obtained by dictaphone, admissible as evidence only in cases applying to the above acts and such other acts as the Congress may deem expedient.

Whereas this Nation is again engaged in warfare; and

Whereas the members of our Armed Forces are again subject to the perils and danger of war; and

Whereas it has been the policy of the American Legion to assist all disabled comrades, their widows and dependents; and

Whereas it is only right and proper that since this country is again engaged in warfare and the members of our Armed Forces subject to all the perils and incidents that go with such combat and warfare, that all of our comrades who have been members of the Armed Forces of the United States since the beginning of hostilities with Korea should be accorded all the privileges and benefits of the GI bill of rights: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled at Los Angeles, Calif., October 9–12, 1950, That the so-called GI bill be amended by an act of Congress to include within the terms of said bill all members of the Armed Forces of the United States who served between the beginning of hostilities with Korea and the cessation of such hostilities.

Whereas unemployment is always a threat to veterans; and

Whereas it is growing increasingly evident that the international situation will bring about increased civilian employment in which Government funds will be expended; and

Whereas the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944, as amended, does not include the coverage of veterans preference with prime contractors who operate with Federal funds: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the State Department, the American Legion assembled in convention at Little Rock, Ark., August 20–22, 1950, That the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944, as amended, be further amended to the effect to include prime contractors who operate in whole or in part with Federal funds must give preference to all qualified veterans, and that the Congress be requested to give authority to an appropriate Federal agency for the agency for the administration of this preference requirement.

Whereas the Hoover Commission on Government Reorganization recommends that veterans' preference in Federal employment be sharply curtailed by dividing applicants for employment in four categories and merely give veterans' preference within the respective categories to which they are assigned; and

Whereas the Hoover Commission further recommends that veterans' preference in cases of reduction in force be further curtailed; and

Whereas the adoption of such a plan would result in the discharge of thousands of veterans, and would also lessen opportunity in the future for the appointment of veterans in Federal service; and

Whereas the present principles of veterans' preference has been in existence for over 70 years and not only have veterans benefited from such preference but also the whole concept of public service: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Sate Department of the American Legion assembled in convention at Little Rock, Ark., August 20–22, 1950, wish to strongly oppose all recommendations of the Hoover Commission which would either directly or indirectly weaken veterans' preference in Federal employment.

Whereas the present needs for maximum production require the utilization of all our human resources and affords an opportunity for the placement of physically handicapped veterans in Government employment; and

Whereas physically handicapped veterans should have an opportunity to utilize their abilities and at any time earn a livelihood; and

Whereas the provisions of the Veterans Preference Act of 1944, as amended, are circumvented in numerous instances, particularly in service-connected disability preference: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the State Department of the American Legion in convention at Little Rock, Ark., August 20–22, 1950, That we reaffirm our stand on preference in selection of preference eligibles to fill existing openings in all Government jobs; and be it further

Resolved, That adequate congressional action be sought to safeguard the disability preference by requiring that the Civil Service Commission give service-connected disability candidates for civil-service appointment a full explanation in the case of rejection for appointment, and that the Civil Service Commission be granted legal authority to require the protesting Federal agency to employ the veterans passed over, providing a Civil Service Commission deems the specific reason for such passing over inadequate.

Whereas most younger veterans have not yet been able to accumulate sufficient experience and seniority to protect them in lay-offs; and

Whereas age restrictions imposed by many employers present serious obstacles to older veterans now needing employment; and

Whereas for these reasons veterans are suffering severe and stringent economic handicaps more widespread than those incurred by others; and

Whereas veterans and their organizations must now place an even greater reliance and dependence on the Veterans Employment Service: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Arkansas Department, the American Legion in convention assembled at Little Rock, August 20–22, 1950, That we urge there be adequate funds provided for the Veterans Employment Service to enable them to provide for unemployed veterans the maximum of job opportunity.

Whereas during World War II many thousands of physically fit men of military age were deferred for occupational reasons while others with families were being inducted into the service; and

Whereas subsequent to World War II several millions of men who were not in the service of their country during World War II have now become of military age; and

Whereas during the World War II numerous men were sent to college at Government expense and did not see active duty because of such training; and

Whereas there are many thousands of veterans of World War II who are disabled and otherwise unfit for military duty; and

Whereas there are others who are physically fit but who now have families: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Arkansas Department, the American Legion in convention assembled at Little Rock, August 20–22, 1950, That veterans of World War II are ready and willing to serve their country wherever, whenever, and in whatever capacity they may be needed.

That because of large numbers of men who did not see active duty in the uniform of their country during the past war for reasons set forth above, the said men should be given the first opportunity to serve their country during this emergency.

That proper authorities of the Government should notify all war industries and employers of men in essential occupations that it should be their policy to employ in such categories, first, disabled veterans of World War II, and secondly, other veterans of World War II with families with the view of making available for military service men of military age who have not previously served their country in uniform.

That there should be set up within the Selective Service System and the Department of Defense a system whereby all men who were not in active service during World War II should be called to such service prior to considering the recall or redrafting of any veterans of World War II including those in the inactive reserve.

Whereas there are several million children in the United States who are receiving a substandard educational opportunity; and

Whereas the resulting waste of our human resources at this critical period in our Nation's history is a serious handicap to the preservation of the American way and constitutes a threat to our existence as a free people; and

Whereas since in some States and in many communities it will not be possible to finance an adequate program of education without the participation of Federal Government in the support of schools: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion, Department of Arkansas in convention assembled at Little Rock, August 20–22, 1950, That we urge the Congress of the United States to enact at the earliest possible date legislation which will provide Federal aid to education without Federal control and with full preservation of the accepted American principle of the local management of schools.

Whereas Arkansas and Tennessee are the sole joint-owners of the new highway bridge across the Mississippi River at West Memphis; and

Whereas the Legislatures of Arkansas and Tennessee, by joint resolutions of their respective upper and lower houses, have endorsed the name "Memorial Bridge" for the new structure, such joint resolutions having been approved by the Governors of the two States; and

Whereas the American Legion, Department of Arkansas, fifteenth district conventions of said department; the Spanish-American War Veterans of Arkansas and Tennessee; Memphis Chapter, No. 1, American War Mothers; Gold Star Mothers of World Ward II of Memphis, and other patriotic associations and veterans' organizations have approved "Memorial Bridge" as an appropriate name for the new structure in honor of the memory of veterans of all wars from Arkansas and Tennessee: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Arkansas Department, the American Legion in convention assembled at Little Rock, August 20–22, Reaffirm its desire that the new bridge across the Mississippi River at West Memphis be named "Memorial Bridge"; and be it further

Resolved, That this convention petition the Governors of Arkansas and Tennessee to issue proclamations simultaneously, officially naming the structure "Memorial Bridge" as the legislatures of the two States by joint resolutions, approved by the Governors, have declared it should be named.

Because of inadequate funds for production loans, approximately 1,100 World War II Veterans in Arkansas failed to get loans for the 1950 crop year through the Farmers Home Administration; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States passed Public Law 499 on May 3, 1950, which authorized the liquidation of the Arkansas Rural Rehabilitation Corporation and which permits the use of the assets of the Corporation by the Farmers Home Administration for making loans to farm veterans; and

Whereas there appears to be undue delay on the part of officials of the FHA in the liquidation of the Corporation and in making of those funds available for loans to both veterans and nonveterans; and

Whereas appropriated funds for loans to both veterans and nonveterans are inadequate again this year: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, Department of Arkansas, go on record requesting immediate action on the liquidation of the Corporation in order that the funds may be made available for loans to veterans this fiscal year; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Mr. J. V. Highfill, State director of the Farmers Home Administration in Arkansas, with a request by the department commander that the funds of the Corporation be made available as expeditiously as possible.

H. R. 9623

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am today in conjunction with my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Illinois, the Honorable PAUL DOUGLAS, who will introduce a similar bill in the Senate, introducing H. R. 9623, a bill to create, and assign duties to, the Office of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the Marine Corps, to fix the personnel strength of the United States Marine Corps, and to make the Commandant of the Marine Corps a permanent member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Under unanimous consent, I am inserting at this point in my remarks a copy of H. R. 9623, which reads as follows:

A bill to create, and assign duties to, the office of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the Marine Corps, to fix the personnel strength of the United States Marine Corps, and to make the Commandant of the Marine Corps a permanent member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the Department of the Navy an Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the Marine Corps who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive the same compensation as the other Assistant Secretaries of the Navy.

The Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the Marine Corps shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, be charged with the supervision of the United States Marine Corps and the coordination of its activities with other governmental agencies, and, in addition, such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 2. The first sentence of section 206 (c) of the National Security Act of 1947 is hereby amended to read as follows: "The United States Marine Corps, within the Department of the Navy, shall include four full-strength combat divisions, four full-strength air wings, and such other land combat, aviation, and other services as may be organic therein, and the personnel strength of the Regular Marine Corps shall be maintained at not less than 300,000."

SEC. 3. The Commandant of the Marine Corps shall be a permanent member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

On June 30, 1949, I introduced a bill to create the office of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the Marine Corps and to fix the personnel strength of the corps at not less than 6 percent of the combined personnel strength of the Army, Navy, and Air Force. In this effort, I was joined by 55 other Congressmen and 4 Senators.

No action has been taken on this bill but, in the meantime, the House Armed Services Committee in its report on the B-36 investigation, recommended unanimously that the Commandant of the Marine Corps be made a permanent member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff so that the type of warfare the Marines were so skilled in—amphibious landings and close infantry-air support—could be given due consideration by all the Armed Forces.

On August 7, 1950, I urged, on the floor of the House, that the Marine Corps have a permanent strength of 300,000 men, which would include 4 combat divisions and 4 air wings and that the Commandant be given a place on the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Chairman CARL VINSON, of the Armed Services Committee, on August 28, 1950, stated that he had set a new higher goal for Marine Corps combat strength—four fully equipped war-size divisions and 26 air squadrons.

Mr. Speaker, I am in full accord with the Committee on Armed Services in its unanimous recommendation that the Commandant of the Marine Corps be made a permanent member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I am also in full accord with the statement made by the distinguished chairman of that committee that the Marine Corps should have four fully equipped war-size divisions. I do believe, however, that we should go further and enact permanent legislation to this effect and, at the same time, increase Marine air strength to four full-strength air wings. To do this, in my opinion, it is necessary that the personnel strength of the Corps shall be maintained at not less than 300,000.

It is not necessary for me to go into detail concerning the difficulties in which the Marine Corps has found itself since the physical ending of World War II. I do not agree with General Eisenhower's contention, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 12, 1949, in which he states:

I therefore recommend that Marine units not exceed a regiment in size.

Neither do I agree with General Spaatz, former commanding general, Army Air Forces, when he wrote:

I recommend, therefore, that the size of the Marine Corps be limited to small, readily available and lightly armed units, no larger than a regiment, to protect United States interests ashore in foreign countries and to provide interior guard of naval ships and naval shore establishments.

General Spaatz changed his mind though, because on July 17, 1950, he wrote in Newsweek as follows:

Two or three Marine divisions, stationed at strategic locations, ready for quick movement to any part of the world, also are essential.

According to the Washington Star of August 13, 1950, the Marines were sent to Korea at the express desire of General MacArthur. It may be well to recall that according to the July 8 issue of Armed Forces, MacArthur, while Chief of Staff or the Army in the early 1930's, was a leading advocate of the consolidation of the Army and Marine Corps.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting at this point in my remarks articles from the Washington Post under date of August 28, 1950, and the Army-Navy-Air Force Register under date of August 12, 1950.

VINSON SETS NEW MARINE GOAL: 4 DIVISIONS, 26 AIR SQUADRONS

Chairman VINSON (Democrat, Georgia), of the House Armed Services Committee, yesterday set a new higher goal for Marine Corps combat strength—4 fully equipped war-size divisions and 26 air squadrons.

We aim to get the money for that force, VINSON said.

The new target is up by two combat divisions and eight air squadrons from an estimate advanced by VINSON only August 6.

He predicted then that Congress will be asked in January for more money for defense, including $500,000,000 for the Marines.

That sum was expected to permit the corps to increase its strength to 174,000 men and to have 2 fully equipped divisions and 18 air squadrons.

It now has two divisions, organizationally. However, both were considerably under battle strength when the Korean war started. The size of Marine divisions fluctuates between a peacetime strength sometimes as low as 8,000 to 10,000 men and the huge units of World War II days when more than 20,000 men were in combat divisions.

The manpower strength of the Marine Corps then was about 65,000 men and 7,000 officers, with about 16 air squadrons.

When Defense officials went to Capitol Hill last month to support their request for an emergency military appropriation, the Marine Corps' portion of the proposed new funds was $128,395,000. This was in addition to the $200,923,000 asked for in the regular 1951 fiscal year budget, or a new total of $329,318,000.

The testimony given at that time indicated a manpower increase of almost 80,000 above the present level, or a new total of about 142,000.

Just what the proposal for two more divisions may do to the 174,000-man enrollment goal mentioned by VINSON August 6 was not made clear. The amount it would cost was not stated.

Along with his report of new plans for the Marine Corps, VINSON disclosed he intends to see President Truman to urge this country to step up its tank production by hundreds of millions of dollars.

He said he has written Mr. Truman, Secretary of Defense Johnson, and top military leaders that the Armed Services Committee is much concerned over the present tank-procurement program.

FOUR MARINE DIVISIONS

The calling to active duty this week of Marine Corps volunteer reservists, most of them battle-trained in World War II, to augment the Marine fighting strength should be a lesson to the American people that never again must this famous fighting organization be permitted to be reduced to less than four full divisions plus four Marine air wings.

The Marine Corps mobilization announcement this week marked the eighth anniversary of the corps' first assault landing against the Japanese at Guadalcanal and the first major offensive by American ground troops in World War II. From that time on the Marines and Army troops made their assault landings at Tarawa, Okinawa, and Iwo Jima, all island stepping stones toward the ultimate goal in the Pacific war—Japan.

All elements of the Armed Forces have acquitted themselves with great distinction in the fighting in Korea. It must be noted, however, with a special interest, the role the United States Marine Corps is playing.

The Marines committed to Korea cannot compare numerically with the Army and Air Force units in that theater. However, the Marine team "hit the beach" fully combat-loaded under officers 85 percent of whom had World War II experience. Reports from the Korea fighting indicate that the Marines, within their limitation in force, justified the faith of the American people in this traditional fighting organization of our Armed Forces.

More than 2 years ago the Marines were fighting desperately to defeat a plan that would have limited largest elements in the Marine Corps to a battalion. At that time the Marine Corps pointed out that no comprehensive training or cohesive operation could be carried out under a structure of less than divisional organization. After a strenuous fight they were permitted to retain two divisions and two air wings in a reduced-personnel status.

The Marine theory in this discussion is more than justified.

The Register believes that Marine strength should be brought to, and maintained at, four Marine divisions and four Marine air wings.

Strategic and tactical evaluations indicate that the type of "incident" in Korea may break out at any time in any part of the world. The need for fast, mobile, self-contained units is evident. The cost of maintaining these divisions and air wings would be negligible compared to the risk undertaken in lives and money in not having them available.

The other day in the House of Representatives Representative MIKE MANSFIELD, Democrat, Montana, told his colleagues that the Marine Corps should be raised to a strength of 300,000 men. He also said that the Commandant of the Marine Corps should be made a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff instead of depending upon Navy representation. Marines are now fighting in Korea, and with the certainty that thousands of other marines will be sent to Korea within the next several months, it seems logical and proper that the Commandant of the Marine Corps should become a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. If Marine Corps personnel is to be employed in operations, it is only proper that the Commandant of the corps should have a part in planning their employment in the national-defense scheme.

A former marine, Representative MANSFIELD declared that "the attempts which have been made to whittle the corps down to a guard unit must be stopped once and for all."

There are a great number of Americans who agree with the former marine from Montana.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that the Armed Services Committee will give full consideration to the bill introduced by Senator PAUL DOUGLAS and myself because we feel that the issue is important and that the Marine Corps be given the recognition and the security it has so justly earned throughout the history of our country.

The American Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, July 10, I delivered some remarks before the House in which I pointed out the great weaknesses and the urgent needs of the American merchant marine and the maritime industry as a whole. Weaknesses in the face of danger—and needs if the industry is to be put in a condition where we may hope that it can effectively serve the Nation in a war emergency.

Since July 10 the situation in Korea has become more critical and the lack of men, material, and supplies, and the means to get them there, more evident. We have begun to take steps—not only in the Armed Forces but also in the merchant marine—to overcome the shortages which hamper effective and victorious action in Korea. The steps so far taken, as far as the maritime industry is concerned, have been only those needed to meet the immediate emergency. It is my purpose here today to impress upon my fellow Members of Congress the vital importance of not stopping with those emergency moves. The very fact that we were unprepared, shipping-wise, to handle the relatively small strain which Korea has so far put upon us, is the strongest evidence needed to prove to ourselves that we could not possibly fulfill the demands created by a full-scale war situation until tragically too late. It is already tragically too late in Korea. We must do what we can now to prevent tragedy on a larger scale. The human harvest which war reaps is too great at best. For us to fail to use the means within our power to minimize that harvest would be criminal.

We cannot now know what lies ahead of us. However, the rumblings of war are too plainly heard to be ignored. How far ahead it may be, or whether it will pass by, we do not know. But, where a look into the future is denied us, a look at the past may often serve. History has lessons for those who read and remember.

For that reason I shall recall the history of our maritime industry through the periods of World War I and World War II and the interwar period. I shall draw some parallels between the experiences of the two wars, and by citing that history I hope to impress upon the Congress the urgent need for taking action now to prevent a third parallel being drawn by some Member of Congress at a future time.

I have here four tables showing, in cold figures, the rise and fall of American merchant-ship construction during the years 1914 to 1950, the rise and fall of tonnage in the American-flag merchant fleet during approximately that same period, the variations in employment in the private shipyards of the United States from 1917 to 1950, and the record of percentages of all of our foreign trade carried in American bottoms from 1910 through early 1950. If charted, those figures would produce a familiar sawtooth pattern. On graphs of commercial activity that sawtooth indicates the comings and goings of depressions and of wars. In the maritime industry it has meant as well, and can mean again, that we ourselves have fashioned a saw which has cut through the life lines of our Armed Forces when engaged in war. I shall refer to these tables from time to time and for that reason ask that they be included in the RECORD at this point.

At the beginning of World War I in 1914 our tonnage registered in foreign trade amounted to a little over a million tons. We carried less than 10 percent of our trade in American vessels. With the disappearance of the German merchant fleet from the seas our tonnage rose through various means, of which new construction was a relatively minor factor, until in 1917 it stood at approximately 2,500,000 tons, and we were carrying 18½ percent of our own trade. All through this period the possibility of our eventual direct involvement in war was plain—yet in 1917 employment in our shipyards stood at only 45,000 men. In 1916, when the lessons of submarine warfare were too plain to be ignored, the United States War Shipping Board was created to advise on methods to increase the merchant marine. Still, from 1916 to 1917 we added only 255,000 tons to our fleet. When the war finally broke upon us in April of 1917 the Emergency Fleet Corporation was hastily organized. Congress appropriated $4,000,000,000, and the Corporation bent all its efforts to turning out steel, wooden, and cement ships. By November of 1918, the end of the war, our shipyards employed 380,000 workmen—but our fleet tonnage had risen to only 3,600,000 tons and we carried only 22 percent of our cargoes. Now, it is true that as a result of our shipbuilding program we did construct a great merchant fleet—but, it did not reach peak tonnage until 1921, 2 or 3 years after the war was over and the immediate need was no longer there. Ten or eleven million tons of shipping which we had in foreign trade in 1920 and 1921 carried from 35 to 43 percent of our trade—but it contributed little to the war effort which was responsible for its existence. Despite sacrifices in quality and speed of ships, made in the interests of getting any kind of ships into the war, we had been able to do little toward hastening the end of the war. Men had died because shipping was not available to supply and reinforce them. To quote Admiral Emory S. Land, speaking in September of 1941, there were delays, confusion, and extravagance attending the shipbuilding expansion of 1917–18. The delays, confusion, and extravagance were made necessary because in 1916 our shipyards were idle, there was no backlog of skilled personnel to man them, there were no plans and no know-how for quick expansion, and there was no nucleus around which we could quickly expand—in short, there was no organized preparation for meeting the demand which arose.

In 1921 we had a merchant fleet of 11,000,000 tons. What happened to it? Remember that during the interwar period, while there was an illusion of peace for a time, there was no peace. The Russian giant was stirring, the Balkans were in constant turmoil, Japan's rising sun threatened China and the entire East, and fascism and nazism gathered their armies and began to march. Despite the Merchant Marine Act of 1920, and the amended version of 1928, our merchant marine went into a decline similar to that which existed prior to War I. In 1927 of $600,000,000 paid out by our shippers, $480,000,000 went to foreign ships according to the Shipping Board. At the same time they reported that for every first-class merchant ship built in the United States since 1921, Great Britain had built 41, Germany 12, Italy 5, and France and Japan 4 each.

By 1936, although our fleet was still second in size only to Great Britain's, it was ranked fourth in speed and last in age of vessels. The fleet was obsolete or obsolescent and we were building few replacements. Our shipyards employed only 36,265 men in both construction and repair in December of 1936. Our tonnage had declined to approximately 4,000,000 tons. We launched only 69 vessels of 111,000 gross tons during that year. We were again in a position where we could not have supplied an army beyond our shores—and the world was reading Mein Kampf, the Japanese had been in China since 1932, and Mussolini was preparing his excursion into Ethiopia.

Fortunately, there were those who remembered World War I and who were able to persuade the Congress to take some measures to prevent a repetition of that experience. The Merchant Marine Act of 1936 was passed, with the urging of President Roosevelt, and in 1937 the Maritime Commission instituted the long-range program, providing for construction of 50 ships a year. However, by December of 1938 our shipyards employed only 53,519 workers. In the summer of 1939, when there was considerable guessing as to whether or not there was going to be a war, the Commission decided that since it takes a year to build a ship they would accelerate the long-range program. With Presidential approval they launched their acceleration program providing for 100 ships a year. This was in 1939—we were still 2 years away from direct participation in war. In April of this year we had a total of 28 ships in hand or on order in United States private shipyards. Can any of us say now that we are 2 years, or 2 months, away from all-out war?

In January of 1941 we embarked on the emergency construction program providing for 200 additional 10,000-ton cargo ships of a standardized design adopted to avoid the bottlenecks that were developing in engines and electrical machinery. Note the bottlenecks. Again we were forced to sacrifice quality of construction and speed of ships because of lack of preparedness in the industry and its suppliers.

In April of 1941 lease-lend funds were made available to the Maritime Commission. Contracts for 227 additional vessels were let with deliveries to begin approximately a year later. By that time, 1942, we were plunged into war and shipping shortages were acute. But at least we had ships on the ways and on the way. Ship construction was further expanded in August of 1941 through congressional action. All of these programs contemplated adding 1,153 ships of approximately 12,400,000 deadweight tons to the merchant fleet between July 1, 1941 and the end of 1943—a period of 2½ years.

We all remember Pearl Harbor and the events following. The War Shipping Administration assumed the functions of the Maritime Commission in the spring of 1942 and these preparedness programs were reshaped in the light of actual war. In my remarks of July 10 I indicated the extent of the wartime shipbuilding program. We could have used more ships, far faster than we got them. We could have shortened the war had we been better prepared.

My quotations and references to the World War II preparedness program in the preceding statements were taken from a source which I selected for a specific purpose. The source is a progress report issued by Admiral Emory S. Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, on September 3, 1941—3 months before Pearl Harbor. The purpose, to show that at that time we did have a program under way to build up our maritime industry, inadequate though it may have been—to ask, "what progress report can we look to now to determine where we stand?"

In September of 1941 we had 4 years of slow expansion behind us, with plans for acceleration. In September of 1950 we have 4 years of a declining and decaying maritime industry to look back on, with only a record of congressional hearings, administrative reports of practical inactivity of a constructive nature, and complaints from the industry and its workmen of slow death—and we may be, not 3 months, but 3 days from another Pearl Harbor.

That is what I wish to pound home today—and what I shall pound home again and again until something is done. On July 10 I outlined the program which I believe we should immediately embark on. In World War I we had no program calculated to prepare us for the demands of war. In World War II our program was inadequate, and the industry did yeoman work in trying to overcome that inadequacy, despite long years of starvation. For world war III, which may be impending, we again have no program in actual operation—and the time factor is now against us. We may well be the objects of direct attack; we will not then have further years of warning, nor strong allies to soften the first blows and hold off the aggressor. Unless we are prepared to carry the war to foreign shores in vessels of our own making, it will be fought here. We must prepare now, if it is not already too late.

At the present time we are following a familiar course. We are taking only emergency action sufficient unto the day. We must now chart a course sufficient unto tomorrow and what it may bring. What I have been saying here may smack of hindsight. But there were men in the days of World Wars I and II who had the foresight to predict the consequences. They were not listened to, or, at best, token gestures were made to placate them and to provide against the happenings which they predicted. Let us use hindsight now to give us the foresight to take every preparatory measure within our power to guard against repeating the mistakes—the delays, confusion, and extravagance—of those wars. Token gestures will not suffice. The need will be greater; the time will be shorter; the responsibility is ours.

My remarks thus far have been directed at only one phase of the entire problem facing the Nation and its maritime industry. The foreign trade comes most immediately to mind when war threatens. However, our domestic inland, coastal, and intercoastal trade have long been, and are now, a vital part of peacetime and wartime transport. This essential cog in the maritime machinery is beset with problems as well. At present, there is for all practical purposes no Government encouragement of domestic maritime transport. Subsidies, such as they are, are confined to shipping in essential foreign trade routes. The intercoastal trade has been stifled by the burden of excessive tolls through the Panama Canal. An already burdened industry is forced to carry all the costs of this link in our national defense. H. R. 8677, now pending in the other body, should be acted on at once to lessen that burden. The reorganization which it provides should do much to revitalize the intercoastal trade. Serious consideration should be given to the problem of fostering the rehabilitation and continued development of extensive coastal and inland water transport operations, either through subsidies or other means designed to insure against further deterioration.

Not only have American shipping operations on scheduled trade routes and in our own intercoastal and domestic waters suffered serious blows since the end of the war, but our tramp shipping fleet, formerly of major importance, has been practically driven from the seas. A flourishing tramp fleet, operating on flexible schedules between and among domestic and foreign ports, could add much to the solidification of our shipping program. Legislative efforts to provide subsidies for qualified operators in this field have met with failure. While hearings have been held, no action has been taken. Such legislation should be enacted without delay to permit our own lines to compete on a profitable basis with those foreign fleets now monopolizing the tramp trade.

On September 1 I addressed the House and called attention to the manner in which the Navy's Military Sea Transportation Service was entering into competition with our private merchant marine. My previous remarks on the condition of our maritime industry have pointed out that it is in sadly weakened state, with shipyards idle and shipping companies being virtually forced out of business. The need for a strong merchant marine has never been questioned, except by a few misguided individuals in and out of government who counsel dependence on the fleets of our friends among foreign nations. And yet, in the face of this need, we find an arm of the Government, the MSTS, following a course of action which can have no other effect than to contribute to the tearing down, rather than the building up, of our merchant marine. The investigation into that situation which I called for on September 1 should be undertaken without delay.

That the maritime industry should not be provincialized and confined to any one section of this country is a self-evident fact. In my remarks of July 10 I referred at some length to the weakened state—in fact, the nonexistent state—of shipbuilding on the Pacific and Gulf coasts. My remarks pointed to the dangers inherent in that state of affairs. A glance at table I, to be printed in the RECORD with these remarks, will show that no ships are being constructed at this time either on the Pacific coast or on the Gulf. Ship repair employment in the yards in those areas is at an all-time low. The Congress should take immediate action directed at correcting that dangerous situation. It is a repetition of the situations prevailing before World Wars I and II, as shown in the table. It was a major factor in delaying effective maritime help to our Armed Forces in those wars. If allowed to continue the condition may well be disastrous to our chances of victory in a future war.

The United States needs ships now and will need infinitely more in time of all-out war. We need fast ships and we do not have them. We need troop transports and we do not have them. We will never have them unless we build them now and keep them in operation or in operating condition at all times. The private American-flag merchant marine, domestic and foreign, is the only agency equipped to build and operate such ships at maximum efficiency. Without a rounded program of Government support, economic conditions do not permit private industry to maintain a fleet to provide for a fraction of our emergency needs. It is up to us to see that such support is provided now. If we close our eyes to that fact today we may open them to defeat tomorrow.

United States and Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include three articles from the Washington Evening Star of July 18; one by David Lawrence on "United States Suffering Defeat Throughout World on Psychological Front;" one by Constantine Brown on "Korean War Far From Police Action; Delay in Mobilization Call Puzzling"; and another by Dorothy Thompson entitled "United States Seen Obligated To Defend Korea; People Must Prepare for Sacrifices," which I wish every American could read because they are most timely and arresting. The articles follow in order above mentioned:

UNITED STATES SUFFERING DEFEAT THROUGHOUT WORLD ON PSYCHOLOGICAL FRONT—BOLD ACTION NEEDED BY TRUMAN TO ORGANIZE PEACE INFORMATION OFFICE

(By David Lawrence)

Much worse than the setbacks on the Korean front are the defeats being suffered throughout the world on the psychological front both by the United States and the United Nations.

Never, it might be said, in so grave an international situation has there been such a conspicuous lack of imagination and such timidity as is being exhibited by the United States Government in fighting the psychological war.

The Soviet Union has grasped the initiative and has made flank attacks around the United States in the propaganda battles in Asia as well as in Europe.

The lazy answer to this is that the United States hasn't provided the funds—the "Marshall plan of ideas," as Senator BENTON, of Connecticut, calls it. But the truth is that, even if $100,000,000 is appropriated, it would be ineffective if our Government fails to express itself forthrightly in the propaganda field.

THREE WEEKS OF INACTIVITY

More than 3 weeks have passed since the Kremlin put the North Korean Government up to an aggression that has startled the world. The United States and the United Nations responded with military effort, as yet unsuccessful, but at the same time the Soviet triumphantly grasped the initiative on the propaganda side. The Russians accuse the United Nations along with the United States of sanctioning aggression. Peace petitions are being circulated with tens of thousands of signatures by the Communists in a publicity stunt which is not being combated effectively by the western democracies.

In the face of the plain aggression in Korea nobody in our Government or in the UN has officially, formally, and loudly called Moscow the aggressor. The United Nations, moreover, has invited American boys to be killed, but politely hesitates to warn the nations helping to kill American boys that those nations are aggressors, too. While it is obvious that no nation can be asked to supply military help against its will, it is traitorous for any member of the United Nations at the same time to be supplying arms and military power to the country which is fighting the United Nations forces.

Senator HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan, has pointed this up in a speech in the Senate in which he demands that the Washington Government request the UN to adopt a resolution warning any nation helping the North Koreans that it will be regarded as a partner in the aggression.

The UN got considerable prestige by adopting a resolution calling for military forces to resist aggression in Korea, but it will rapidly lose that prestige if it stands idly by and lets the Kremlin supply munitions to the North Koreans in an obvious attempt to defeat the United Nations forces, including the United States.

POLICY MAKERS FLOUNDER

The propaganda war is being poorly handled not because there are not enough technicians to do the job or because there are inadequate transmission facilities. It is falling down because nobody in the Truman administration with authority to act has vision enough to realize what a propaganda war means. It doesn't mean just a battery of mimeograph machines and a $7,000,000 building in New York. It means that the men who make policy—men with the courage of their convictions—must call a spade a spade in public. The policy makers are floundering. Three weeks of valuable time have been lost while the American Government cravenly refrains from denouncing the Kremlin leaders as the true aggressors. The answer usually heard is that this might offend the Kremlin—as if appeasement is the way out of Korea.

What is needed is a new executive board or commission of three eminent men to give full time to the work and be responsible directly to the President and not to any Cabinet officer. The head of the Office of War Information was responsible in World War II directly to the President. He must be free again to tell the President what any member of the Cabinet is doing or failing to do that is hurting on the psychological side of warfare. He must be free to speak out in the meetings of the National Security Council, of which he should be a member. The task cannot be performed by a subordinate unit in the State Department. The top-level officers of that institution are too busy writing legal notes in the field of diplomacy and too much steeped in traditions and forms to use the vocabulary of propaganda war.

America is losing on the military side in Korea but not for long. America is losing, however, on the psychological front and there is no sign of any turn in the tide. It will take bold action by the President to organize an Office of Peace Information and to give it the proper instructions to engage in a world-wide crusade of truth.

KOREAN WAR FAR FROM POLICE ACTION; DELAY IN MOBILIZATION CALL PUZZLING

(By Constantine Brown)

The Korean campaign is no more a police action than a forest fire is a Boy Scout camp fire.

This is the consensus of most political and military men who are still wondering what keeps the administration from declaring general mobilization.

News from the battle front continues to be bad. It is not likely to change until we are pushed back to the Pusan beachhead which we expect to hold.

Improvement in military conditions after we reach that beachhead cannot be expected until we dispatch large forces across the Pacific. An offensive to push the Reds back cannot be launched with less than six or eight divisions. At the present moment we do not have anywhere near that strength for any one particular front. Partial mobilization of some units of the National Guard or specialist reserves, as contemplated by the administration, would be only patch work.

NEW EXPLOSION SEEN

The State Department and Pentagon appear convinced that further Moscow-instigated explosions will occur in the next few weeks, after we have become involved to the hilt in the Korean campaign.

While loath to admit publicly that we are now in a full-scale shooting war, many high-ranking officials and Members of Congress are convinced that our best chance of preventing the spread of Communist aggression lies in general military and industrial mobilization. This is the only thing that may make the Kremlin pause and consider the consequences of setting off more explosions throughout the world.

It is by no means certain that mobilization would have such an effect on Stalin and his gang. But it might cause them to think twice about the implications of a full war against America's fully mobilized manpower and industrial strength.

Our mobilization also would steady the shaken nerves of our allies in western Europe. When President Truman announced the American Government's decision to accept the Kremlin challenge in Korea there was a sigh of relief in western Europe. America showed that it was not frightened and refused to be trifled with any longer.

This enthusiasm did not last long in Europe. As our reverses continued the fact that we were outnumbered 10 to 1 was overlooked or ignored. All that the western Europeans, who have been living in fear of a Communist aggression for 3 years, knew was that the Americans were being beaten by a bunch of Asiatics.

PAPERS PLAY UP DEFEATS

Some British newspapers, like Lord Beaverbrook's—once an enthusiastic admirer of America's valor and willingness to fight for his country—played up our defeats in spectacular headlines. Throughout Europe there is a question on the lips of most individuals: "Is America really so weak that it cannot resist an Asiatic army?" And since this seems to be the case, the man in the street in Europe is wondering what we could do for his country in the event of Russian aggression.

Our Government is merely marking time, but that does not give an impression of strength. It creates the feeling that we are careless in the face of danger as the British and French were in the months before Hitler's attack. Peoples who suffered from their own governments' lack of preparedness during World War II are prone to look at the blackest side or the picture, regardless of the assurances of loyalty which their governments are giving Washington.

Pressing demands for more up-to-date tanks, planes and the rest of the vast modern war paraphernalia needed to oppose Soviet aggression are pouring into Washington. Our industry is still geared for civil production.

Korea and the Far East have been given top priority insofar as the sending of war equipment is concerned. The few available combat troops which we have in this country have already been sent or will soon be sailing to the Pacific area. If Russia strikes anywhere in Eastern Asia or Europe at 4 a. m. we will be far from ready to strike back within an hour, despite Defense Secretary Johnson's emphatic and optimistic statement a few months ago.

The fact is that we are relatively less prepared today than we were a few weeks before Pearl Harbor.

UNITED STATES SEEN OBLIGATED TO DEFEND KOREA—PEOPLE MUST PREPARE FOR SACRIFICES

(By Dorothy Thompson)

There is only one thing that we can say to each other in these days. We must keep our nerves, exercise restraint, prepare for great sacrifice, and know without equivocation that there was nothing else that we could do but defend the Korean republic.

There are only three places in Asia where the United States is under positive obligation. These are Japan, Korea, and the Philippines.

In the widest sense it is now irrelevant whether the Korean obligation was wise. It is not irrelevant that we undertook it without making the slightest preparation to defend it. The South Korean Republic and army were American creations. If the North Korean attack took the administration by surprise, it is only because it is so reckless that it does not read its own intelligence reports.

On June 29 the President said (reported by the UP): "The United States is merely obeying a United Nations mandate to drive out a bunch of bandits who have invaded South Korea."

"BANDITS" FOUND FORCE

The "bunch of bandits" turn out to be, like the Red army organized to conquer China, a formidable and disciplined force equipped with Russian tanks so heavily armored that 105 mm. howitzer shells bounce off them like peanuts; their ground forces well protected by airpower, and aided, as are all Red armies, by ruthless guerrillas in civilian clothes. Our Secretary of Defense, who is formidable in shooting off his mouth, has been caught in South Korea with little else to shoot with. As I write, there is one staggering bit of news, namely, that Gen. Douglas MacArthur, not usually notable for silence, has not said a word. One of these days he will.

Nevertheless, the United States in creating this republic, assumed an obligation for its defense, as it has assumed a positive commitment for the defense of Japan and the Philippines.

The obligation it has assumed in Japan is, of course, staggering. American policy caused to be written into the Japanese constitution that Japan could never again have an army. That means that your son and mine have to endure military service in order to exempt every Japanese from it, for all time, and defend the Japanese islands with our own blood against every aggressor. This is supposed to be punishing the enemy.

Don't ask me what General MacArthur thinks of the political policies he has been ordered to follow out. I hate to think.

OBLIGATION WAS THERE

However, there was the obligation. It rested on nothing whatever, as it turns out, except confidence. If the United States had refused to back up its obligation in Korea, the results would have been certain—confidence in the United States would have collapsed throughout the world, no less in Europe than in Asia. The Kremlin would not have won a battle. It would have won the fruits of a world victory.

It was this test the Russians made. In view of our pusillanimous policy elsewhere in Asia; the terrible weakness of the South Korean position; the problems of distance and lack of preparation, of which they were well aware; the confusion in Washington, where a leaderless Government faces only the opposition of McCarthyism, Russia doubtless counted on our following the policy advocated a year ago by Owen Lattimore—letting South Korea go without giving the appearance of having pushed it. Russian spies have had heartening reports to give their masters.

But what had to be tested was something spies cannot discover in pilfered blueprints and documents—something called an obligation of honor.

We All Admire Courage, Especially Personal Courage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States has again shown the stuff men of courage are made of. His letter to Gen. C. B. Cates, Commandant of the Marine Corps, is a clear indication that the President recognizes an error, and that he is man enough to admit it.

When we think of the tremendous burdens of his office, the decisions he has to make daily, and the great responsibilities which are on his shoulders I feel that, like the marines themselves, we should show Christian understanding. Not only did the President of the United States—our Commander in Chief—write a letter to General Cates but, on yesterday, he also visited the national convention of the Marine Corps League in person and made a speech to the assembled delegates.

General Cates, the highest ranking marine, in introducing President Truman, our Commander in Chief, was undoubtedly thinking of the months Captain Cates of a marine rifle company and Captain Truman of a field artillery battery were comrades in arms in France when he said:

We all admire courage, especially personal courage.

The two old buddies, standing together before the delegates to the Marine Corps League convention, have come through life under great handicaps and in spite of grave obstacles.

We are proud of both of them.

Mr. Speaker, the letter of the President to General Cates follows:

DEAR GENERAL CATES: I sincerely regret the unfortunate choice of language which I used in my letter of August 29 to Congressman MCDONOUGH concerning the Marine Corps.

What I had in mind at the time this letter was written was the specific question raised by Mr. MCDONOUGH, namely, the representation of the Marine Corps on the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I have been disturbed by the number of communications which have been brought to my attention proposing that the Marine Corps have such representation. I feel that inasmuch as the Marine Corps is by law an integral part of the Department of the Navy, it is already represented on the Joint Chiefs of Staff by the Chief of Naval Operations. That the Congress concurs in this point of view is evidenced by the fact that, in passing the National Security Act of 1947, and again in amending that act in 1949, the Congress considered the question of Marine Corps representation on the Joint Chiefs of Staff and did not provide for it.

It is my feeling that many of the renewed pleas for such representation are the result of propaganda inspired by individuals who may not be aware of the best interests of our defense establishment as a whole, and it was this feeling which I was expressing to Mr. MCDONOUGH. I am certain that the Marine Corps itself does not indulge in such propaganda.

I am profoundly aware of the magnificent history of the United States Marine Corps, and of the many heroic deeds of the marines since the corps was established in 1775.

I personally learned of the splendid combat spirit of the marines when the Fourth Marine Brigade of the Second Infantry Division fought in France in 1918.

On numerous occasions since I assumed office, I have stated my conviction that the Marine Corps has a vital role in our organization for national security and I will continue to support and maintain its identity.

I regard the Marine Corps as a force available for use in any emergency, wherever or whenever necessary. When I spoke of the Marines as the Navy's police force, I had in mind its immediate readiness, and the provision of the National Security Act which states that "the Marine Corps shall be organized, trained, and equipped to provide fleet marine forces of combined arms, together with supporting air components, for service with the fleet in the seizure or defense of advanced naval bases and for the conduct of such land operations as may be essential to the prosecution of a naval campaign."

The corps' ability to carry out whatever tasks may be assigned to it has been splendidly demonstrated many times in our history. It has again been shown by the immediate response of the Marine Corps to a call for duty in Korea.

Since Marine ground and air forces have arrived in Korea I have received a daily report of their actions. The country may feel sure that the record of the marines now fighting there will add new laurels to the already illustrious record of the Marine Corps.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

The President's letter to Clay Nixon, commandant of the Marine Corps League, follows:

MY DEAR MR. NIXON: I am concerned over the situation which has arisen because of the publishing of my letter of August 29 to Representative MCDONOUGH.

I have this date addressed a letter to the Commandant of the Marine Corps, a copy of which I am enclosing.

I should be happy to have you read my letter to the members of your organization.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

A Letter on Money and the Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, recently I received an excellent letter from a constituent of mine, Mr. W. C. Dawson, of Lepanto, Ark., on the question of money, credits, profits, Government spending, labor, production, and the relationship that each bears to the economy of the Nation. I have carefully studied Mr. Dawson's treatise on these economic subjects and feel that the Congress and the country should be apprised of the wealth of information contained in this letter. Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the full text of Mr. Dawson's letter:

LEPANTO, ARK., May 27, 1950.

Hon. E. C. "TOOK" GATHINGS,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE GATHINGS: I want you to know that I appreciate all you have done or may do in the best interest of our country.

It was the good ideas of our forefathers, put into action, that made this country "click"—made the greatest country in the world in the shortest period of time. Their ideas of freedom, equality, and justice were good. Under those ideas the people have had more freedom, have progressed faster and had the best standard of living while building the greatest country in the world.

What this writer wants to put over to you is his idea of what has caused the loss of freedom, equality, justice, and progress in all the countries of the world up to this moment, and is now eating its way into the vitals of this great land of freedom. What this writer may say is a portion of the conclusions he has reached after 17 years of economic thinking.

From this writer's point of view, high taxes are here to stay unless we change from the course we are now traveling. We are spreading the gap wider and wider between the selling price of our total production and the amount of buying power that reaches the hands of the consumers. The difference between the total selling price and the amount of buying power that reaches the consumers determines the amount of surplus products we will have. When we have surplus products we all know what happens—unemployment, starvation, and misery are soon in the midst of these surplus products. The cause of this difference between the selling price and the amount of buying power that reaches the hands of the consumers is the core of this discussion.

When anything is produced all costs and all profits are added to the selling price. No matter how many different people have a part in the processing and handling of the product, all these costs and profits are added until the product reaches the ultimate consumer who is obliged to pay the sum total of all costs and all profits. This means that all the buying power must reach the hands of the consumer if he is to buy all the product. Whatever amount the consumers lack of getting all the money, they will lack just that much of being able to buy all of the products. This much of the products will become a surplus. These surpluses will cause unemployment, starvation, and misery in the midst of plenty. All the people who have enough years behind them have seen this very thing happen again and again. Ever since money has been in use this thing has been happening to every country in the world that reached that degree of riches that enabled its people to hoard enough money to cause a sufficient difference between the selling price of that country's products and the buying power that reached the hands of its consumers. The truth that a product cannot sell for less than the costs and profits that accrue against it and that the consumer cannot buy it unless he has that amount of money seems so evident that no one should fail to understand. Yet this thing has been going on all down through the past since money has been in use. All nations that have followed this procedure have met with the same result—failure. If the consumers are to buy all that is produced then they must have the same amount of money that has accrued against the products up to the time when they are offered for sale to the ultimate consumer. The failure to allow the consumers enough money to buy all the products is the core of all economic ills. These principles can be proven by arithmetic but would require more space than we can allot to it here.

Adam Smith observed that history indicated that every nation in the world, when it grew rich, or reached what Mr. Smith termed as its complement of wealth, progress stopped and the country began going backward. He had not observed that at this point in a nation's wealth its people were able to hoard more money and make that difference between the cost of production and the amount that reached its consumers great enough to leave such a large surplus that producers were compelled to curtail their production—result, unemployment and starvation in the midst of these surpluses.

Hoarding money forces a curtailment of loans because loans are made on the expectation that the money the borrower invests will return to him and he can liquidate his investment. At this time he is expected to extinguish his loan. If the money is hoarded, it cannot return to the borrower, the borrower cannot extinguish his debt, and the loaning of money becomes hazardous. Curtailing credits is probably one of the biggest ills of hoarding money. It forces losses upon both borrowers and lenders.

To understand our economy we must know what money is, where it comes from, and what it does.

Money is secured credit. Our dictionaries tell us that the instruments by which we transfer this secured credit from one person to another is money. Thus by starting in the middle of a thing and not looking back to see the source from whence it came, and not looking forward to see what finally became of the money, the people of the world have been left in a blank spot where the knowledge of money is concerned. Money, which we have stated is secured credit, comes into existence at the time a credit is secured. The securing of a credit always creates a debt of equal amount. This is why in bookkeeping we always have an equal amount of debits and credits. It is why a bank always has the same amount of resources as liabilities.

As an example of how money, or secured credit, comes into existence, let us suppose that John Doe goes to his bank to borrow $1,000. He gives his note to the bank for $1,000 secured by some eligible property supposed to be worth $2,000 or more. This note shows that John Doe owes the bank $1,000. In turn the bank writes John Doe a deposit slip showing that it owes him $1,000. The exchange of these debts has created a new credit of $1,000. The bank's resources and liabilities both go up $1,000, and its deposits increase in the same amount. The moment before this transaction took place John Doe had no money and he owed no debt. The moment after the transaction was completed he had $1,000 in bank-credit money, but he also owed a debt of the same amount. John Doe secured his credit, and he and the bank created $1,000 in bank-credit money. This is why I say that money is secured credit. If John Doe transfers a portion of his bank credit by check, then his check is money. His check is the instrument of transfer. If he gives the bank his check and receives from the bank paper currency and transfers the paper currency, then the paper currency is money. If he gets silver from his bank and transfers the silver, then the silver is money. These are the instruments of transfer that the dictionary defines as money.

When John Doe repays his loan the bank resources and liabilities will drop $1,000, and his deposit and debt will both drop in the same amount. John Doe and his bank will stand just as they did before they created the $1,000 of bank-credit money. The bank did not loan John Doe any money it already had in the bank. By exchanging debts they created the $1,000 in new credit money. This bank credit money came into existence at the time the loan was made, and went out of existence at the time it was repaid.

Money comes from four different sources: (1) Commodity money, which is chiefly gold; (2) commercial loans; (3) investment loans. These are secured credits. Gold is the security behind the certificates issued against it. Commercial and investment loans are secured by property that is eligible to secure such loans. United States bonds are secured by the implied promise to tax.

Money, from whatever source, always creates a debt in equal amount, thus we have as much debt as we have money. What money one may have is always some one else's debt. If creditors hoard money debtors are doomed, because they cannot repay their debt unless the money they borrowed and invested returns to them. It cannot return to them if it is hoarded. Since debts and money are in equal amounts it takes all the money to repay all the debts. Anything that is secured implies that there is an equal amount on the other side of the equation.

I have shown where money comes from, what it is and where it goes. As a summary, money comes into existence when a credit is secured and goes out of existence when that money is repaid. To describe what it does would require more space than I have to devote to it here.

People secure their credit at the banks because they do not have open credit to buy all the things they want. When their credit is secured it becomes a thing that can be transferred, and we call the instruments by which the transfer of these credits are made money. It is said that different countries have different kinds of money. All good money is secured credits. The difference comes in the instruments by which the transfer of credits are accomplished.

The core of this money question is that it requires a debt to create money, and that debt cannot be repaid unless the money returns to the debtor. It requires all the money to repay all the debts. This is one of the reasons why the hoarding of money gets our economy into trouble.

It is natural for opposites to be equal. Buying and selling must be equal or balance. This is true in barter, which is the first principle of exchange. The parties to the trade receive as much produce or actual wealth as they release. This is natural—a fundamental principle that cannot be violated without throwing our economy out of balance. When one sells his product for money, he has not exchanged his product for other products, nor will he have done so until he has invested the money he received for his product. During the time he holds the money our economy is out of balance in this amount. The holding out or hoarding of this amount of money has caused an equal amount of surplus products. Surplus products provide the cause of unemployment, unemployment causes more surpluses and more unemployment and soon we have a depression.

When we have unemployment, we must resort to deficit spending to breach the gap between the selling price and the amount of buying power in the hands of the consumers. In short, the Government must make up, by deficit spending, the amount that is hoarded. We need more taxes but are able to pay less. Our progress has stopped and we are going backward. The standard of living of our people is less as a whole because we are producing and distributing less. Our Government debt increases because we are compelled to spend more than we are able to pay in taxes. In short, when we violate nature's laws we are heading for trouble.

In all the past centuries that money has been used—used to destroy the economy of every nation that reached that degree of opulence that the people could hoard enough money to cause enough surplus to curtail the business of that country to the extent that it could not progress farther but was compelled to go backward is, it seems to this writer, a sufficient reason to take stock of our economy and correct some first causes.

We have the best economic system and the best country in the world to exploit it, if we only had the good sense to take advantage of the opportunities providence has offered us. The best way to beat communism is to take advantage of our economic opportunities. The world then would see the advantage of our economic system, and we would have the battle won on the economic front, which is the controlling factor in the political front.

Money invested makes more jobs, money hoarded makes more unemployment. There is always enough money provided to pay costs and profits in the production of anything to equal the selling price of that product. Therefore, if all the money reached the consumers they would be able to buy all the products. A balanced economy would take care of all the products a people might be willing and able to produce. There would be surpluses only when there was more of a particular product than the people were willing to buy. In other words, when there was more of a particular product produced than the people had need for surpluses would exist.

Capital comes from profits. The more the capital per worker the higher the wages of the worker. Labor must earn the profits and they are entitled to have the profits used as capital to create more jobs and at higher wages. Adam Smith says in substance that when there are more laborers than there is capital to employ, the competition between the laborers bidding against each other for jobs will lower wages. This automatically raises profits and when these profits become capital it creates more jobs to employ the surplus labor. Thus it is seen that labor really provides the capital that employs it. When the profits are hoarded and not allowed to become capital labor loses the jobs they have really earned.

When the profits build up more capital than there are laborers to employ, the competition between employers bidding for labor will raise wages, which automatically lowers profits. This reduces profits and likewise the amount of new capital until there are enough workers to employ it. This is nature's way of keeping the balance between labor and capital. If all profits were used as capital the employers would be compelled to pay the highest wages they could afford to pay. This would be true because of the reasons given above.

John Stuart Mill says (p. 260, vol. 2 of his Principles of Political Economy): "Wages depend on the ratio between population and capital; and would do so if all the capital in the world were the property of one association or if the capitalists among whom it is shared maintained each an establishment for the production of every article consumed in the community, exchange of commodities having no existence."

Both Smith and Mill seem to take it for granted that all profits will be invested. They fail to consider the consequences if they were not. Thus we see how important it is to the laborer that the profits he earns for his employer become capital to make more jobs at higher wages.

This writer does not think the matter of taxes and public debt would be so serious if we took the right view and proper action in these matters. When we make a public debt there is no way to repay it except through taxation and we had as well be reconciled to this truth.

When there is but one road leading to a certain destination and that destination is at the dead end of the road, the logical way to return to the place from whence we started is to reverse the direction. Perhaps in reality this road is not much harder to travel in one direction than the other.

When we make a public debt we all pay higher prices because deficit spending is inflationary. Much of this inflationary money goes to pay for war materials and expenses which require much labor but produces nothing to raise our standard of living. On the face of this proposition it should lower our standard of living and would do so if it continued long enough to use up our surplus wealth. The fact is that our wars usually terminated before this factor became too serious. We usually have lavish times while spending what we had accumulated.

When we stop deficit spending and reverse our direction, we are compelled to build back those stocks which have been depleted. Aside from building back these stocks, which means, of course, building back our depleted capital, this writer thinks reversing our direction should not necessarily lower our standard of living. After all is said and done, our standard of living necessarily depends upon how much we produce and distribute.

Let us be realistic. Labor necessarily must earn the capital that employs it. We need enough capital to employ all of our labor, so business must make enough profits to supply this capital. When we have enough capital to employ all of our labor and supply that labor with the best production equipment and with sufficient stocks to work upon we will be able to reach our maximum production and our highest standard of living.

But how about the taxes that must come out of these profits to pay government expenses and our public debt? The more the profits, the more the taxes we can collect. Suppose we permit business to make large profits and take all the taxes the traffic will bear and pay as much as possible of the amount collected on our public debt, then in turn require those who collect their debt to reinvest the money. The money invested by those who collected their debt would make just as much capital as though it had been invested by the one who made the exorbitant profit. Since a raise in capital raises our production and that production is distributed among the same 150,000,000 people, it would raise their standard of living in the same proportion as the increased production and distribution. John Stuart Mill says that wages will be in proportion to population and capital. The fact that the father owns all the property does not change the income of the family.

When we did deficit spending the creditors of the Government passed the money through the hands of the Government, and the Government spent the money in the interest of our country. Now the people must repay the Government through taxes, and the Government must repay its creditors. There is no way to accomplish this except through taxation, and there is no way to collect sufficient taxes to make the repayment unless business makes enough profits to enable them to pay the required amount of taxes.

In the modern library edition of Adam Smith's Wealth of the Nations, page 141, we find the following. I quote: "I shall conclude this long chapter with observing that though anciently it was usual to rate wages, first by general laws extending over the whole kingdom, and afterward by particular order of the justices of peace in every particular county, both these practices have now gone entirely into disuse. 'By the experience of above 400 years,' says Dr. Burn, 'it seems time to lay aside all endeavors to bring under strict regulations, what in its own nature seems incapable of minute limitations; for if all persons in the same kind of work were to receive equal wages, there would be no emulation, and no room left for industry or ingenuity'."

I shall not attempt to tell you what we are doing in regard to this labor question, for you know much better than I. However, I would like to proffer this question to all our elected representatives who have a part in making labor laws. What hope do we have that a thing will now succeed that has always failed in the past, even when it has been tried over a period of 400 years?

This writer's answer to this question is this: If all the money was put through the hands of the consumers there would be no need of any labor laws because in this case there would be enough buying power in the hands of the consumers to buy all we produce. Under this plan all surplus profits would go into capital, which would force employers to bid against each other, for laborers and employers would be compelled to pay the highest prices they could afford. Employers would not have to pay more than they could afford because this would bring a natural balance between capital and labor. Natural laws never require the impossible, human laws do. Anyone can find fault or disagree with everything that is, but to offer a real solution to our problems is another thing. If we complied with first principles we would be relieved of a multitude of secondary causes that come to us as a result of failure to comply with first principles or causes. The gap between the selling price of all our products and the amount of money that reaches the consumers is the first cause of our economic trouble. By thus unbalancing our selling price and buying power, we create surpluses and from these surpluses comes another cause to produce another effect, and this last effect becomes another cause producing another effect and on and on. We can violate nature's laws but we cannot escape the penalty for so doing.

Henry George spent much of his time trying to discover the cause of starvation in the midst of plenty. This writer thinks that Mr. George failed to discover this cause because he did not have some of the facts about money. When a student, I was taught in psychology that if we left out any important fact when considering any proposition we would most likely reach the wrong conclusion. This writer believes that a lack of knowledge of some of the facts has caused about all the errors in economic thinking. This writer has no right to think he will not fall into error because of this same reason. For this and other reasons this writer will send any Senator or Congressman a copy of this letter who will give the writer a comment and some constructive criticism. From the comment the writer hopes to gain some help in marketing a book he plans to publish when finances will permit. From the constructive criticism he hopes to be able to correct some errors. From the study by our representatives he hopes some good may come to our country by starting some thinking in the right direction.

Hoping that this letter may mark the beginning of a new approach to our economy, and with best wishes to you and all who may be concerned, I am

Yours very truly,

W. C. DAWSON.

How We Can Lick Stalin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "How We Can Lick Stalin," by Brig. Gen. Bonner Fellers, United States Army, retired, published in the September 16, 1950, issue of Colliers' magazine.

I have been advised by the Government Printing Office that the article is estimated to be 2¾ pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at a cost of $225.50.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

HOW WE CAN LICK STALIN

(By Brig. Gen. Bonner Fellers)

There is not a moment to lose. The deadline was long ago. The cold war has been lost.

The Korean war caught us dangerously unprepared. General MacArthur's sure touch, coupled with the failure of the Red Korean tanks to exploit early gains, probably will enable our resourceful forces to stabilize the situation. Then, as more reinforcements arrive, we shall be able to turn the tide.

Nevertheless it is disconcerting to contemplate what could happen if hundreds of thousands of the oriental Red army, covered by a Red air force, were to move down into Korea.

Neither the bravery of our GI's nor General MacArthur's genius could overcome the disaster they would face. Even if our boys were to kill 10 or 20 to 1, we would be wiped out by an endless stream of Communists pouring upon us with complete abandon of life.

For many months before the Korean war started General MacArthur had pleaded in vain for stronger forces in his Far East command. The Joint Chiefs of Staff personally had agreed with his views, but, as they explained to him, the civil branch of the Government had final authority.

In South Korea our responsibilities had been assumed March 1949 by the Department of State. In June of that year our troops were relieved. While it was known that North Koreans were being heavily armed, it was decided our aid from that time would be almost entirely economic. Of a $10,000,000 aid authorization by the Congress, only $108 worth of radio wire had been delivered prior to the Communist invasion. Administration leaders had made it clear that Korea was not essential to our strategic position in Asia.

Referring to President Truman's sudden reversal of this policy, General MacArthur said "the Far East command, until the President's great pronouncement to support the epochal action of the United Nations, had no slightest responsibility for the defense of the free Republic of Korea. With the President's decision it assumed a completely new and added mission."

It was a State Department decision to leave the thirty-eighth parallel undefended on the south side. It was a White House decision which suddenly junked this policy in favor of armed intervention—at a time when sufficient military force was not readily available.

One or the other of these decisions was wrong.

In Europe, although there is no fighting there at the moment, our position is potentially far more critical than in Asia. There the State Department, without appreciation of the complexities of modern war and the terrific combat effectiveness of the Red Army, has committed the United States to assist in holding western Europe's frontier. It is my belief that few professional military men of reputation really believe such a program can succeed. Yet the military, subordinated to the civil branch of our Government, has offered no public protest. Our Nation is in imminent peril unless our military leaders, even at the risk of their professional careers, insist that our plans be militarily sound and that the objectives given us by the civil branch of the Government be attainable.

WHY WE MUST AVOID GROUND COMBAT

We cannot win against Russia on the ground. We cannot win in ground combat against Red oriental forces on the Asiatic mainland. These Red forces are too vast numerically, too well equipped, too willing to sacrifice their men, for us to accept full-scale ground combat with them in Europe or Asia. Moreover, the distances and winter factors in Russia give her enormous advantages. Where Napoleon and Hitler failed from nearby bases, we had better not make the plunge from across the ocean.

It would be folly to strike Russia's greatest strength, her ground forces, with what in that war would be the weakest element of our three arms—our ground forces. Russia's hope for a military victory would lie in her ability to throw the full weight of the Red Army against the United Nations forces, which of course would be mainly American. Under no circumstances should we allow Stalin to maneuver us into the position of opposing his strength with our weakness. Rather, we should avoid Russia's incalculable strength and attack her where she is most vulnerable. Russia is weakest at her heart. She is strongest on her periphery. Inside Russia, communism is a miserable failure.

The Russian people never have entirely accepted communism. I am reliably advised that during the 20-year period preceding World War II there were 30 sizable revolts, rebellions, and plots against the Kremlin dictatorship. They were staged by peasants, workers and even by members of the Red Army itself.

When Hitler's forces struck Russia, an important segment of the population greeted the Nazis as liberators. Four million Russian officers and soldiers are reported to have surrendered. Eight hundred thousand troops joined the Nazi forces. Russian General Vlassov set up three Russian divisions to fight Stalin. But Hitler, with his race supremacy complex, looked upon the Russians as inferior. He wanted only the rich Ukraine land, not the people. Confident of victory, he slaughtered the population and the forces which had surrendered to him.

Stalin, sensing his precarious position, somewhat relaxed his despotic control, appealed to the patriotism of the people, and promised postwar relief. The Russian people, faced by an invader whose atrocities exceeded those of Stalin, rallied to the defense of their motherland and fought history's greatest defensive battle.

After the war, hundreds of thousands of Russian nationals refused to return to Russia. They resisted by all possible means, including suicide. Compelled by a wartime agreement to assist in forced repatriation, we played a part in this affair which is a dark chapter in the American record. Purges in the Red Army subdued the military. Desertions were by the thousand.

Today conditions inside Russia are almost unbearable, even for a population accustomed to harsh treatment. There are 15,000,000 Russian prisoners behind barbed wire. I have seen some of these prison camps on my two trans-Siberian trips. About 9,000,000 of these are male political prisoners between the ages of 18 and 58. They comprise 16 percent of the male population between these age limits. There is scarcely a family in Russia which has not lost a member to the barbed-wire prisons. It is evident that the Communist system carries within itself the seeds of self-destruction. The iron curtain is plain evidence the Kremlin does not trust the Russian people. It is afraid for them to have contact with the outside world, to know how other peoples live.

Stalin's problem of control is terrific. Of necessity, if he is to continue in power, he must subject his people to their own military occupation. He must transmute the hatred his people hold for the Kremlin into hatred for their alleged external enemy—the United States.

We should launch immediately a full-scale psychological campaign to drive a wedge between the Kremlin and the Russian people. Psychologically, the enslaved Russians are ripe for revolt. But they have neither the military equipment, nor the leadership and organization to implement their desires. Nevertheless, secret groups exist in Russia dedicated to the overthrow of the Kremlin and the establishment of a liberal government. At least one of these anti-Communist organizations penetrates the iron curtain regularly. It needs help—money, printing presses, paper, radio sending and receiving sets, small planes, small free balloons and various other aids to intensify and expand the underground activities. The cost in relation to military expenditures would be almost negligible.

The Red Army, some reliable observers believe, is saturated with revolutionary ferment, and cannot be relied upon unless Russia is attacked. Yet, in spite of this situation, which might be strengthened immeasurably by a psychological campaign by the United States, our steps to exploit this positive vulnerability are ineffective. The Voice of America, even is increased as contemplated, is a mere whisper. The State Department must always be diplomatic. This precludes success in Russia; for to be effective the psychological campaign must be aimed at the eventual overthrow of the Kremlin. This cannot be achieved merely by radio broadcasts into Russia. It will require the individual initiative of those behind the iron curtain and the integration of their individual efforts into mass action.

ENEMIES WITHIN MENACE THE KREMLIN

No border so vast as that of Russia, and touched in so many places by unhappy vassal states, can be guarded against all penetration. Peasants and others who pass for peasants can move in and out at night. There is bound to be talk between those on one side and those on the other. Our messages can be transmitted by ardent anti-Communist Russians who know just the right word to attract somebody, just the right touch to give verisimilitude to leaflets that might be dropped from balloons, or small Russian-piloted planes. We in our American towns, would know at once whether a message that came to us showed intimate knowledge of our town and our surroundings. Russian fugitives from the brutality of the Kremlin have friends back where they fled from, who will pass the truth around convincingly.

We have the best story in the world to tell. The Kremlin feeds its listeners with distortions of American life, with exceptions to the normal. Our task is to give them the truth. The Reds have done alarmingly well with their lies. Certainly we should be able to do more with our truth. We have a better chance to weaken Russia than we have to strengthen western Europe militarily, at far less cost. By choosing the more practical way we could tip the balance of power heavily to our side.

In Japan our psychological campaign drove a wedge between the Emperor and his people on the one hand, and the militarists on the other. This campaign contributed in a marked degree to Japan's surrender. It was one of the reasons why the Japanese surrendered on the mainland without a fight. What worked against Japan can be made to work against the Kremlin. In this field I speak from experience, for it was my privilege to serve as chief of psychological warfare on General MacArthur's staff while the war was on.

A full-scale campaign to project the truth through the iron curtain to the Russian people should be initiated immediately. We can and must create a situation of unrest in Russia which would make Stalin hesitate to go to war lest his home front turn actively against him. Our military leaders should demand the campaign.

It is obvious that we cannot hold the Red army out of western Europe. As the prospect of combat with Russia closes down upon us, our early lesson in Korea makes crystal-clear what it means for us to engage vast land armies.

Russia could start some 150 to 200 divisions across Europe in a matter of weeks. Within 90 days she could probably have 500 divisions available. She could have a thousand divisions eventually if she needed them. In the latest war Russia put 11,000,000 troops into action before lend-lease aid was available. She now has some 20,000,000 trained ground troops.

Even if the mutual defense assistance program were completed—which it will not be for several years—the Western World would be able to oppose the Russians with only 50 divisions. Such United States divisions as might possibly be available could scarcely reach Europe before the Red Army reached the Atlantic.

A comparison of Allied with Russian strength near the close of World War II is significant. On the western frontier the United States had 3 airborne, 15 armored and 45 infantry divisions. Great Britain had 12, France 11, and Canada 5—a total of 91. This force, with complete domination of the air, was pushing the Nazis toward Berlin. On the other frontier, Stalin had 502 Red Army divisions pushing the German Army westward across central Europe.

The 91 divisions represented the Allied peak strength in Europe for World War II. The 502 Red Army divisions did not represent Russia's peak strength. She had already lost some 10,000,000 soldiers.

If the United States permits its forces to engage the Red Army in Europe, our losses will be so appalling that the American people will recoil in horror and belatedly examine our leadership. This tragedy must not happen.

Our economic position is such that we can no longer afford any program which is not vital to our existence. Our debt is nearing the $300,000,000,000 mark. Our total taxes will climb to $50,000,000,000 annually. Since the end of the war we have spent $91,000,000,000 for national defense, and yet we have doubtful security. Our foreign aid has amounted to $33,000,000,000.

Since the Korean war began we have embarked upon a new and vast multi-billion-dollar spending program. If it encompasses everything now planned, including the increased military assistance program for Europe. the total spent will mount to some $50,000,000,000.

The European countries have already reached prewar economic levels. Therefore, we should terminate the Marshall plan without delay. The point-4 program, at this time, should not be started. And our domestic economy should be pared to the bone.

The military assistance program, for which we have already earmarked billions of dollars plus vast quantities of surplus equipment, also should be terminated immediately.

We should advise our allies that the equipment we have provided will enable them to preserve internal security and prevent civil war. We should advise them that we are not abandoning them, nor are we welshing on the North Atlantic mutual defense treaty. If war comes, we should propose to lend military assistance by striking Russia from the air, continuing this assault until Russia surrends or is destroyed.

It is far from an acceptable solution to permit the Red Army to occupy Europe. But there is no acceptable solution for our European allies if war comes—merely two sinister alternatives. The lesser of these is occupation. If the Europeans resist the Red Army, they will be slaughtered.

To be sure, the manpower which our allies can provide for military service is impressive. In addition we could also recruit a formidable ground force of anti-Communist Russian and satellite DP's. We might decide to persuade the people of west Germany to form an army. But would Russia remain still and allow the creation of a force sufficiently formidable to hold the Red army out of Europe? And were we to move toward establishing sufficient United States air units in Europe to cover the force, Russia would be almost certain to strike before her enemy became really formidable.

The 1950 defense budget being spent by our European allies—less the negligible budgets of Luxemburg, Portugal, and Iceland—amounts to only $4,000,000,000 annually. There is the equivalent of two American divisions in Germany. France has three occupational divisions, but her best troops, 150,000 of them, are in Indochina; and her second-line troops are in North Africa. There are possibly 200,000 more assorted Allied troops in Europe, but these cannot be said to be on a war footing.

A negligible allied air force is available to cover these meager ground forces.

After considerable pondering, I have reached the unhappy conclusion that we cannot depend on our allies in Europe for military assistance should war come. This is in no way a reflection on the character of these people, nor on their valor or loyalty to us. It is merely recognizing a reality.

Russia probably has the atom bomb and 16,000 combat planes. Stalin will be in position, should war become imminent, to advise our allies to remain neutral and be spared attack. If they elect to give the United States bases in Europe or to cooperate with us in the war, he might try to take their population centers out by atomic assault the first 24 hours of the war. And he might very well succeed, because the Allies would not have sufficient air power in Europe at the outset to neutralize the Red air force. Thus, through no cowardice, the Allies may be driven into neutrality.

It would be interesting to know what Secretary of State Acheson would advise our allies to do under these circumstances. Presumably his policy would take us into war to save western Europe. But their destruction would defeat our war objective in Europe before the war was well under way.

Russia can be defeated—militarily—by the United States only through air assault. We can build an air force superior to the Red air force; we can gain mastery of the air over Russia; then we can force Russia into submission or destroy her. Air power can destroy Russia's war potential. From secret intelligence sources and by air reconnaissance we can learn the sites of her key industries. Our planes can fly the thousands of miles necessary to reach them, and return. We can take out Russia's steel industry, her oil supplies—the sinews and lifeblood of modern war. Air power can take out the bridges over her great rivers and paralyze her communications. With her railways out—there are practically no roads—Russia could not distribute food for the population.

These objectives—destruction of steel, oil, and communications facilities—are attainable. It is within our industrial capacity to build an Air Force to achieve them. We have the genius to build the best Air Force in the world. We have learned from the mistakes of the last war. If we eliminate all wasteful political expenditure we can build such an Air Force within the limits of sound economy.

A decision to knock out Russia's war potential by air assault in no way should imply that only air power is necessary. We must continue to maintain a fleet which can control the seas. It is essential to our survival. So long as the fleet is in existence, Red forces—except relatively small airborne units—cannot invade the Western Hemisphere. But the fleet cannot deliver a knockout blow against Russia, for Russia cannot be blockaded.

The Army and Navy are important as formerly, but against Russia the weight of their roles has changed. They have become supporting arms for the Air Force. Against Russia the Army and Navy would seize, hold, and supply essential overseas bases from which air strikes may be unleashed against the heart of Russia.

BEST SITES FOR OUR AIR BASES

We cannot hold bases in western Europe proper, except perhaps in Spain, but there are potential base sites which we can hold and from which any target in Russia could be destroyed, eventually, by our Air Force. Bases which can be held must have the incidental protection of mountains or deserts or bodies of water or combinations of these natural barriers.

The great Pyrenees Mountains barrier would make Spain a difficult operation for the Red Army. So it would be well to tie Spain into our war strategy.

We may be compelled to consider Africa as a huge north-and-south approach to potential bases in Libya. These bases can be held. To take bases away from us in Libya would require an airborne invasion by the Red Army.

Such an operation is vulnerable to ground defense. In the defense of Crete the British—though eventually overwhelmed—destroyed 80 percent of the German paratroopers.

In the Pacific we must hold the Aleutians, Japan, Okinawa, Formosa, the Philippines, and possibly some lesser islands in the chain. If the Reds ever occupy this chain, or any great part of it, we will be denied the ocean approaches to Asia, and also bases from which to bomb important Red Asiatic centers. Possession of these islands from Alaska to the Philippines is vital to our security.

From bases in Africa and in the Orient our long-range bombers can strike any target in Eurasia. The effectiveness of the Red air force interceptors is an unknown factor. Our newest bombers, refuelled in flight, may be fast enough to evade interception, especially at night or in bad weather. But the chances are, if war comes, we shall have to win the battle of the air over Russia first. This will require a long and costly advance of air bases in areas where natural barriers preclude a major engagement with the Red Army.

Our Air Force faces another assignment of magnitude. For the first time since 1812 our population centers will be endangered by a foreign power, if war with Russia comes. Fighter protection must be provided not only for our cities but for entire industrial areas; and the Air Force must help defend Alaska. It is all a vast and costly undertaking.

PROBLEMS OF WORLD POLICING

But war with Russia is not the only threat to us. Our war in Korea could be merely the beginning of a series of critical disturbances. We are committed to lend assistance to certain peoples who oppose the spread of totalitarianism. Have we the means to do this?

Korea already has provided the answer. We simply have not the combat units, the manpower, or the proper transport to police the world. Nor have we the wealth.

The forces we must create to deter Russia from waging war are not suitable for police action, nor can they be committed deeply, lest the real war be kindled.

To handle probable emergencies a United Nations task force should be tailor-made to meet any problem which might arise in Formosa, Japan, and the Philippines and possibly other areas in the Far East vital to the success of our cause. The force should be strong in manpower equipped with small arms, and supported by medium bombers and fighters both land- and sea-based. It should have tanks, cannon, and antitank weapons, all balanced to meet known conditions in given areas. Only a small fraction of the manpower can be recruited from the United States. Friendly Chinese, the Japanese, Filipinos, and others in the Orient to whose protection we commit ourselves have ample volunteer manpower.

In the Middle East there should be created a second and larger United Nations task force, tailored to handle Communist uprisings in those troubled areas which we consider essential to the success of our cause. This Middle East task force could be trained in Libya. The manpower could be recruited from volunteers among displaced Russian nationals, and from German and Allied volunteers. The United States should furnish only a small unit. More than one-half million anti-Communist Russian displaced persons are political refugees in Europe, who will be destroyed if Stalin invades. They dare not return to Russia lest they be purged. Naturally they would be eager to join in what to them might be a crusade to liberate the enslaved Russian population.

These two task forces, with certain elements airborne, would be trouble shooters to quench insurrection and civil war in the Orient and Middle East—in areas which we consider vital to our security. In selecting these vital areas care must be taken not to place ourselves in the role of underwriting European colonial imperialism. Already Communist propaganda is effectively appealing to all Asia by branding us as imperialists.

These selected areas which are capable of being defended must be determined at once. The military should then be instructed to proceed with plans to defend them. If they can't be defended, as is clearly the case in Europe, the military must speak frankly and openly—and fearlessly.

The military preparation for the defense of these areas must be separate and distinct from the military force which we must have to deter Russia from war, and to strike her if war is forced upon us.

Were we to build without delay the best Air Force in the world and create United Nations task forces for the Far East and the Middle East, danger of war with Russia would be far less than now. On the other hand, if we continue to dissipate our means and follow present piecemeal, fuzzy policies, war is inevitable.

OUR TWO MOST POTENT WEAPONS

Total mobilization, universal military training, invocation of a full-scale draft and other related measures will not bluff Stalin. He fears neither our mobilization nor our manpower. He fears and respects only our air power and our power to project the truth through the iron curtain. Yet, we have continued not to build air supremacy, and we are neglecting an effective psychological campaign.

Because of our early reverses in Korea, the cry has already gone up: The airplane is merely an auxiliary weapon; jet planes are too fast for certain types of combat; we can win only with doughboys and more tanks than Stalin can build. The tendency among those charged with planning is to pull the Air Force down to the role of a supporting arm for land and sea forces. Congress seems in a mood to rubber stamp the authorization for the President to spend vast sums at home and abroad, to move into total mobilization, to invoke a full-scale draft, to shape a vast Army to handle local disturbances everywhere and to challenge the Red hordes of Asia as well as the Red army.

This would be precisely what Mr. Stalin wants. His own planners could not improve on the program. If we endeavor to handle local civil wars wherever they break out—as the President has indicated—we shall piecemeal our means and collapse our economy. If we accept combat with vast Red ground forces in Europe and Asia, our losses will mount into the millions and we shall fail.

Planning to keep the peace by force on a global scale is no amateur assignment. There was a time when rifles were our most effective weapon and military matters could be safely entrusted to the guidance of those without professional background. Today, however, with war the most complex phenomenon of our civilization, we continue to adhere to the political tradition of entrusting our national security to those with little or no military background. The President and State Department are making political commitments whose military implications are not only unsound but dangerous.

Of course, we have the Joint Chiefs of Staff to direct the complexities of war preparation, but their professional views have been subordinated to decisions of the White House and State Department. In spite of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the civilian leaders have taken us into one unsound military situation after another. And they are still doing it.

We should no longer allow this arrangement for global planning. To accept Stalin's challenge anywhere and everywhere that a Communist-inspired insurrection breaks out is playing into his hands. It makes us the victim of his cunning.

Stalin realizes far better than we that, if we build air supremacy, our air power can destroy his war potential. Consequently he has invented methods to get around this possibility. By creating ground combat wars about his vast periphery he proposes to bleed us white, while neutral Russia, free from air strikes, continues to produce munitions for her fighting satellites.

While our strength is thus being sapped, a creeping total mobilization program at home could spell disaster. The secret of American progress is free enterprise. Under it we have created abundance. Our liberty and individual freedom, our moral and spiritual aspirations all spring from this solid economic basis. Gradual total mobilization and war will destroy the abundance we have created, and with its destruction we shall lose our freedom.

OPPOSITION PARTY IS NEEDED

War hysteria is already revealing itself in the widespread demand that opposition to all Presidential measures be silenced as a patriotic duty. Nothing, not even defeat in battle, could harm us more. Unless a strong and challenging opposition party exists, the power of the executive branch becomes absolute. Then the administration thinks it has become infallible. When no one dares to oppose them, we are on the road to ruin.

The United States has only 6 percent of the world's population. It is time we took stock of where we are drifting. Unless we do this and create a plan to lift ourselves out of the certain danger which we face in the immediate future, it will be too late to save ourselves

In shaping our Constitution our forefathers rightly subordinated military authority to civil. They had had enough of military conscription and domination in England and on the Continent.

Today, however, we find the civil branch of our Government abusing its power. The military has been subordinated to the extent that our national security is imperiled. Military leaders must be unshackled and permitted to express views freely on the military implications of our commitments.

If the Chief of Naval Operations was fired for expressing his views at a B-36 hearing before a congressional committee—at which he had been promised immunity—what would happen to a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff who opposed Mr. Acheson in cooperating on defense proposals to Europe? Nevertheless, if we are to remain free, our military leaders, at the risk of their careers, must oppose measures which imperil our existence. In the final analysis it is the American people to whom they owe their loyalty.

We must have a dynamic strategic concept of how to survive. No longer can we afford to drift without sound, long-range planning and attainable objectives. No longer have we the resources to dole out to this ally or that former enemy. Our position is so precarious that every dollar and every soldier must be made to count. American economic and military aid to any friendly power must implement this over-all strategy. No longer do we dare squander our means for purposes which do not further this strategy.

We need a new dynamic strategy now. Its principal provisions should be:

1. Attainable political objectives backed by commensurate military might, including air supremacy and two United Nations task forces.
2. Improved intelligence agencies—the eyes of our defenses.
3. Assistance programs that further attainable objectives.
4. A sound domestic economy.

All this—and that other element that could be the most effective: weakening the Kremlin dictatorship from within. This is our best chance to avoid war. It will hasten victory if war comes.

What Will Happen to UN Army After Korea War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, for many years I have known Sigrid Arne. She is not only an accurate reporter but has a keen, penetrating insight into world conditions.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I submit the following article which appeared in the Washington Sunday Star of September 3, which I am sure will be informative and helpful to all who read it:

WHAT WILL HAPPEN TO UN ARMY AFTER KOREA WAR?—QUESTION OF ESTABLISHING PERMANENT WORLD POLICE FORCE IS STILL UNANSWERED

(By Sigrid Arne)

The Communist attack on South Korea has brought into being the very international police force which the Soviets have fought against in the United Nations for 5 years.

But it is only a provisional police force. What will happen to it after the Korean matter is cleaned up is not yet apparent. The question of establishing a permanent force—and the makeup of that force if it is established—is still up in the air, although there is a great deal of unofficial talk about it.

For the first 2 months in Korea the ground battle against the Communists had to be waged by South Koreans and American GIs alone. They had almost immediate support, however, from British and Australian planes and from naval vessels of Australia, Britain, Canada, the Netherlands and New Zealand in addition to United States planes and ships.

By the end of 2 months the United States delegate to the UN, Warren Austin, could tell the UN Security Council that 30,000 troops from nine other UN member nations were pledged to fight in Korea. They were either en route or training for action.

The following nations had pledged troops: Australia, Canada, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Philippines, Thailand, Turkey, the United Kingdom and France.

WHAT OF THE FUTURE?

The following, all told, had pledged naval aid: Australia, Canada, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, and the United Kingdom.

The following, all told, had pledged air aid: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Greece, the Union of South Africa.

The Nationalist Chinese Government offered troops and planes, but acceptance was delayed in view of Communist threats to Formosa, where most of the Nationalist forces are stationed.

Offers of medical aid had been made by Denmark, Ethiopia, India, Israel, the Philippines and Sweden.

Offers of economic help had come from Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, Lebanon, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, the Philippines and Thailand. A number of other states had talked informally with the United States to discover whether they could help.

Shortly after the fighting started the UN Security Council asked the United States to name a UN commander in Korea, and Gen. Douglas MacArthur was appointed.

Most of the burden still is being carried by the United States. But American policy makers, in both the State and Defense Departments, are satisfied that the Korean Communists will shortly learn, the hard way, that their cause is opposed by the whole non-Communist world, whether white, yellow, or brown.

But what about the long run?

Under the UN Charter it was planned that member nations would place military contingents and bases at the disposal of the Security Council. The Council is responsible for putting down threats to the peace.

Russian action in UN committees blocked establishment of such a force. But, had the plan worked, the UN would have had an army on hand to move immediately to Korea. Or, as some State Department men think, its very existence might have stopped the Korean action before it started.

SEARCH FOR PLAN

How long will the present UN army hold together?

Top United States military men point out that nations pledging aid have done so merely for the Korean campaign, even though at the same time they acknowledge the possibility of further Communist strikes in other parts of the globe.

So far there is no plan to hold together the present UN army, nor to enlarge or use it elsewhere.

But there is much unofficial searching here in Washington for some plan that would give the free nations a permanent and ready weapon against aggression.

One concrete suggestion comes from Senator SPARKMAN, Democrat, of Alabama, who has just been appointed an American delegate to the UN. He plans to propose a UN police force made up of paid, volunteer, professional land, sea, and air forces.

The men would be trained and stationed in international zones and in sensitive areas—that is, areas where there is danger of an attack on peace.

These men would enlist directly with UN police headquarters and could come from any nation except the Big Five—the United States, Britain, France, Russia, and China—which would be expected to keep up their armies in any case. Senator SPARKMAN thinks many small nations would drop their armies if there were a dependable UN police.

The force would be maintained by contributions from both UN members and any nonmember nations that wanted to help.

MILITARY DUBIOUS

Mr. SPARKMAN points out his plan is just a start, and no doubt needs changes. But he wants the Senate to request President Truman to instruct the United States delegation at the UN to bring up the plan at the next meeting of the General Assembly, where Russia could not veto it as it could in the Security Council.

Top military men wonder about the difficulties of running such a force. They ask:

Who would be the military commander? In what money would the forces be paid? What nation besides the United States has the capacity to turn out the needed equipment?

Where would the men train? Where would they be stationed? Would Britain, for example, want such an international group stationed on its soil?

In what language would the Army transact business? How to make certain that the volunteers are not Communists?

Some of these United States officers think it might be best for military aid to come from nations as organized units, trained on home soil, paid in home money, and supplied and transported by their own governments.

But what of the many men who have wanted to fight in Korea alongside the GI's, citizens of nations that either have offered no troops or whose armies are too small for them to make offers? The State Department reports "volunteers have literally banged on almost every Embassy door we have abroad."

Could such volunteers be fitted into an American foreign legion, patterned after the French Legion? That idea is being turned over in Washington, but there is no comment on it.

Meanwhile two sets of free-world armies are being fitted together for the long pull for mutual defense—those of the 12 nations in the North Atlantic Pact and those of 16 Latin-American Republics working together with the United States under the Rio Pact.

Can a Cough Mean Cancer?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, in recent years the medical profession has made great strides in its warfare against human destruction by cancer. As a result of these years of effort in research and treatment, it now seems that medicine has determined that one out of every 10 cases of cancer is cancer of the lung. Inasmuch as this is very much a national problem I should like to aid in its solution by having unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD extracts from an article by Dr. J. De Witt Fox, first written for Your Life magazine by Dr. Fox and later reprinted in Life and Health magazine of Washington, D. C., of which Dr. Fox is the editor. The extracts from the article follow:

CAN A COUGH MEAN CANCER?

(By J. DeWitt FOX, M. D.)

SCIENCE HAS MADE GREAT STRIDES IN FIGHTING LUNG CANCER, BUT MUCH OF ITS SUCCESS DEPENDS UPON AN EARLY DIAGNOSIS

A well-dressed, gray-haired gentleman sat in a Chicago doctor's consultation room.

"What is your trouble?" his doctor asked.

"Doctor, this is perhaps a queer complaint, but my cigarettes don't agree with me," the patient replied. "When I smoke, I choke up with a dry, hacking cough. I have a cigarette cough which usually lasts a few days and then promptly disappears. During the past couple of weeks I've changed from one brand of cigarettes to another without relief."

"And you've cut down on your smoking, I suppose," his doctor interrupted.

"Oh, yes. As a matter of fact, this week I stopped smoking altogether. But I still have a cough."

The doctor reasoned to himself that here was a heavy-smoking businessman, now in his fifties—an age group prone to have cancer. He also knew that a cough—even an ordinary cigarette cough—can mean something serious.

An X-ray picture was taken of his chest. The doctor brought it into the darkened consultation room while it was still wet. He snapped on a blue-colored light in the viewing box and hung the X-ray before it.

"This is the pattern of the air passages, and this is lung tissue surrounding them," he explained. "Right here in the middle bronchus or air passage of the right lung is the cause of your so-called cigarette cough."

The doctor pointed to a haziness in the center of the film.

"You have a small tumor which must be removed," he continued cautiously.

Fortunately, this patient's alertness added years to his life. Because he consulted his physician at the first inkling of a chest condition—even though he suspected it to be nothing more serious than a protracted cigarette cough—an accurate diagnosis was made before cancer had gained a foothold. Modern surgery returned him to a happy and useful life after the successful removal of a lung cancer.

Cancer of the lungs is on the increase in the United States. A century ago, only 0.1 percent of primary cancers occurred in the lungs. Today, 1 out of every 10 cases of cancer is a lung cancer. Bronchiogenic or lung cancer is a disease for the man of the house to be aware of—85 percent occur in men. Only occasional cases are reported in women. Men past 40, and especially between 50 and 60 years of age, are the most susceptible.

The exact cause of lung cancer is still a medical mystery. Nevertheless, as in other forms of cancer, certain contributing factors have been discovered, which, if avoided, may reduce the prevalence of this disease. It is well known that chronic irritation predisposes to cancer. Chronic irritation coupled with some as yet unknown "X" factor mysteriously provokes normal body cells to grow wild. Cancer, then, is a disease of chronic irritation. That much we do know.

The respiratory passages of every city dweller are daily bombarded by a variety of noxious vapors: industrial fumes from oil or coal producing plants, abrasive dust such as silica and asbestos, factory smoke, asphalt road tars, and the ubiquitous automobile exhaust on every street and highway. All have been suggested as possible factors contributing to and important in the production of lung cancer. Some authorities feel that excessive smoking is important.

Dr. Alton Ochsner, professor of surgery at the Tulane University School of Medicine and one of the foremost authorities on lung cancer and its surgical treatment, has observed: "The fact that there is a parallelism between the number of cigarettes sold in the United States and the increased incidence of bronchiogenic (lung) cancer is interesting." That women do not smoke as much as men may possibly account for the lower rate of this disease in women.

"Of much more significance than smoking, it seems to me," says Dr. Charles S. Cameron, medical and scientific director of the American Cancer Society, "is the fact of the parallelism between cancer of the lung and urbanization. While this might be explained on the basis of more readily available diagnosis, one must not overlook the possibility of carcinogens in industrial smoke." Many States require factories to protect their employees from undue exposure to industrial fumes, smokes, and chemical agents known to invoke cancer.

However, at present, the greatest advances in curbing cancer have come in the field of public education. If you and I know the symptoms and quickly consult our physician, we give him a head start in fighting this disease. We should familiarize ourselves with the early signs and symptoms, and report immediately to our doctor should the slightest suggestion of a cancer symptom, whatever its nature, appear.

What are the symptoms of lung cancer? Be on the lookout for cough, sputum, and chest pain. These are the first signs. Later one may notice weight loss, coughing of blood, wheezing and shortness of breath after exertion such as climbing stairs. An episode of pneumonia or lung infection may be caused by cancer. And contrary to what most people believe, tuberculosis is not the commonest cause of pulmonary hemorrhage. Blood-streaked sputum or frank coughing of fresh blood is much more common to lung cancer.

Cough is a cardinal warning. More often than not, the smoking man assumes it is just a cigarette cough and that he'd better cut down a little. * * * Any cough lasting longer than 3 weeks deserves the study of your doctor.

The cough of lung cancer is usually a chronic dry hack. As sputum appears, it is white and glassy at first but may become yellowish or contain tiny flecks of white tissue. In later stages it may be pink and blood tinged. If you have a chronic expectoration, see your doctor.

Chest pain often accompanies, or follows, the chronic cough of lung cancer. * * * A feeling of tightness, as if one cannot get a full breath, is noted by some patients. And labored breathing on physical exertion—puffing after walking up hill for a short distance—is a sign. Coughing may produce such sharp pain that the patient will hold his chest in an effort to prevent it. * * * Pain usually indicates invasion of a pain-producing structure of the lung or spotty lung infection. Therefore, consult your physician at once if any chest pain appears.

Except for the skillful and detailed examination by your doctor, the X-ray is one of the most reliable single means of diagnosing lung cancer. * * * Bronchoscopy is a relatively new technique. * * * A small tube is passed into the bronchus. A light on the end of the tube makes it possible for the examining doctor to see tumors or irritation of the lining membranes of the air passages. * * * At the same time * * * small bits of tissue may be removed for microscopic examination. * * *

Newest of the techniques for diagnosing lung cancer is the cytologic examination of sputum and bronchial secretions, developed by Dr. George Nicholas Papanicolaou, pathologist of Cornell University School of Medicine. * * * It will be an added safeguard in cases where no tumor is seen by the bronchoscopist. * * *

The outlook for the lung cancer patient is one of hope. Prior to 15 years ago, according to Dr. Ochsner, no patient with bronchiogenic cancer was ever cured. Today, with the advances in diagnosis and modern surgery, patients are being cured and returned to useful lives. * * *

While thoracic surgery offers the best means of curing lung cancer, * * * doctors plead * * * for a chance to attain cures by operating at the optimum time—early.

To summarize what you can do to protect yourself against lung cancer:

1. Curb one of cancer's known causes—chronic irritation. Avoid all bronchial irritants: Industrial fumes and dust, chronic colds, and lung infections. Do not smoke.

2. Utilize all present knowledge in stemming the cancer tide. See your physician at the first symptom: Cough, sputum, chest pain. Beware of the earliest sign of lung cancer—the chronic cough. If you have a chronic cough, see your doctor today.

Government by Treaty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER
OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Government by Treaty," delivered by William H. Fitzpatrick, editor, New Orleans States, at the Young Men's Business Club meeting in New Orleans, La., on July 12, 1950, published in the August 1, 1950, issue of Vital Speeches of the Day.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNMENT BY TREATY—MANY OF OUR FREEDOMS AND RIGHTS WILL BE GIVEN UP

(By William H. Fitzpatrick)

I want to talk to you today about something that appears very far away at the moment, but is really just around the corner off Canal Street.

And that is a new concept of national legislative processes.

You people here have elected EDDIE HÉBERT and HALE BOGGS to Congress from the First and Second Congressional Districts for some years now. But do you know that in Washington today there is a definite legislative approach to domestic problems which, if adopted as its proponents plan, means that our Representatives might as well stay home and go fishing? What I am talking about is government by treaty.

The United States Constitution provides that the President, by and with the consent of the United States Senate, has the power to enter into treaties with foreign nations. If two-thirds of the Senate—present when the treaty comes to a vote, mind you, not necessarily two-thirds of the entire membership—votes to ratify a treaty, that treaty becomes the supreme law of the land, standing four-square with the United States Constitution where it does not conflict and standing equal with legislation passed by the National Congress.

At the same time all treaties supersede State laws, and all State constitutions, and all city and county and municipal law.

This is so, because the United States Constitution provides in article II, section 2, paragraph 2, that—

"He [the President] shall have power by and with the consent of the Senate to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur"—

And because article VI, section 2, provides that—

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

In other words, the President and Senate alone can act to repeal any State laws through the device of treaty enactment.

There is at present before the United States Senate such a treaty. It is called the Genocide Convention. If our Senate ratifies this treaty as it is written, it will nullify many State laws. I think all of you will agree that repeal of any State laws passed by State legislatures presumably close to the people they represent, ought not be repealed by means of a treaty conceived in the United Nations, no matter how worthy its conception.

For my part I think that the United States Constitution has provided us with a pretty fair set of governmental processes. Under it there are restraints placed upon the Executive in the form of the Congress; there are restraints placed upon the Congress in the shape of the Supreme Court, and there are restraints placed upon the Supreme Court in the Constitution itself.

The seeds of all our freedoms are in that Constitution. The many safeguards in it make any major changes in governmental processes necessarily slow. That is all to the good. It means that nothing is so immediate, no problems of government so great, that hasty legislation can be embodied in our national law and be assured of staying there to the later detriment, perhaps of all our people. I have in mind President Truman's thoughtless suggestion during 1946, that he be given powers to draft all striking railroad men and union officials into the Army. This bill passed the House unanimously. But to the credit of Senator Taft, the so-called labor baiter, it was held up in the Senate. I think all of us will agree in retrospect that that was hasty legislation, calculated to do the Nation harm, and that even if the Congress had passed it and Mr. Truman signed it that the Supreme Court would have found it unconstitutional.

I think you will agree with me that in this instance, at least, President Truman was very wrong and Senator TAFT was very right. For my part, I have found that distinction between the Democratic and Republican leaders more obvious more often than many others.

The Genocide Convention I mentioned earlier is the outgrowth of an international revulsion at the mass executions perpetrated on helpless people by Hitler.

To understand the problem completely, we must know what is being attempted. Just what is genocide? No one had ever heard the word until comparatively recently. It means race killing.

It goes without saying that no decent person can quarrel with the announced objectives of this convention—the outlawing of mass murder of a racial, religious, or ethnical group. The very word Buchenwald will live forever as a measure of the depths of mankind's degradation. And we might add Hiroshima, too. But let's look at this genocide convention.

Article I of the convention says:

"The contracting parties confirm that genocide, whether committed in time of peace or time of war, is a crime under international law which they undertake to prevent and to punish."

The nations which ratify this convention undertake these solemn duties:

To prevent genocide.

And to punish genocide.

We will be bound to prevent it and to punish it wherever it may appear in the world.

There are no constitutional restrictions on the power and duty of the President in executing this obligation. If it is ratified as a treaty it becomes the law of the land.

Where does this obligation begin and where does it end?

Its proponents say it ends at our own borders.

But spokesmen for the American Bar Association say that it may mean warfare.

Carl Rix—neither States Righter nor Dixiecrat—but a lawyer from Milwaukee, says:

"The prevention is anywhere in the world—the punishment of offenders is in the country of capture or apprehension until an international tribunal is set up for the purpose of consolidation of trials."

We marched into Korea to stop aggression, because we had to. Continued and successful aggression by Russia and her satellites could easily mean all of the world in chains.

As we all know, the Northern Korean Communists attacked without warning and without reason the Republic of South Korea. That is a war between one sovereign nation and a Russian satellite. We have to stop that sort of thing.

But would we be willing to commit American lives to stop a religious war between Shintoists and Buddhists in Korea if it should have occurred? Were you willing to send American troops to India to stop the warfare between Moslem and Hindu? Were you willing to send Americans abroad to stop the race riots in South Africa between natives and Indians? Are we to be committed to release of slave labor in Russia? To action against religious persecution in Russia's satellite countries?

We will be committed to these things should we ratify this Genocide Convention.

Article II reads:

"In the present convention, genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial, or religious group, as such:

(a) Killing members of the group;

(b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;

(c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;

(d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;

(e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

Genocide means race killing, and when properly defined it should be outlawed by every moral and legal means possible. But genocide as written in the convention doesn't only mean the killing of thousands or hundreds, for racial, religious, or national objections to groups; it can mean the slaying of one individual. Thus it invades domestic law. It comes into conflict with State homicide law.

And genocide is defined as, among other things, "causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of a group."

Now I am prepared to listen to any argument which can set forth when serious mental harm is serious, when it is harmful and when it is only mental. This seems to me to be not only an invasion of domestic legislation, it seems to me to be an invasion of the misty realms of psychiatry, persecution complexes and psychological fixations.

A year ago last March, the states printed a series of editorials on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. While generally accepted by lawmakers, attorneys, and students of constitutional government as a logical discussion of a serious question, the series was kissed off by emotionalists as inconsequential and a postured peering under the bed.

However, the declaration has now become an authority to be quoted in overthrowing domestic law of the states. When it was signed by our representatives in the United Nations in December 1948, it was characterized by Mrs. Roosevelt, its chief author, as "not a statement of law or of legal obligation."

We warned last year that the declaration, no matter in what guise it was clothed, was dangerous to our Constitution and Bill of Rights. We didn't think it would be used to nullify State law so soon.

But it has happened already in California. In a recent case there, a three-judge district court of appeal has declared the alien land law of California invalid because of the universal declaration of human rights and the United Nations Charter.

The law in question was passed in 1920 and forbade the acquisition of property in California by aliens ineligible for citizens.

The merits or demerits of the alien land law are not our concern. It was a California State statute. But what is of concern to all of us in every State was the reasoning of the three-judge court.

The court held that because we are signatories to the United Nations Charter, the Charter superseded the State law. The court held this opinion despite paragraph 7 of article 2 which plainly states:

"Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter * * *."

But the court reasons that the universal declaration of human rights implements and emphasizes the purposes and aims of the UN and its Charter and that the declaration affirms that "all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They should act toward one another in a spirit of brotherhood; everyone is entitled to all of the rights and freedoms set forth in this declaration, without distinction of any kind such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political, or other opinion, national or social, origin, property, birth or other status," and that "everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others."

If this decision is affirmed, the effect will be far-reaching more so than any of the critics of the declaration or the Charter ever dreamed. It will furnish a treaty basis without need of any other constitutional sanction for invalidation of State laws.

And since a valid treaty also supersedes existing Federal law, what will happen to our immigration and naturalization laws if this California ruling is upheld by the United States Supreme Court? The declaration says everyone has the right to seek and enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution (arts. 13 and 14).

The top 11 Communists were convicted of plotting violent overthrow of the Government in New York last year. What effect will this California ruling have in the future? The California court held that everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this declaration, without distinction of any kind such as * * * political or other opinion.

What happens when that political opinion includes a belief in the right to overthrow the Government by force?

A year ago last March we asked in the series of editorials on the declaration: Where Do We Go?

If the decision of the California court of appeals is upheld by the Supreme Court, the answer will be we're already there.

And that may be world-wide socialism with Uncle Sam paying the bills; nullification of Federal immigration laws and State statutes, and, finally, a totalitarian government which will void the United States Constitution and our cherished Bill of Rights.

And remember, please, that we have not even ratified any such human rights covenant. And despite Mrs. Roosevelt's assurances that it was not a statement of law or legal obligation, the California court so holds it.

In what case will we find ourselves should the Senate ratify the genocide convention?

It not only invades domestic law, it provides for the extradition of Americans for overseas trials should they be accused of having committed genocide in any other country. And proponents of the convention plan an international tribunal to try all Americans overseas, wherever the international court of justice might be sitting, for offenses which might have been committed in his own home. Will the safeguards surrounding accused Americans in this country be found in those trials? Or should we stop and take a long look at these proposals before we accept them as the law of the land?

I am against enactment of State and county and city and town legislation by the United Nations, no matter for what laudable purposes. It violates our legislative processes; it attempts to bypass our structure of government.

As I said before, the Constitution we live under is a wonderful document. It is not a static thing; it is a living, breathing way of life which is flexible enough to keep step with advancement and development of our people, even unto the welfare state or outright totalitarianism. The Constitution provides for changes—provided the people who live under it want changes.

Those of you who read the newspaper I work for will know that we oppose passage of civil rights bills. We oppose them because we think them wrong. But particularly we oppose them because of the manner in which they are being presented.

I think President Truman's FEPC is unconstitutional. But if the people over the Nation want an FEPC, they can get it in a constitutional way.

And that way is to amend the Constitution. Let Mr. Truman have his FEPC passed by the House and Senate as an amendment to the Constitution and then let it be presented to the States for ratification. If three-quarters of the States ratify it, it becomes embodied in the Constitution, and if three-quarters of the States ratify the FEPC, we'll pipe down.

The important decision before us in this Genocide Convention is whether we should not allow the United Nations to write domestic law through international treaties into our State and county laws.

That is the most important question of all.

What is the necessity of electing Representatives to the United States Congress every 2 years if, by action of a President's endorsement, and a two-thirds vote in the Senate, we can derogate or nullify statutes on the books or write new legislation, conceived in the United Nations, decided in the International Court of Justice in The Hague, and enforced in New Orleans?

It is a long step in the path to world government. Do Americans want, or are they ready for, world government?

It may be the only way to peace in the final analysis. But if we embark on that program, the American people ought to know about, and ought to agree to it and not be blindly led into it.

And that is what government by treaty will do, sooner or later. And in the turmoil of compromise, how many of our freedoms and rights will be given up so we can meet upon the common ground of legal, moral, and political mediocrity of so many of the other nations is something no one can foretell. Government by treaty is a dangerous approach, and if we wish to retain our freedom, and maintain our American concept of government, we have got to abandon that approach.

If you are for this approach, why write your Senators and tell them so. But don't tell HÉBERT or BOGGS what you're doing to the House. They might tell you what you're doing to America.

"My First Real Association With Our Great Secretary of Defense Was in the American Legion—To Me He Is the Most Sincere, Honest, and Capable Executive That Can Be Found Any Place in the World—He Has Always Endeavored To Assure Peace Through Armed Strength, Built Within the Capability of the American Economy"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, the radio, television, and press Monday evening carried news of an address made that day by one of the country's most zealous and capable public officials, a man respected by Democrats and Republicans alike, our hard-working Assistant Secretary of Defense, the Honorable Paul Griffith.

Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty agreement with every word that you yourself spoke in that great talk which you made in Texas last Monday.

You and I know that these are political dog days—days when some of those who are among us yap and bark at the heels of their opponents and seemingly would sell their very souls either to gain national publicity or for the benefit of a few dubious votes in their home districts.

As I heretofore stated, the news commentators, press as well as air, in telling of the lucid, factual, and understandable talk made on Korea, emphasized the confidence expressed and strong support which Paul Griffith gave to the work of the Honorable Louis Johnson—in telling of the untold benefits which had been achieved by Louis Johnson in behalf of our national defense.

It was because of the comments which I had heard on Monday night that I contacted the Assistant Secretary's office and asked that they furnish me with a copy of Mr. Griffith's talk and I am gratified indeed that I obtained it.

Mr. Speaker, millions of words have been spoken and written on what has happened and what is happening in Korea—and by some whom we presume to speak informatively and with authority—but I have never seen set down, black on white, such a short, terse, concise, factual, and statistical recitation as to just what it was that gave rise to the presence of our troops in Korea and as to just what had been accomplished by our armed services in these last few weeks against which at times must have seemed unsurmountable odds.

Paul Griffith's address was made on the occasion upon which the American Legion notified Mr. Charles F. Johnson, Jr., nationally known industrialist and philanthropist, citizen and patriot, that he had been awarded the National American Legion Distinguished Service Medal award.

At that ceremony Mr. Griffith spoke in behalf of the national executive committee of the Legion and it was indeed appropriate that in his dual capacity of a past commander of the Legion and a high-ranking official concerned with the Nation's defenses that he should give expression as to the nature of the defense of these United States and, as of this hour both at home and abroad, as well as that time that the troops of the United Nations moved into Korea.

Mr. Speaker, his address was exactly the kind of a talk that you would expect from Paul Griffith. It was fearless, simple, honest, sincere, capable, and marked him well as the trusted public official that he has proven himself to be.

I do not have to tell you, sir, of the tremendous confidence that the great preponderance of the membership of both Houses have in public officials like Paul Griffith and his Defense Chief, Louis Johnson, and that so long as we have men like these in public office I know that our Nation is safe from enemy attack no matter from what quarter our security might be violated.

Mr. Speaker, for some days past we have been hearing some expression of doubt with respect to the adequacy of our defense preparation. I know that it was no accident that Paul Griffith took as his theme for his talk "What Korea Has Taught Us." In that talk, and without fear, he turned the pitiless searchlights of publicity on to the very truth of that subject, and made such a full, candid, and frank statement about the same that all fair, impartial, and judicious minds will continue to afford the moral and political support to our great Secretary of Defense in carrying out the tremendous task that he has in hand.

Mr. Speaker, let me quote but one short paragraph from Mr. Griffith's talk wherein he declared:

> I am proud to be associated at this critical time with our great Secretary of Defense. My first real association with him was in the American Legion, when he was national commander and I was commander of the Department of Pennsylvania. I have been associated with him in many capacities since that time, and I want you to know that he is the most sincere, honest, and capable executive that can be found any place in the world. His plan from the very beginning of his administration has been to assure peace through strength, and he has endeavored to build that strength within the capability of the American economy. He still believes that even in this time of crisis we should not tolerate waste and extravagance. Recently, in his appearance before the Congress, he expressed this idea—and I quote—"this determination to get the maximum return on the defense dollar will continue to govern our activities."

In order that all may have the opportunity to read a great statement on a topic of national interest, made by one great American in which he evaluates another great American who is the driving force in that project, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the speech made by the Honorable Paul Griffith, Assistant Secretary of Defense, at Johnson City, N. Y.

The talk was as follows:

My good friends of Johnson City, I am glad to be back here again. It gives me fresh inspiration to return to this valley of cooperative people. And you are cooperative people. The miracle of industrial relations associated with the name of Endicott-Johnson proves you are cooperative people. I can say this without detracting from the well-known Johnson genius for industrial relationship. I am sure the Johnsons, past and present, would be the first to agree that the relationship existing here between management and employees to the continuing surprise of the industrial world, depends largely upon cooperation.

I likewise am honored by the privilege of participating in your tribute to Mr. Charles F. Johnson, Jr., as the recipient of the national American Legion distinguished service medal award.

On previous visits to Johnson City I came as a representative of the American Legion. It was my privilige to meet Mr. Johnson. I found him an enlightened and unselfish man. I found him more than a stanch advocate of Legion programs for the common welfare. I found him a vigorous worker in their behalf. Indeed, Mr. Johnson has gone still further. He has, in effect, instituted and carried out his own program of cooperation with the American Legion. I am sure you all know how he has spent his own time, energy, and money in behalf of disabled servicemen; that he has sponsored and helped finance the building of three Legion clubhouses; that he has offered training and employment opportunities to returning servicemen and that in a host of other ways has aided the men who have defended this country.

Naturally you are proud that the national executive committee of the American Legion has awarded him its distinguished service medal. So am I. You are here today to let him know that this honor pleases you. I can join you sincerely in saying this world would be a better place to live in if there were more Charles Johnsons here and there.

At any time or on any occasion, I would be happy to be with this vast group of people who have demonstrated that they are cooperative people. But today, I have a special reason for being grateful for this privilege. That is because I have something quite definite and, I believe, quite vital to say about cooperation. I know it will be best understood by you who have demonstrated your willingness and ability to cooperate—you who know the necessity and the value of cooperation.

As you all know, there have been rapid and sinister changes in world affairs in the last 10 weeks. Events have taken place which offer new and more menacing threats to freedom everywhere. They started with an unprovoked Communist attack on the Republic of South Korea the morning of June 24, our time. They continued when the North Korean invaders defied a United Nations demand to withdraw north of the 38th parallel. They took a still graver turn when President Truman thrilled the freedom-loving world by his quick decision to support the United Nations' demand with our Armed Forces.

Since that world-shaking decision we have had every reason to renew our pride and faith in our soldiers, our marines, our airmen, and our sailors. We have had every evidence of their valor and of the soundness of their training.

At the outset of the Korean campaign, troops were desperately needed to slow the invaders of the South Korean Republic. They were so desperately needed that General MacArthur risked committing his forces piecemeal. That was something no commander will ever do if there is any alternative. In this case there was none.

So one battalion of infantry was flown from Japan to South Korea. Our men tumbled from their planes and engaged the invaders of a free country. This was the beginning of one of the most superb delaying actions in the history of American arms. Our men were reinforced as rapidly as possible. They fought, retired, stood and fought again. Meanwhile the South Koreans put up a terrific and gallant fight. Standing together, the United Nations ground forces—Americans and South Koreans—have accomplished their initial mission. They have prevented South Korea from being overrun in a few days. They have retained the necessary beachhead from which to launch the counteroffensive which eventually will sweep the invading Communists from the territory of free men.

For the men concerned this fight has been as tough as anything Americans have ever tackled. They have stood and fought and died in battles just as fierce, if somewhat less orthodox, than the more celebrated engagements of our history. They have our warmest tribute.

It is sometimes hard to realize that South Korea was invaded only 10 weeks ago. So much has happened in so short a time. Great deeds of valor have been added to our long history of valiant deeds. New sorrows have been mingled with older griefs. New apprehensions throughout the world have been heaped upon older apprehensions.

In fact, so much has happened in so short a time that it has been difficult to follow all these events, understand them all, and give them proper evaluation. In proof of this let me cite the millions upon millions of words which have been written or spoken—often conflicting—to explain what "Korea has taught us." Some of these commentaries have been sane and intelligent. Others have been sad examples of muddled thinking, wide departures from logic, or immature exhibitions of personal dislike. Still others have been nothing more nor less than examples of the great old American game of finding a goat. It's a game that goes like this: in case of tornado, earthquake, flood, prairie fire, infestations of grasshoppers, or armed aggression, quickly find someone to blame. You may elect the political party you don't belong to, or the church you don't attend, your Congressman, or a convenient business rival. Any of these will do.

This game is like neglecting to send for the fire department when your house is burning until you have proved a charge of arson against someone. The worse features of this approach are that you rarely nominate the right victim, and you never solve your problem.

I hope that all of us here today realize that the events of recent weeks have created a situation as grave as any, to say the least, that we have faced in our eventful history. I hope that we all realize, too, that it is a situation that demands the clarity of thought that leads to sane action on the part of all of us.

Now, as in all other fateful times, this situation must be met with unity—unity of thought; unity of action, the unity which multiplies our strength. I am certain that unity and faith in our Government's steps to meet this situation, so greatly needed in times of stress, will be displayed by you men and women who are so familiar with the fruits of unity—or, if you prefer, cooperative action. I am sure that you can be counted upon to inspire the support and confidence of the thousands of others with whom you associate in your ordinary walks of life.

I am sure, too, that you will keep from being engulfed in the whirlpool of confused thinking which so often follows in the wake of fast-moving events of far-reaching importance. This type of thinking leads more often than not to actions or proposals or demands which are unwise if not actually detrimental. It often creates an atmosphere in which many are prone to forget that strength lies in unity; that calm judgment must not be overthrown by hysteria and that tried politics must not be junked for fantastic schemes. It creates an atmosphere in which many forget that faith must be maintained in, and all-out support given to, constituted leadership.

Disunity, ill-considered action, lack of confidence in our Government and its officials, panic—all these are among the conditions and states of mind Communist propagandists have fruitlessly attempted to establish in this country for the past quarter of a century. I want to warn you with all the emphasis at my command that we should guard against creating, ourselves, the very conditions and states of mind the Communists so long have vainly tried to produce by subversive propaganda.

I would like you to join me for a moment or two in a more detailed consideration of recent events so that we can calmly weigh their significance, appraise fairly what we have done about them, and look ahead at what we are preparing to do. To do this, we might start with that somewhat overworked topic, What Korea Has Taught Us, and work out our own impartial conclusions.

One conclusion I would like to state in the words of President Truman. He said, I quote, "The attack upon Korea makes it plain beyond all doubt that communism has passed beyond the use of subversion to conquer independent nations and will now use armed invasion and war. It has defied the orders of the Security Council of the United Nations to preserve international peace and security."

In making it plain beyond a doubt that they are prepared to use armed force to subject free nations, the Communists have resolved a perplexing dilemma; it is a dilemma which has confronted the Department of Defense since its creation; it has confronted the Congress which is constitutionally responsible for the defense of the country, the Commander in Chief, and all the people of the United States.

That dilemma has been, to state it briefly, how much weight should be given to purely military considerations in defense preparedness and how much should be given to economic considerations; or as it was expressed by Chairman GEORGE MAHON in supporting the House Appropriation Committee's recommended military budget for 1950—and I quote—"If war comes soon, we are appropriating too little. If we have miscalculated the dangers, if the threat of war is just a deceptive mirage on the horizon, we are appropriating too much * * *."

By armed aggression, the Communists have resolved the dilemma in favor of military considerations. In view of the actual fighting taking place in Korea, economic considerations have been largely outweighed. As a result, the President has asked for a supplemental appropriation of $11,642,906,000 for the immediate expansion of our Military Establishment. He has asked for an additional $4,000,000,000 for military aid to other free nations.

Of course, some of the requested appropriation is to insure a favorable outcome of the Korean operation. However, the general expansion of our military strength, now rapidly in progress, is in preparation for further acts of armed aggression which the invasion of the Korean Republic indicated may be expected. The President's intention to increase our military strength with considerable rapidity must be regarded as the speeding up of a military policy of strength building which has long been in progress.

Incidentally, I lay no claim to being a prophet. But for the sake of you who may have heard that the strength-building policy of the Department of Defense has not been intentionally flexible—intentionally responsive to current circumstances, I would like to quote a statement I made to an audience many months ago. It goes like this:

"In the Department of Defense we maintain a continuous and unrelenting review of the plans we make and the things we are doing to defend this country. * * * These reviews are the outgrowth of full realization that in this rapidly changing world—rapid in its scientific as well as its political changes—that a good plan or procedure last Tuesday might be more than slightly out of date by next Friday, so to speak."

Before leaving the supplemental budget request, I would like to note that in fiscal 1947, only 6 cents out of every military budget dollar could be spent for tanks, ships, aircraft, weapons, ammunition, and other heavy items. This was due to the burden of liquidation costs of World War II and to heavy overhead. It is worth noting that we were able to use 19.5 cents on the dollar for hardware in the fiscal year that ended in June of this year, in part at least because of a reduction in overhead. About 59 cents out of every dollar asked by the President in the supplemental appropriation will go for this vital hardware.

The appropriation also will provide for a total of 2,100,000 men and women in our Army, Navy and Air Force. In this expansion, the Marines will be increased 90 percent. This money will provide for the calling up of a number of reservists, and the mobilization of needed National Guard units.

It might be well to remember that the appropriations requested are only for the partial mobilization which is deemed advisable at this time by the President and his military advisors. It is easy to see that even partial mobilization will throw a burden upon the country which can be met only through a willingness to sacrifice and a willingness to cooperate.

Returning again to our theme, "What Korea Has Taught Us," I want to draw a second and highly important conclusion. It is that our action in Korea has clearly demonstrated the absolute soundness of the major concepts upon which our military policy has been based since the establishment of the Department of Defense. The truth of this conclusion is too important to our future welfare to let it be obscured by any amount of foggy thinking and lose talking.

These concepts, briefly stated, are:

That we must maintain an armed force in a high state of readiness, prepared to heap dreadful retaliation on any enemy which might attack us.

That we must maintain an armed force capable of quick expansion in time of emergency.

That we must get the greatest amount of defense for every dollar spent.

That unification is a necessary means for achieving these ends.

It is of utmost importance that the public be given a full understanding that these major concepts have been proved sound by the affair in Korea. This understanding is essential inasmuch as it must be the basis of confidence in what already has been done to defend this country, and in the further steps which are now being taken. And it is this calm, studied confidence that will give us the unity we must have.

As to the state of readiness of our forces, let me offer the testimony of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, commander of the United Nations forces in Korea. I quote from his message of July 20 to our Commander in Chief:

"I do not believe that history records a comparable operation which excelled the speed and precision with which the Eighth Army, the Far East Air Force, and the Seventh Fleet have been deployed to a distant land for immediate commitment to major operations. It merits the highest commendation for the commanders, staffs and units concerned and attests to their superior training and high state of readiness to meet any eventuality. This finds added emphasis in the fact that the Far East Command, until the President's great pronouncement to support the epochal action of the United Nations, had no slightest responsibility for the defense of the free Republic of Korea. With the President's decision it assumed a completely new and added mission."

If any further evidence of our state of readiness is needed, we have it from Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Chief of Staff of the United States Army. I quote from his report to the President after visiting the front:

"Our far eastern forces were organized and equipped primarily to perform peaceful occupation duties in Japan. However, under General MacArthur's magnificent leadership, they have quickly adapted themselves to meet the deliberately planned attack of the North Korean Communist forces, which are well-equipped, well-led, and battle-trained, and which have at times outnumbered our troops by as much as 20 to 1."

In his report to the President, General Collins described the action of our troops as "a splendid tribute to the ability of our Armed Forces to convert quickly from the peaceful duties of occupation to the grim duties of war." The highly skillful fashion in which our garrison troops, with no prior responsibility for the defense of the Republic of Korea, were able to fight this historic delaying action, must be regarded as further tribute to their high state of readiness.

It is true, of course, that nothing about the Korean affair has made it necessary for us to demonstrate our state of readiness to deliver a paralyzing retaliatory blow at any foe who may attack this country. By the same token, there is nothing about the Korean affair to suggest that we cannot deliver such a blow.

Despite this conclusive evidence of our troops' high state of readiness, misunderstanding of the Korean affair still lingers in the public mind. One indication of this is the oft-repeated statement, "we were unprepared for Korea."

It is quite true that we did not have close at hand an armed force of sufficient strength to crush immediately the invasion of South Korea. There is nothing particularly remarkable about this. In fact, it would have been more remarkable if we had. As General MacArthur pointed out, our troops in Japan had no responsibility for the defense of South Korea. Why they were given this emergency assignment which they have so well discharged was made clear by President Truman in his message to the Congress on July 19. I now qoute the President:

"I think it is important that the nature of our military action in Korea be understood. It should be made perfectly clear that the action was undertaken as a matter of basic moral principle. The United States was going to the aid of a nation established and supported by the United Nations and unjustifiably attacked by an aggressor force. Consequently, we were not deterred by the relative immediate superiority of the attacking forces, by the fact that our base of supplies was 5,000 miles away, or by the further fact that we would have to supply our forces through port facilities that are far from satisfactory."

It might be well to observe at this point that stretching diagonally across Asia and Europe for thousands on thousands of miles is a Communist borderland. Along it, inspired acts of armed aggression already have transpired or might be expected at any time the Communists choose. No nation on earth could be prepared to crush quickly any of these actual or potential acts of armed aggression. No single nation could possibly maintain a military establishment strong enough and widely enough dispersed. In the case of Korea, it was fortunate for free nations that the Communists chose as their objective of armed aggression a theater where we had troops close at hand for an entirely different purpose than throwing back armed invaders of a neighboring country. But it must be remembered that whether we had maintained 10 or 100 trained divisions in the United States, our first units would have faced the same necessity of fighting a delaying action until reinforcements could arrive. We are without assurance, too, that maintenance of 100 divisions in continental United States would have deterred the invasion of Korea.

As I said a little while ago, one of the major concepts about which our military policy has been integrated was the need for developing an Armed Force which would be readily and quickly expandable in time of emergency. The proof of our success in this part of our preparedness efforts may be found in the ease with which we have been—for many days now—absorbing new men, individually, and civilian components as units into our forces, and the advanced state of preparedness for procuring additional tanks, aircraft, and other "hardware" needed for our expansion.

It is safe to say that few Americans, if any, doubt the necessity of military expansion at an accelerated rate, regardless of cost. However, it should be a source of pleasure to the taxpayer that the cost in dollars will not be so great as would be the case if we had not, in months past, learned to get the greatest amount of defense for every dollar spent. Indeed, if this emergency had arisen not too long ago, many of the dollars which now can be spent for planes and tanks and guns and ships would have gone into useless overhead. This situation is not accidental. It was brought about by earnest work of Secretary of Defense Johnson.

Incidentally, I am proud to be associated at this critical time with our great Secretary of Defense. My first real association with him was in the American Legion, when he was national commander and I was commander of the Department of Pennsylvania. I have been associated with him in many capacities since that time and I want you to know that he is the most sincere, honest, and capable executive that can be found any place in the world. His plan from the very beginning of his administration has been to assure peace through strength and he has endeavored to build that strength within the capability of the American economy. He still believes that even in this time of crisis we should not tolerate waste and extravagance. Recently in his appearance before the Congress he expressed this idea—and I quote—"this determination to get the maximum return on the defense dollar will continue to govern our activities."

It is possible that many of you here have heard me one time or another advocate the virtues of unification of the Armed Forces. That advocacy no longer is necessary. Unification beyond any previous experience flowered in the Armed Forces with the invasion of Korea.

The action of our land, naval, and air forces under General MacArthur is one example of it. The President's recommendations to the Congress had the complete support and concurrence of all civilian and military leaders in the Defense Department. The benefit of unification in an emergency has been further exemplified by the quick decisions which have been possible in recent weeks to coordinate the combat efforts of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force.

I'm sure it is apparent that our military policy has been developed around sound concepts; that our Military Establishment has been organized to provide a sound mobilization base in case of war.

Those who recognize these facts will have the firm assurance that never before in time of peace have we been better prepared to defend ourselves. They will have calm assurance that we are moving with a sure, swift tread along the charted path to greater strength. They will readily receive a suggestion I have to make. It is that all of the citizens of the United States become, like the Armed Forces, unified in their determination to support the President's program for greater defense. It is, as he has said, a program by which we hope to avert an all-out war.

Address by Archbishop Cushing to Ancient Order of Hibernians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAT McCARRAN

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article from the Boston Pilot of August 5, 1950, concerning an address by his excellency Archbishop Cushing, and containing the text of that address. The address was delivered before the sixty-fifth biennial national convention of the Ancient Order of Hibernians on August 3, 1950.

This address by Archbishop Cushing is extremely timely and interesting. The Archbishop has a deep sense of the importance of true Christianity in guiding us through the troubled times in which we find ourselves, and has expressed his thoughts on this subject in a way which I feel sure many of my colleagues will find inspiring.

In his address the archbishop also touched upon several other matters, including the destiny of Ireland, and the so-called Fogarty bill, which denounces the use of Marshall-plan funds to support the Northern Ireland partition government, and with which I believe some of my colleagues may be familiar.

Because of the timeliness and the inspirational quality of Archbishop Cushing's address, I now ask unanimous consent that this article may be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HYPOCRISY BARS IRELAND FROM UN, CHARGES PRELATE—EXCLUSION OF NATION FROM WORLD ORGANIZATION IS OUTRIGHT FRAUD

Predicting that those of this generation will never again live in a peacetime economy, His Excellency, Archbishop Cushing, addressed the sixty-fifth biennial national convention of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and Auxiliary at a pontificial mass celebrated at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, marking the opening of the Boston conclave.

Disturbed at the world situation, Archbishop Cushing said: "I do not know whether it will be a cold or bloody war. I cannot forsee. * * * In World War I and in World War II we fought to bring peace to the world. Our expectations have not been fulfilled.

"Paganism is rampant here and elsewhere. In Korea the flower of our manhood is dying in agony."

In lighter vein His Excellency referred to his pilgrimage to Rome and in presenting his impressions of ocean travel quoted from the famous lines from Mr. Dooley. He told the delegates of his plans to continue aboard ship the recitation of the Rosary.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED

Urging the passing of the Fogarty bill, No. 720, which denounces the use of Marshall-plan money to support the Northern Ireland partition government, the resolutions committee submitted proposals which were adopted by the convention.

Among the resolutions passed were those declaring allegiance to the Constitution of the United States and spiritual allegiance to the sovereign pontiff; renewed denunciation of communism not only in Russia and its satellite states but in every place in the world.

The committee warned the State Department of the current danger declaring "the Department seemed to have shown an inclination to support the admission of Communist China into the UN", and reiterated "the terrible consequences which would be sure to result for such a betrayal of Christianity."

MEMORIAL MASS

Rev. Michael J. Houlihan, State chaplain, and pastor of St. Patrick's Church, Watertown, celebrated a mass for deceased members on Wednesday morning at Our Lady of Victories Church, Boston.

Delegates and members of the convention attended a moonlight sail on Wednesday evening. Concluding the sessions was the annual banquet at the Hotel Statler on Thursday evening at which Archbishop Cushing was principal speaker. Serving as toastmaster was Paul E. Tierney and Miss Mary A. Curran was chairman.

ARCHBISHOP'S ADDRESS

His excellency's address follows:

"While I am speaking of prayers, there is another plea that I would like to make to this convention. Last spring at the annual dinner meeting of our Eire Society, a Boston group which has done so much to serve the cultural interests of the Irish everywhere, I spoke of Blessed Oliver Plunket. My remarks were taken up by the Irish press and apparently reproduced wherever there are Irishmen in the world, which means in every-corner of the globe. I was particularly pleased to receive a message from the venerable and beloved Primate of All Ireland, the Archbishop of Armagh, who told me that my few words concerning Blessed Plunket had increased the hope that the eventual canonization of the great Irish martyr may be the sooner.

"I certainly rejoice if such be the case. The Archibshop asked me to renew whenever appropriate the plea I made to the Eire Society. I gladly do so at this time.

"IRISH PILGRIMAGE

"Last fall we went to Ireland on a great 'Come Back to Erin' pilgrimage. We visited many beloved spots in the Isle of Saints and Scholars, but none more profoundly moved me than did the modest shrine in great Saint Peter's Church, Drogheda, where the head of Blessed Oliver Plunket is preserved for veneration.

"It is surprising to reflect on how little people outside Ireland appear to appreciate the tremendous stature and historic significance of this great archbishop, patriot, and personality. It would, I think, be most appropriate if the Hibernians would interest itself in the cause of Blessed Plunket.

"My purpose in suggesting such a reawakened interest is not to recall the injustices of the past nor otherwise to inflame partisan or political sentiments in the present. Quite the contrary. It is no longer necessary to rehearse the travesty of justice which was his trial nor the incredible barbarities which accompanied his execution.

"TRUE CHRISTIAN

"My purpose would rather be to present Blessed Oliver Plunket as an outstanding example of what the true Christian should be at all times and as a symbol of the spirit in which the true Irishman seeks the interests of his nation.

"As a Christian, Blessed Plunket was kindly and considerate. He was humble in his great learning. He was assiduous in the fulfillment of the duties of his state in life. He was filled with a holy peace and he saw all events of life in a completely spiritual perspective. Few men in history have accepted injustice and even a brutally unjust death with such magnificent dignity and devout resignation.

"He was a martyr for his faith. So far as we may use the word, he was also a martyr for Ireland. But his love for Ireland, it must be noted, did not make him the enemy of any other land. On the contrary, Blessed Plunket exemplifies the truly Catholic spirit in which differences between nations must always be resolved no matter what the previous history of injustice or of bitterness on either side.

"We in America who have Irish blood in our veins, Irish hearts in our bosoms, whose Christian souls are in bodies with Irish nerves and Irish temperaments, have also much to learn from the Irish example of Blessed Oliver Plunket. We have a lesson to learn from him concerning the spirit of resolute, intrepid blended faith and charity with which we must help America meet her obligations in the international community. The spirit of Blessed Plunket impels us to meditate soberly and prayerfully the wise words with which our Holy Father, the Pope, last week renewed his plea for peaceful methods of settling international disputes so long as such methods are humanly possible.

"WAR FOR PEACE SAKE

"In the spirit of Blessed Plunket we shall continue to abhor war even when it is forced upon us. We shall continue to ask that the arts of peace be employed in the effort to restore or establish order. But we shall not be cowards if traitors at home or abroad compel us instead to practice the science of war. If we be forced to wage war, it will not be war for the sake of that violence which is the Red's objective. It will be war in accordance with the patient principle which alone inspires the Christian when finally he takes up his arms. We go to war, as St. Augustine said, for the sake of peace, to preserve it where it still survives, to restore it where it has been destroyed.

"So, too, we Americans of Irish descent should be guided by the spirit of Blessed Plunket in the sympathetic interest we naturally take in the affairs of old Ireland across the sea.

"SPIRITUAL TIES

"There has never been any question of our dividing civic loyalty between our American fatherland and the motherland of our people. The ties which unite us with Ireland are sentimental and dominantly spiritual. They are entirely consistent with unqualified American patriotism. Our interest in Irish affairs is the interest of kinsmen in the fortunes of their physical and spiritual relatives. It is on the level of affections and prayers, not the level of politics, intrigue, or sabotage. There is no resemblance, for example, between it and the interest of Bundists in the military aspirations of their fatherland. It certainly bears no resemblance whatsoever to the treacherous interest of American fellow-travellers, parlor pinks, and like disloyalists in the affairs of the Soviet. These ladies and gentlemen appear, at least as they reveal themselves in their disloyalty trials or espionage cases, to be thoroughly emancipated from any spiritual values such as constitute the chief tie between the Irish throughout the world and Old Ireland. One finds in them scant trace of the sentiment or the poetry which ties hearts like yours to the lands of your ancestors.

"The love of our people for Hibernia has prompted them to greater, not lesser service to America. Only in song has Ireland ever asked her sons and daughters to "Come Back to Erin." In reality, she has always encouraged them to take their places in the communities which gave them place, retaining for Ireland only the affection of pious hearts and the gratitude of prayerful children.

"MEANING OF RELIGION

"Forty years ago an American writer of our own country as an example of this Irish quality of strengthening with God's grace the land which gives them shelter said: 'This vast continent affords a most striking proof of what religion means to the Irish people. Count the colleges, schools, academies, hospitals, and asylums of charity that have sprung up as if by magic all over the land, and tell me is there anything that speaks more eloquently to the heart than the faith that inspired such unselfish devotion. Religion as a name is useless; it is only precious for what it enables us to be and to do. It is religion that has made the Irish people what they are. It has made them just toward others, lovers of order and progress, firm in the support of just authority, and courageous in resistance to lawless tyranny. No state can thrive without such virtuous citizens, and no country can be hopelessly lost that has the happiness of possessing them.'

"What Ireland's inspiration has brought into American national life, it once brought into the universal life of Christendom. Every scholar knows the part the land of our fathers played in the Dark Ages, when once before the unity of Europe had crumbled under the attack of barbarians and the new glorious unity that was medieval Christendom was being forged by Christian apostles, so many of them Irish by birth. It may well be that once again holy Ireland is destined to play a civilizing and spiritualizing role in our divided and distraught international community, a role like to that which she played centuries ago.

"DESTINY OF IRELAND

"In this connection I recall a prophetic word uttered with regard to the Irish people. Nearly 300 years ago a papal nuncio sent to Ireland by the Pope wrote back to Rome these words: 'Ireland may yet become an outwork of the faith to Europe and its herald to America.' Ladies and gentlemen, you are living in days which have seen this prophecy on the verge of fulfillment. Ireland has become an outwork of the faith to Europe, has been and is its herald to America. The Irish people, wherever they may be, are the champions of Christianity in a world menaced by Asiatic communism; they are foremost among those who, in the Old World and the New, are unswervingly committed to the traditions of western civilization and Catholic Christianity which once gave origin, meaning and purpose to our democracy and which can once again guarantee democracy's survival.

"The enemies of faith and freedom, of democracy and Christianity, well know the devotion of the Irish people to the basic principles of western civilization. That explains their desire to embarrass Ireland whenever possible, to keep Ireland out of the councils of the world, to 'veto' her admittance to international organizations. By such action Ireland's critics pay tribute to her integrity and reveal the malice of their own designs. By their action they confirm our conviction that Ireland, today as of yore, is the champion of light against darkness, of the things of the spirit against those of the flesh.

"INTERNATIONAL CRIME

"It seems profoundly significant, as well as bitterly ironic, that we should have read in the newspapers the other day an announcement concerning a group of volunteers from the Republic of Ireland, a republic excluded from the United Nations, who expressed their desire to fight by the side of American troops under the American flag, the United Nations, or any flag in beating back the Red raiders on Korea—while the same newspapers reported to us the devices and dodges by which nations high in the Councils of the United Nation still seek to avoid their responsibility in helping overcome the violence instigated by the Red regime whose representative is to preside over the deliberations of the United Nations Council this month—and whose representatives consistently and successfully object to the admittance into the United Nations of a genuine democracy, a duly constituted republic, and a Christian nation like Ireland.

"There is no point in attempting to understand the hypocrisy which debars Ireland from her proper place in the international community. I reaffirm my long standing conviction that such action bears witness both to Ireland's integrity and to the fraudulent purposes of nations which unite in outlawing the Irish Republic, while making common cause with the Red regimes in Yugoslavia, Hungary, Poland, Lithuania, and the Soviet Republics subject to Moscow. The exclusion of Ireland from international organization is a fraud, a fraud which, as events are proving, will redound enormously to Ireland's good name.

"So, too, our sympathetic interest in the fate of our kinsmen impels us to brand as a further fraud the reasons alleged for the continued partition of Ireland. The reasons offered are familiar. I need not rehearse them. Their wording changes according as the hypocrites who profit from the division shift their line to meet the exposure of their fraudulence.

"No one will ever be able to understand why Americans, whose President gave the highest and most authoritative expression to the principle of national self-determination, should be so slow to speak up in behalf of Ireland's national self-determination. No one will ever be able to understand why Americans, who talk so much about the necessity for religious tolerance, should espouse in effect the cause of the Orangemen who hold religious tolerance in unconcealed contempt as against the cause of the Irish whose undeniable record of religious tolerance is by all odds the fairest record of any nation in our day, our own not excepted. There is no Irish Catholic equivalent of the Ku Klux Klan, not even in reprisal. There is no Irish equivalent of the Orangemen nor of organizations like Protestants and others united.

"REPORT OF MINISTERS

"Last week I read in a news magazine a report filed by a group of protestant ministers concerning what they were pleased to call 'violations of religious freedom' in carefully selected areas of the world. I later read that some of their own leaders, lay and clerical, had repudiated the report for the specious 'phoney' that it is. But, nonetheless it is typical of the kind of talk heard whenever one asks why a world so sensitive to discrimination elsewhere is so silent concerning the unparalleled discrimination by which an Irish minority in Ulster is virtually disenfranchised, while the overwhelming majority of the Irish people are denied self-determination of their own nation by the Orange minority in the six counties.

"The fraudulent report of the ministers speaks of Ireland as one place where religious liberty is allegedly denied. For one wild moment it looked as if a truthful phrase had blossomed by chance in their report and that the ministers were referring to northern Ireland, where religious persecution, coupled with economic and social discrimination on a strictly religious basis, has been and is the normal state of affairs.

"But no. Come to find out, the report referred to the Irish Republic—and the protestant government in Ulster was given a clean bill of health.

"Seumas MacManus said the final word on this hypocrisy over 30 years ago when he wrote: 'While such an idea as a Catholic mayor for protestant Derry and protestant Belfast is laughably absurd, such Catholic cities as Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Kilkenny, often honor protestant citizens by making them their first magistrates. And while the idea of a Catholic member of parliament sitting for any of the protestant counties of the northeast is ludicrously laughable, purely Catholic counties in both north and south frequently elect protestants to represent them in parliament.

" 'And finally, and above all, be it remembered that almost every man whom the Irish Catholics chose as their national leader from the days of Robert Emmet to the days of Charles Stuart Parnell, has been Protestant.'

"There is bigotry in Ireland—bigotry of the most intolerant, most rampant, type—but it is almost entirely confined to non-Catholics of the Brito-Irish part of the population.

"The recent report of the ministers reminds us again of the old couplet:

" 'Forgiveness to the injured doth belong,
They ne'er forgive who do the wrong.'

"FRAUDULENT ARGUMENTS

"The other arguments advanced in favor of partition are equally fraudulent. Only a hypocrite would present them; only a fool would believe them. This is so much the case, that I cannot believe partition can endure unless hypocrisy and folly are forever to gain the day. When common sense, common decency, and the voice of Christian conscience are again heard in international affairs, sheer logic will put an end to the farce of partition. No violent words need be spoken; no rebel shot need be fired; no involved diplomatic formulas need be devised or invoked.

"That is why the defenders of partition are the only ones who are talking wildly these days. Our kinsmen, the Irish, are presenting the case against partition with reasoned dignity and Christian calm. The railing, the rudeness, and the vulgarity are all on the other side. Witness the bad-mannered, ill-considered attack of the Christian Science Monitor, for example, on the pronouncement here in Boston and elsewhere of His Excellency, the recently appointed Ambassador of Ireland to the United States. The Monitor departed from its customary pose of impartial objectivity in an attempt to render absurd the statesman-like declaration of Mr. Hearne concerning the determination of the Irish people to achieve their national unity and their determination to achieve it without violence.

" 'National unity is the chief aim of the Irish people,' the ambassador said. 'The whole soil of Ireland is the property and domain of the whole Irish people of today.

" 'Those who will tell you it is a complicated problem and plead for a division are as false as the woman who wanted to solve the problem of ownership of a little child in King Solomon's day by cutting it into two pieces.

" 'We want unity, but we also want peace. We are determined to achieve unity without a civil war.'

"UNITED IRELAND

"That is statesmanlike talk. What is more important, it is also sensible talk. Their kinsmen in America and the lovers of justice everywhere will wish the Irish every blessing in their effort to fulfill the legitimate aspirations of their nation within the framework of a policy inspired by a love for peace and a determination to preserve it.

"So, I express the hope of you all that our generation will see Ireland one day united. The end of partition will bring a breath of hope to enslaved nations everywhere. The moral resistance to partition already sustains such hope: They who struggle for freedom are already free.

"We who love America are naturally interested in the land which taught our people how and why and with what passion we must love this land of liberty. We who know the joy of living in a united Nation—one Nation under God—one Nation indivisible with liberty and justice for all—are under a special obligation to be sympathetic with the aspirations of Old Ireland.

"God bless America. Erin Go bragh. God bless Ireland."

The Statehood Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 8 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "The Statehood Bills," published in the New York Times of today.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

THE STATEHOOD BILLS

President Truman is right in pressing upon the Senate the urgency of the bills granting statehood to Hawaii and Alaska. This is obviously the psychological time for their passage. This action would put us in a stronger position in the Pacific when we need all the strength we can muster. It would be, in a very real sense, a closing of our ranks.

The support for these measures, both congressional and public, is widespread. They were adopted in the House by large majorities. It is believed that they can win overwhelming Senate approval if the Democratic policy committee permits them to come to the floor. The reasons for adoption are many and sound. The ground for delay at this point is flimsy and may possibly be unworthy.

It has been suggested that a long Senate debate might be precipitated at a time when some legislators are eager to get home to make political hay. This is not a valid excuse for sidetracking legislation that the country wants and that a majority of the Congress is ready to approve. Behind this suggestion of protracted debate is the more sinister thesis that the long objection will come from a small group of Democrats who fear that legislative representatives of Hawaii and Alaska would support the civil-rights phases of the Truman program. It is certainly no display of statecraft to impede the legislation for Hawaii and Alaska in order to pander to the prejudices of a minority.

The President's appeal should be heeded. The measures should be brought out and adopted before any adjournment.

People Being Blamed in Newest Alibi for Failure in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, in order to keep the record straight for the sake of posterity and for the historians, I submit the two following articles, one by David Lawrence and the other by Dorothy Thompson, both of which are excellent articles giving facts which people should not forget:

PEOPLE BEING BLAMED IN NEWEST ALIBI FOR FAILURE IN KOREA—WAVE OF CRITICISM RISES AS TRUMAN REFUSES TO SHAKE UP TOP COMMAND

(By David Lawrence)

There's a new alibi around here—it seems that now the American people are to blame for the failures in Korea. Nobody in Washington presumably had any responsibility—it was just the failure of the people to let Washington spend more money.

This type of argument assumes that the military men in our top command must forget their duty as military advisers and be swerved by political considerations and public opinion's desires about spending. Evidently they must not speak up and tell the country what is really needed for military defense and safety.

But the people will not be fooled by these alibis. They are insistent that something be done about the blunders—no tanks, no aircraft carriers, no marines, no tactical aviation in the Far East when trouble came. The bitterness of feeling against the President is growing. Letters from different parts of the country show that his recent refusal to shake up the top command and the civilians who bungled the job is turning a wave of new criticism against him.

ORDER ISSUED IN 1946

The President's responsibility will be a subject of wide discussion. For it was his Executive order issued in 1946—and reiterated regularly since—which has squelched the military men below the top group of political generals and prevented them from speaking their minds.

The Executive memorandum was referred to in a speech in the House of Representatives on April 5, 1950, by Representative VAN ZANDT, Republican, of Pennsylvania, whose courageous demand for an investigation last year brought out a record of facts that tells the story of why there has been failure in Korea. The President's order, dated November 15, 1946, was addressed to the Director of the Budget. It has been the basic policy of his administration ever since. It reads in part:

"I cannot condone the practice of seizing upon any opportunity which presents itself to indicate an opinion, either directly or indirectly, that my estimates are insufficient.

"When you notify the heads of the various departments and agencies of the amounts to be included in the 1948 budget for their activities, I wish you would include a reminder that I shall expect them and their subordinates to support only the President's estimates in hearings and discussions with Members of Congress."

This created a "yes-man" psychology. Any military man who differed conscientiously and tried to offer an expert opinion was called an insurrectionist. Admiral Denfeld was removed as an example. A rereading of the testimony in those House hearings last year tells what is wrong today. The President picked the wrong advisers—and still keeps them.

When the Navy's battleship Missouri ran aground, a fine naval officer was court martialed and his career ruined—but that's the inexorable rule of the Navy.

NOBODY COURT-MARTIALED

Today, when the United States Army is without proper air support for ground troops in Korea or anywhere else, nobody is court martialed.

Today, when the United States Navy has most of its aircraft carriers in mothballs and the Marine Corps has been cut to pieces by the combined votes of General Bradley and General Vandenberg in the Joint Chiefs of Staff, neither the President nor Congress has taken the generals to task.

Only last fall the Marine Corps was fighting for its life—against dismemberment by Generals Bradley and Vandenberg. But the Marine Corps managed somehow, with the help of Congress, to keep some of its integrated combat teams, with their own airplanes. And here is the payoff as told in a dispatch this week from a United Press correspondent at the Korean battlefront:

"The smash down the coast was the acid test for close air support. Two units—one Army, one marines—of the same comparative size jumped off at the same point at the same time against similar enemy concentrations in identical terrain.

"The marines, with close air support, moved 27 miles in 4 days with light casualties. The Army, which had just the usual air coverage, bogged down after suffering heavy casualties."

That's the tragic story of the colossal blunder made by a majority of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff in depriving the United States Army of its own air-support units.

There is too much politics in Washington or else there would be some heads removed, both civilian and military. Softness and political thinking have no place in a wartime setup, as lives are being sacrified. It may take more indignation from the people before they get the changes they want.

FAR EAST ALREADY LOST TO AMERICA BY FAILURE TO CHANGE FOREIGN POLICY

(By Dorothy Thompson)

Those of us who believe that the American foreign policy is utterly reckless and leading us straight into catastrophe are effectively disfranchised. There is only one party, and it is a war party. There is no patriotic leadership that challenges the course on which we have embarked, or has the brains or the courage to chart another.

The present course is to offer ourselves as the policeman of the world, to enforce, by the sacrifice of American lives and fortune, the court orders (as it were) of United Nations countries who will not or cannot themselves fight to enforce them, and to put down aggression wherever it may raise its ugly head, in whatever corner of the globe.

The law against aggression, which Mr. Truman, the generals, and the majority of Republicans have committed us to police is now law. There is not even a definition of aggression in the United Nations Charter. There is no impartial judgment to which it can be referred. The judges include the charged aggressors or their partisans. There is no international police force to execute judgment, nor is any nation required to commit its own forces.

ARENA FOR POWER POLITICS

The United Nations, divided into two factions, sharing no common notions of civilization, law, or order, is, as an institution to enforce peace, pure fiction. It is, in fact, an arena for the great game of power politics. Stalin and company, who know this, use it for what it is and play the game supremely well, while our vacant-minded leaders appoint the American people to be the Galahads of the world, to liberate all victims of aggression—whether they want to be liberated or not. Since the process, once the initial aggression has succeeded, involves the wholesale destruction of the countries and inhabitants to be liberated, enthusiasm is notably lacking. That is the lesson of Korea.

The Russian game is to fight for nobody except Russians. It is to use the armies of its allies to fight Russia's enemies, under the conditions Russia picks.

Now, I submit that if the United States irrevocably commits herself to fighting for all who won't or can't fight for themselves, while Russia pours into the fray only her allies' resources while reserving her own, there can be but one outcome. The final phase of the conflict will find the West utterly exhausted, its forces dispersed, and unable to defend itself on its own ground.

WAR WE CANNOT WIN

Stalin's game is to involve this country in war with China. It is a war we cannot win, morally, politically, or militarily.

We cannot win it morally because no Asiatic trusts the foreign devil, no matter what banner he carries.

We cannot win it politically, because we have not one ally in Asia—having already done our best to extirpate all western influences and sympathetic powers. A policy which commands the British to get out of India and the Dutch out of Indonesia, and then decides to support the French in Indochina—who desperately need their troops to defend France in France; which refuses to support Chiang in China, and then decides to support him in Formosa; and which totally disarms Japan and then decides to defend it, is not a policy. It is a tale told by an idiot. Nehru's recent bitter words about both Russia and America were spoken by a true Asiatic.

We cannot win a war involving China militarily. If there is any general who can tell us how to accomplish what Asiatic Japan could not, or how to overcome by any sort of super-duper weapon the numerical superiority of half a billion Asiatics, fighting on familiar terrain, highly trained in guerrilla tactics and utterly careless of death; or how to blockade a land mass with interior sources of supply that reach from the Yellow Sea to the Elbe in Europe, let that genius arise and tell us how.

We have already lost Asia, chiefly by the great nationalist revolts that the last war let loose, aided by our own past policies.

It is a loss we can acknowledge and sustain.

For Stalin has not yet won Asia. He wants us to win it for him, by a war with China, which will force China into servitude to Russia.

The Lure of Socialism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article written by Mrs. Nina DeCamp Cheatham of Pullman, Wash.:

THE LURE OF SOCIALISM

Today socialism is considered a greater menace to our Government than communism. We have been able to put our fingers on the latter but socialism works through such unsuspected channels, that we are often thrown off guard by its apparent innocent and well meaning mode of action. Working through the unions, industry, professions, churches, and educational institutions it has wormed its way into the very heart of the Government.

The definition for socialism is "the transformation of private, competitive capital into public cooperative capital." Communism stands for public ownership of all wealth. Socialists argue that wealth is absorbed by capital but was created by labor; however, wealth is not shared with labor. For that reason they advocate economic planning, which is to benefit the worker primarily against exploitation. In reality economic planning is a process that squeezes the very lifeblood from the workingman and leaves him crushed under the weight of taxation and limitations of living.

The word "socialism" has meant little to most of us in the United States until recent years. We felt it was no concern of ours that Russia had a totalitarian form of government, where her people were subjected to a tyrannical dictatorship ever since Lenin, Trotsky, and Stalin cast black shadows of despair over an already suffering nation. Could we help it if Stalin cracked the whip over Russia's millions of people? Could we help it if the half starved people struggled through a 5-year plan on black bread and cabbage. What could we do about it if they submitted to more years of self-sacrifice and absolute poverty so that Russian economy might be built up for the good of the party?

Until recently we, in the security of our homes here in a democratic country, had little conception of the deplorable living conditions of the worker in Russia—the worker for whom the socialist regime claims it has modeled its government.

Today we know Russian working men and women (women are a big factor in the regimentation of labor) are exploited. They toil but they profit not. So closely are the results of labor calculated that the worker receives barely enough to keep body and soul together. The Government absorbs all the profits.

If the people of the United States were allowed—yes; I say allowed—to spend a month traveling through Russia's industrial and agricultural centers, and allowed, and I mean allowed, to have frank answers to their questions concerning the management of business, the idea of socialism as our form of government here in the United States would be quickly stamped out. They would thank God they could return to their own homes, not government owned; they could buy what and wherever they wished; they could hold jobs of their own choice and leave it if they so desired; their bank account would not be subject to government grab; the large part of their produce not taken by the government; their factories were not told what to produce, how much, and where to sell it; they have freedom from search and seizure; freedom of speech and the right to vote; and freedom of worship.

I speak of Russia because that country is the most classic example of socialism, socialism plus totalitarianism, where all industries are nationalized under government control. Since communism is one step beyond socialism, it takes just one such man as Stalin, Hitler, or Mussolini to become a dictator, who is not content with the suppression of his own people, but works for world domination and enslavement.

The struggle of Russians for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is tragic. They are born to live and die for the glory of their Government. Their liberty is restricted by severe Government rules enforced by the secret police. As for the pursuit of happiness, there is, for instance, the parade of the happy workers where all the men and women in factories and industries march for 5 and 6 hours, losing a day's pay if they do not participate. There are beautiful parks, but no one can sit or walk on the grass. Along the walks in the park are benches where they may sit if they have time for such relaxation.

Russians can enjoy one gratifying thing, and that is the low cost of dying. Do you know that it costs only $1 for cremation in that God-forsaken land? They have something on us there. Then, too, human ashes take very little space. In a country where slave labor, political purges, and half-fed workers exist, the death toll runs high. Why waste wood for coffins, labor for burial, and ground for bones?

Let us now consider England, the next important socialistic state, but it is better to go back into history to get a more accurate picture of the growth of socialism in a monarchial form of government. Fabian socialism originated in England in 1884, and though patterned somewhat after that of Russia, it differed in many ways in that it did not believe in the overthrow of the government by force. It did not believe in nationalization of all industry. The plan was to spread its teachings not by force but by gradual persuasion, so as not to startle a confused people by the sudden introduction of new ideologies. Included in its membership were Ramsay MacDonald, Bernard Shaw, and Sidney and Beatrice Webb, all believing in the fantasy of a heaven on earth.

The Fabian Socialist plan was as follows:

1. To train workers, leaders, writers, and speakers to promote socialism.
2. To plan a welfare state.
3. To abstain from total state ownership of industry and land.
4. To have state ownership of electric power, railroads, basic metals, transportation, and banks.
5. The state was to plan and supervise certain economic affairs left in private ownership.
6. Labor unions were to be under government control.
7. The British Labor Party was to be formed.
8. They were to cooperate with the Liberal Party while strengthening their own power.
9. Schools, writers, and clergymen were to be the sounding boards of public opinion, spreading the socialistic doctrine.

In 1905 the Labor Party, with the labor unions behind it, put its best foot forward when Lloyd George, of the Liberal Party, became the leader in the British Government. England at that time was a leader among strong nations and was at the highest peak of her power in commerce, industry, and manufacturing. That with the wealth pouring into her coffers from her rich colonies in every hemisphere had made England a powerful nation whose mighty fleet was queen of the seas.

The Labor Party was strong enough at this time to dictate as they were now represented in Parliament. They promised political aid to the Liberal Party if the latter would cooperate in putting through legislation advocated by the Labor Party. Thus the Socialist, or the Labor Party, got a strong foothold in the Government.

The Socialist or Labor Party, as it was now known, was represented in Parliament by 1914 and was instrumental in bringing about reforms, which caused the people to turn to it for further aid. By 1918 the Labor Party was strong enough to oppose the Liberal Party. In 1923 Ramsay MacDonald, the Socialist, became England's premier. He was a dreamer of a utopian form of government and did not consider in his plans the weakness of human nature and what evil power and greed can accomplish. During his term of office the Socialists were able to accomplish part of their program of benefits for the laboring class.

In the article, Ramsay MacDonald Socialism, by Edward P. Bell, there is set forth MacDonald's ideas on socialism. Here are a few: "Socialism is an enemy of poverty. It holds that not charity, but social reconstruction, is the reply for poverty." Again, "Socialism is the very antithesis of tyranny." "Socialists want to conserve capital—they want it better used so that income may be better distributed. They want it made servant and not master." "We regard every man first as a man and second as an economic factor." "Socialism is based on the gospels."

How have these ideas worked out? Have these ideologies been carried out successfully in England? Is there not compulsion of labor there? Has not socialism reduced the people to abject poverty through high taxation and high cost of living? Has the Government not absorbed much of capital and private enterprise, and taken land from farmers who do not produce according to Government specifications? I could go on and on showing socialism in England has failed.

Ramsay MacDonald was the first Socialist to hold this office and was elected by the labor vote and the vote of the Liberalists. The stage was at last set for action. The Labor Party had a free hand to carry out many of their socialistic ideas. You will find that the Labor Party catered to the laboring class wherein the party owed its strength. Among the many benefits brought about by the Socialists were the abolition of overtime, an 8-hour workday, a health program, pensions, care of widows and orphans, and social security.

As the power behind the throne changed from one party to another, the Labor Party still held its strangle hold over legislation in Parliament. Eventually the people found that the Government had control of railroads, steel, and coal. Billions of pounds had been spent for social-welfare benefits and when the Second World War came England was unprepared. Her economy had been destroyed by the excessive spending, many of her important colonies were slipping away from her control and her commerce practically ruined. At this time Winston Churchill was made Premier. Owing to his great executive ability and an indomintable will, he guided his ship of state through the most disastrous war in history and made a safe landing. England was in great need when this war ended. Bombed-out factories, public buildings, and millions of homes, meant still greater sacrifices on the part of the people, for these had to be restored. High taxes took half of the workers wages and living costs were exorbitant. The long-suffering people became restless and lost faith in Churchill's conservative plan of rebuilding England's broken economy brought on by two world wars. Through all this upheaval you will find the Socialist Party had never ceased to keep its pot of socialistic propaganda boiling—to paint England red.

In desperation the laboring class turned a deaf ear to the plea of Churchill, and when he called for an election in 1945, the Socialist (Labor Party) won by a great majority and Maj. Clement Attlee became Prime Minister. English people had grasped at straws to keep afloat in a chaotic world, but these straws were socialistic flotsam, and the working class are drifting into a condition of servitude.

Today England wears the yoke of socialism. The party has climbed to the highest rung of the political ladder. With a majority of seats in Parliament, it has been able to nationalize 75 percent of all industry and their goal is to eventually put the rest of the nation's economy under government ownership. Free enterprise is gradually being absorbed by the government, because of strict control by the government and high taxation.

Yes, let me repeat. Socialism is at the height of its power in England, and today the people groan under the weight of this planned economic system. But I should call it a mere semblance of power, for underneath the pinnacle of apparent success, the British Empire in all its old glory has melted away, and all that is left is a mere shell which at any moment may cave in and destroy both the builders of that pinnacle of false ideologies, and the people who have been worshiping and groveling before it.

The Labor Party has from its beginning brought trouble and grief to the English people, spending the country's wealth on what it calls social welfare and taxing the people to death to pay for being taken care of, and what care do they get.

England has tried socialism at its worst and best and it has proved a fantastic dream. If man was made in the image of God, it does not follow that man's mind reflects that of his Maker. We are given the power to think good or evil and act accordingly. There is too much inherent weakness in human nature. It is not fitting that a few men suffering from the disease of socialism should dictate the destiny of God's people. England is licking her wounds caused by such practices. Do we, a freedom-loving Nation, wish to try her experiment?

Russia, a socialist nation, has set fire to the world with its propaganda and evil deeds. Scarcely a country has not been scorched by her firebrands. A shooting war is in progress in Korea, Communist inspired. American blood is spilling on foreign soil. In the satellite states of Russia the people have become restless under the spiked prod of Russian appointed officials. Germany is seething in discontent in spite of the stupendous amount of money, food, and clothing given them by the United States.

Here are some interesting experiences in socialism. New Zealand tried out socialism in all its ramifications and gave it up as a bad job, after 14 years' struggle. Australia had a fling at socialism and after more than 30 years, socialism had to give up the ghost. Australia had had enough. During that time the government had nationalized the Trans-Australian Airways, competing with the privately owned concerns. In spite of all the political skuldevilry, the government-owned airlane was a complete failure though it was free of taxes and given special gasoline rights. It tried shipping at a loss of $30,000,000,000. The telephone system was under government control, but the cost to the people was so high that few could afford them. Strikes were frequent and the production of coal dropped 6.5 percent while other countries showed a 50-percent gain. It is said that Australia will have to import millions of tons of coal for home consumption.

ECONOMIC PLANNING

The system of economic planning as used in England is the one Socialists would thrust upon us. It is very similar to the Russian plan. Listen to a few of the ideas outlined by the Economic Planning Committee. Do they appeal to you as a way of life? Would you junk our present form of government for their plan that could scuttle our whole national economy? Would you allow our Constitution of the United States to be endangered by a lot of zealots whose ideologies have bankruped Europe?

This is part of the socialistic scheme. For all kinds of industry, farms, factories, shops, and mines, the economic planners decide the production quotas; priorities and quotas of raw materials; it fixes buying and selling prices; it sets labor quotas and wages; it decides who is to receive credit at banks; it determines what industries shall be nationalized (government owned) and what shall be privately owned but under state planning and supervision. To top all this there would be nationalization of railroads, water and electric power, radio, television, cable and mines.

Under this system in England the following are nationalized: Cable and wireless, civil aviation, transportatoin, railroads, buses, cargo transports, and inland waterways, coal mines, electric and gas industry, banks and medical service. According to statistics many of these are running in the red.

With all these controls, the English lack many necessities of life and housing is very inadequate. Could Americans thrive and be happy on 1½ eggs per week, 3 ounces of butter, 6 ounces of margarine, 1 ounce of lard, 1 ounce of cheese, 1 ounce of bacon, 8 ounces of sugar, 6 ounces of meat, 2 ounces of corn beef (which was later changed to 17 oz.) 2 quarts of milk per week? It could happen to us.

England is bankrupt today and she cannot care for her people. With the United States pouring into her hands billions of dollars each year, she is still unable to pay off her huge national debt, or the interest thereof.

As wages have increased for the workingman, so have prices of commodities increased. The worker is in the same predicament as the Italian client who replied to his lawyer when asked what he did for a living. He replied, "I digga da ditch to getta da mon to buya da food to getta da strength to digga da ditch." How true he was!

English people have become restless under the strain of taxation, high cost of living, poor housing, and inadequate medical care. The Government decided now to call a halt to any further nationalization because of this unrest and dissatisfaction.

Sir Stafford Cripps had said, "Our objective is to carry through a planned economy without compulsion of labor."

How would Socialists explain The Control of Engagements Act? It was passed to force all men from the ages of 18 to 50 and all women between the ages of 18 to 40 to work at such jobs as ordered or jobs necessary to further the economics of the country. Punishment was to be meted out for lack of cooperation.

At the dedication of the Pennsylvania Power & Light Co., Harold Stassen said "The philosophy of 'let the Government do it' can lead to the downfall of the American way of life."

This is another case of economic planning. The Spence Act would give the President unlimited power to use as he saw fit in certain emergencies. Anyone could see that it may lead to dictatorship.

Then the Brannan Act, too, fits into the Socialist scheme. It advocates subsidies on farm commodities to keep up prices for the farmer. The Government sets prices on certain crops to hold up prices for the farmer. The farmer receives the difference between the Government-set price and the selling price of his crop. The taxes we, the consumers, pay to the Government helps take care of that difference.

Allan B. Kline writes in Collier's magazine May 13, 1950, "The course being charted for us by the Secretary of Agriculture, Charles F. Brannan, would beeline the farmers of this country in the direction of stabilized poverty." Mr. Kline is president of the American Farm Bureau Federation and represents 1,409,000 United States farm families. He says the answer is high production, reasonable prices, and increasing efficiency in farm production. It has been estimated that this system runs the Government into debt from five to ten billion dollars a year on extra taxes. Housewives struggle with high-priced second rate potatoes while the Government burns or lets rot the cream of the season's crop.

There is scarcely a day passes but what some article appears in magazines and newspapers condemning the Brannan act. These articles are written by men who have the interest of the people at heart and who know where this system will lead our Nation.

Little by little Socialists are trying to push our President to the wall to get legislative measures passed to increase their power. To many the TVA smacks soundly of socialism. The people of Idaho, Montana, Washington, and Oregon are taking a strong stand against Government control of the Columbia Basin Administration, which, with the TVA, would give the Government control of most of the water and electric power of the United States.

In our country we find socialistic and communistic infiltration into Government, industry, religion, educational institutions, the press, and radio. It has reached such dangerous proportions that we have been at last rudely awakened to the Red peril has grown like noxious weeds.

You ask, "What do the Socialists want?" You may as well say everything. They plan to have Government ownership of railroads, transportation of all kinds, banking, radio, press, telephone, television, and industry. Could such things happen in the United States?

Perhaps it is not well known by the public that two officials in the Bonneville Dam Administration are Socialists. Dr. Paul J. Raver has been administrater in the Bonneville Power Administration since 1939. Dr. Carl D. Thompson, formerly research director of the Socialist Party, is also on the staff. Raven represents the Government in the Columbia power pool. His goal is for a program to promote public ownership and acquisition of public utilities. This would be a Government monopoly under the supervision of three men who must conform to the President's orders. This power would give control over all natural resources which would cover land, forests, soil conservation, irrigation, and water rights. So vast would be their powers that they could be at liberty to buy and sell real estate and private utilities to whom they chose, designate the acreage of farms and control lumbering, fishing, and mining.

Socialists are working tooth and nail to put the Columbia Valley Administration bill 1645 through Congress. This would institute a Government monopoly, monopolistic in character, which would be out of the control of the State government of Washington, Idaho, Oregon, and Montana. These Northwestern States are also fighting this bill tooth and nail. Some people will be wearing false plates when this controversy is settled and it won't be the valiant citizens of the Columbia Valley. It smacks too loudly of a welfare state such as Russia and England are now enjoying.

THE DEPRESSION AND ITS EFFECTS ON THE UNITED STATES AND EUROPE

In 1933 depression struck the United States and we were practically a welfare state, in that the Government had to provide for the needy and unemployed. The WPA was set up to aid jobless men and women, the NYA for jobless youths, the CCC camps gave employment for thousands of young men, money was loaned to farmers, practically all the banks were in dire distress and were given assistance by the Government, and last, but not least, the old-age pension was instituted.

Socialists laughed up their sleeves, thinking that capitalism had at last met the fate of Humpty Dumpty who sat on the wall. They thought capitalism could not rise again. They saw no smoke belching from huge factory chimneys in the United States, the railroad service cut down to a minimum for the lack of freight and passengers, crowds of workingmen swarming the streets looking for any kind of a job.

But by 1938 we were on the way to progress again. The dinner-bucket brigades marched to the factories and railroads, eager to work once more. Industry was humming again. While locomotive whistles screeched and bells rang, loaded freight cars pounded over the miles of tracks from coast to coast, carrying the wherewithal that keeps the heart of the Nation beating. We, a competitive, captalistic nation, were succeeding. We, a capitalistic nation, are now feeding and clothing millions of people on foreign soil who have been reduced to poverty by Socialist ideologies.

In order to beat the depression in Germany, they tried to solve the problem with militarism which absorbed 600,000 men. Factories were set in motion making military supplies and ammunition. German economics were in such a deplorable condition that later Hitler found excellent germinating ground for his devilish schemes of world domination.

Russia's planned economy was operated by the state, while Italy's was taken over by the state and by private owners, the latter under state control. This system later led to dictatorship in each country. Russia only of the two has survived under dictatorship, and then simply because of her army of secret police and spy system. The threat of death is held over each citizen of Soviet Russia for any infraction of the laws. The reason Russia has made the progress she has is because most of her great projects, such as railroads, highways, canals, and mines, are built and operated by prison labor and men and women in concentration camps. The state is out only a little food, because their labor works on starvation diet and without pay. With this cheap manpower—for in Russia life is worth nothing—she has built up her economy. The building of her great projects could be compared to the building of the Great Wall of China. They were built at the expense of human life for the gratification and glorification of inhuman dictators.

SOCIALIZED MEDICINE

Among many of the socialist program failures is the national health program, according to statistics. Listen to this. In 1948 prescriptions were given out by United States doctors at an average of 250 to 100 people, while in England there were 400 prescriptions to 100 people. When you consider that we have three times as many citizens as England, the comparison is unbelievable. It is understood that 14 cents is charged for each prescription while the government foots the rest of the bill.

Rev. Frederick K. Belton, of Lewiston, Idaho, who spent some time in England, has said in an address at Pullman, Wash., that people got prescriptions for aspirin instead of going to a drug store and paying 25 cents for a bottle. The doctors in England are so busy attending patients who complain of minor ailments that they have little time for urgent cases. Doctors have to work late at night to do their book work for they have no time during the day for this. You have all read of how the English hospitals are overcrowded with patients, many with simple ailments, while the hospital beds are desperately needed for serious cases.

Our answer to socialized medicine is that there are organizations in the United States for health insurance. By paying a certain amount each month from the pay envelope, hospital or medical care, or both, are taken care of and, in case of death, the benefits go to the bereaved. In the Reader's Digest, April 1950, Mr. Stassen said, "Congress should create a Federal Health Reinsurance Corporation which should provide that any local Blue Cross or similar plan that meets certain minimum requirements can join by paying 2 percent of its annual premiums. The Government to pay the first $50,000,000 to start the corporation in business and then the funds paid in annually by local Blue Cross plans." He suggested a fixed scale of charges by doctors to prevent padding of bills, and that 12 calls a year be allowed for each patient registering in the plan.

Remember this, dear friends, if you were to have socialized medicine here in the United States, you would pay plenty for it out of high taxation just as they do in England. You would receive poor service in overcrowded hospitals and by overworked doctors and nurses. It has failed in England; it will here.

CAPITALISM AS IT IS TODAY

Capitalism began away back in early history when wandering tribes settled in favorable locations to form communities. Gradually agriculture was developed and sheep raising became an important industry as were handicraft and weaving, fruit raising and shipping. The Crusades were influential in building up civilization owing to new ideas brought back by pilgrims to be used in their communities. Gradually people saw the advantage of concentration in one industry. It would bring them wealth by barter. As God gave to some men a greater capacity for planning and management, they became prosperous, while other men barely made a living and others starved. Those are the conditions that exist today. What right have we to say to a successful businessman, "You have much; I have little. You must share the results of your toil with me"? We each have the right to toil and if we are poor managers or not diligent, whose fault is it that we are hungry or poorly clothed?

With the use of machinery, steam, electric power, and mechandized transportation, employment has been given to millions of workers, and wealth to capitalists. Labor in general is less tedious and more can be accomplished with less physical and mental strain. The living conditions of the average worker are good, and through unions and Government rules, the worker is protected as to hours, wages, and overtime. Of the many advantages to be had by the people of this Nation are the public libraries, night schools, sports, theaters, and clubs. And last but not least, privately owned cars. With vacation on pay, the worker is at liberty to spend that precious time as he pleases without Government permits.

There are conditions that could be remedied in the capitalist system. The Socialists say that labor produces wealth, but receives only small wages as compared to the wealth accrued by the capitalist. Many industries and business concerns pay a bonus under certain conditions of service. Some pay dividends to their employees. These are answers to the question and would encourage workers to use more effort and skill since they themselves would profit thereby.

Working under socialism, people lack initiative because they have to work when and where and at what the government orders them. They are not free to come and go or change jobs as they please. Under government control (or government planning) the industries, railroads, socialized medicine, etc., are run at a great loss. The workers must pay higher prices on everything to make up for government deficits. In England this is the condition that now exists.

Besides, who would do this controlling and regulating? If there is political corruption in government management today, what would happen under socialism? According to the socialist platform, there can be only one political party, namely, the Socialist or Labor Party. That is giving too much power to one group. Two or more political parties tend to keep politics on an even keel; one balances the other and keeps corruption down, for one exposes the fallacies of the other. Workers under capitalism work for advancement and higher pay by maintenance of discipline and doing conscientious work. For fear of penalties and loss of job, they give their best efforts to their work.

Competitive capitalism and free enterprise is what makes the wheels of industry turn. It is the urge for accomplishment. Only because of capitalism has invention and science made such rapid strides. Men were free to think and act, to find better methods to make better products. Had it not been for free enterprise and capitalism we might well be still living in the stone age. Socialists fight capitalism and free enterprise. Why? Can they not see that nations have attained greatness and power because of free men's right to act for themselves? Are we going to end by being another Russia or a small part of Russia's domination.

PREACHERS IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING

According to statistics there are 149,354 church congregations with a membership of 27,000,000 people. Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam is chairman of the Federal Council of Churches. Be that as it may, he has been accused of communism. He has acted in various capacities in Communist meetings and his connection with a notorious magazine that lashes at churchmen and churches opposed to communism adds a stigma to this name.

Another famous preacher representing the Federal Council has remarked that, "The Kingdom of God is a land organized according to the ideas of Karl Marx." He gives a biased opinion of Russia making Russia appear to be an ideal place where everybody is happy, which we of America know is a downright falsehood. Mr. Jones makes the rounds of the many churches in his charge spreading his gospel of the "Kingdom of God" at the expense of the churches. He believes in God with communism included. He is quoted as saying, "Russia has got hold of a higher principle—cooperation, and it is working out in higher results than we can work out of a lower competition."

In Sunday school papers such as "The Classmate" and "Lessons for the Intermediate," socialistic articles have been printed for instance "The Story of Stalin" and Socialized Medicine."

Seeing danger ahead, a group of clergymen have organized into the American Council of Christian Churches, the president being Dr. W. O. Garman of Wilkinsburg, Pa. This organization includes 15 Protestant denominations and has a membership of 1,500,000: this includes members of Protestant churches in the United States affiliated in this council.

In 1918 a World Council of Churches was organized at Amsterdam. Bishop Oxnam was made one of its presidents to represent the Western Hemisphere. While the Western Council of Churches was being organized, the International Council of Christian Churches was founded in Amsterdam which represented 29 Protestant Church denominations in 29 countries. The Rev. Carl McIntire was chosen chairman. It is to be hoped that the International Council of Christian Churches will be able to counteract the influence of an organization which steals about contaminating the minds of our youth and undermining our belief in the Constitution of the United States, under the guise of holy men.

Are church members conscious of the fact that socialism is quietly spreading its ideologies by means of preachers wearing sheep's clothing? Do they realize that the teachings of God are being camoflaged in high sounding terms, leading the people on to be sacrificed later at the altar of servitude and corruption? God made this old world for all people. There is plenty of room for all. Through the wonders of nature and science He has provided for all clothing, food, and shelter, if we do our share in developing, producing, and building. There is an old adage that should be drummed into our heads: "The Lord helps those who help themselves." There would be less poverty, less suffering. There would be no need for socialism.

HOW TO FIGHT SOCIALISM

There are many ways to wage war against socialism, some of which are: the lowering of the cost of living, more and better housing, lowering taxes, less Government spending, trade schools for our youth, lowering cost of medical care, better management of the Veteran's Administration, adequate schools and teachers, encouragement of home ownership through lowered taxes, reforestation, and the conservation of land.

One great trouble is that too many men are looking for white-collar jobs. What the world needs is more builders than pencil pushers and office chair polishers, if you know what I mean. Since a man pays one-third of his salary each year to the Government in taxes, etc., according to Herbert Hoover, something is rotten, not in Denmark, but in the United States Government management.

The average family cannot build up a bank account. The cost of living is all out of proportion to wages. If people were content to live in horse hovels, we could save for emergencies and old age. But we, the people of America, have high ideals, ambitions, and love of freedom. It is our heritage that we should live as an enlightened race of people who have built up a wonderful nation by brain and brawn. We refuse to allow foreign dogmas and ideologies to beat us down to their level. We have the right to vote. It is through this power and the belief that right is might that we will come out triumphant through all the traps and snares the Socialists and all their kin have set for us, to destroy our freedom.

War has absorbed much of our national wealth. We have spent billions to help build up the economies of war-ravished European countries, also China, Japan, and Korea. Not only money has been spent, but millions of American lives, to end war. But with Communists and Socialists stirring up restless, half starved, homeless, jobless people, we seem to be pouring our wealth into foreign sieves. These nations turn a listening ear to siren voices, singing soft inducive music to the Ulysses, who seek a more pleasant way of life, in the end to be dashed against the rocks, unless they stop up their ears and turn away from the glittering promises of socialism.

The President and the Marine Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 11 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article relating to the President and the Marine Corps, written by Constantine Brown, and published in the Washington Evening Star of September 6, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS CHANGING WORLD—MERGER OF MARINE CORPS WITH ARMY STILL SEEN AS INTENTION OF PRESIDENT

(By Constantine Brown)

The marines are amazed to find out that according to President Truman they are nothing more than the Navy's "police force and have a propaganda machine that is almost equal to Stalin's."

Such were Mr. Truman's startling observations, made in a letter dated August 29 to Representative McDONOUGH, Republican, of California.

This explosion by the President was prompted by a letter the Californian wrote suggesting respectfully to him that the Marine Corps be recognized, on the basis of its present services and those during the last 180 years, as a major branch of the American Armed Forces and that it have its own representation in the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

DEEDS BEST PROPAGANDA

The wartime record of the marines needs no publicity. The Leathernecks' deeds are their best propaganda. Before World War II they were pitched in wherever there was a tight spot and where ready fighters were needed. But it was during World War II that they made themselves a corps of special fighters.

Throughout the campaign in the Pacific the reorganized Marine Corps became the most important element in amphibious warfare. Its vital importance was recognized by General MacArthur, who is not a marine. When the Korean war started the commander of all American forces in the Far East cabled almost daily asking for marines as soon as they could be made available. Unfortunately, only a skeleton division was available on the west coast, but it was rushed to the Korean battlefield.

Because of the importance of the Marines, particularly in the far-eastern campaign, the President himself agreed that the corps should be made twice as large as the budget provided for this fiscal year and next.

During the "peace years" which followed VJ-day, the Marine Corps was reduced to a nominal force and there was a definite drive on the part of the Navy's sister services to abolish it altogether. This would have been done by now if the administration had not been compelled to take into account public opinion, which was strongly in favor of our elite corps. It is this factor which unquestionably was in Mr. Truman's mind when he stated that "they (the marines) have a propaganda machine that is almost equal to Stalin's."

Mr. Truman may have intended to be facetious in his letter to the California Congressman. But even so after he and all the rest of the civilized world has denounced Stalin's propaganda as the most vicious, subversive and utterly dishonest in history, his remarks about the Marine Corps are, to say the least, in poor taste and cast unfortunate reflections on a body of men who are fighting and dying on the Korean battlefield as gallantly as any American fighting men.

AMBIGUOUS SENTENCE

Moreover, Mr. Truman's statement—coming at a time when the Marine Corps is being greatly expanded because their fighting role has been fully recognized by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Congress and the President himself—contains one ambiguous sentence.

"Nobody desires," Mr. Truman wrote, "to belittle the efforts of the Marine Corps, but when the Marine Corps goes into the Army it works with and for the Army, and that is the way it should be."

Nobody is quite clear as to what Mr. Truman meant by the words "when the Marine Corps goes into the Army." The Marine brigade now in Korea is, of course, fighting side by side with the Army in the same way as some naval units act as "artillery" for the Army when they bombard North Korea positions. But this does not means that the Navy "goes into the Army."

The battles in Korea are being fought by all the component parts of American Armed Forces, without jealousy and without rivalry. All of them—Ground, Air, and Naval Forces—are putting their shoulders to the wheel for the common good of the country. They are all fighting for the United States and not for a particular branch of the services.

Hence, Mr. Truman's ambiguous sentence is interpreted by many to mean that he still intends, sometime in the distance future when hostilities are ended, to put through the plan, advocated last year, for merging the Marine Corps with the Army.

Mr. Truman asserted once more his constitutional authority as Commander in Chief. After stating that the Marines are no more than the Navy's police force—which strictly interpreted means that they should be used as shore patrols—he added "and as long as I am President that is what it will remain." These will be highly discouraging words for the proud Marines on the Korean battlefield.

Placing the Blame

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. WHITAKER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. WHITAKER. Mr. Speaker, it is with pride whenever I refer to any of my colleagues from Kentucky because Kentucky has, with one exception, a membership in this House composed of real men. In this instance I wish to place in the RECORD for those who read the RECORD an editorial carried in the September 5, 1950, issue of the Lexington Herald, of Lexington, Ky., which was written by THOMAS R. UNDERWOOD, of the Sixth Congressional District of Kentucky, which district for the last 24 years, with the exception of one term, has been represented by the now distinguished Senator from Kentucky, the Honorable VIRGIL CHAPMAN. This congressional district is known as the old Ashland district which was represented by the Clays and the Breckinridges, and in comparison with these great statesmen, in my opinion, the district is now represented by a man of equal stature in TOM UNDERWOOD.

The article follows:

PLACING THE BLAME

An effort is being made at the present time to place the blame for the war in Korea and the difficulties that have been incurred by the Armed Forces of the United States upon any American official who can be singled out. No apology is offered here for any of the policies that have been ineffective. Mistakes have been made.

It was a mistake to withdraw the Army from Korea a year ago. It was a mistake not to go head and build a naval aircraft carrier that had been strted. It was a mistake not to have a more complete program of military training. The effort is now being made to prepare a bill for compulsory military training.

It must be borne in mind that the weaknesses of a year ago made it impossible for some of the boys who had already signed up and wanted military training to continue it. However, in blaming Mr. Truman, Dean Acheson, Louis Johnson, General MacArthur, and others, we must bear in mind that they are all top Government officials. The man who is really to blame for the present war in Korea is Joseph Stalin. Soviet Russia has accepted a form of government and political and atheistic beliefs that are absolutely untenable in this country.

Russia is at war against our security and against everything that the people of the United States believe. There is, therefore, some excuse for the mistakes that have been made that were sincere bad guesses that were made in honest good faith on our side.

Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson is being roundly criticized for taking the steps that were taken by the Hoover Commission and approved and in effect launched under the direction of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower. The Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report has shown how the steps taken were those recommended by the Hoover Commission. Some of the reductions that were made were a part of the plan for unification of the armed services. Also some of the steps that were taken in cutting down on the defense program and on both military and economic aid for Korea were the result of delays in passing necessary legislation and appropriations.

It is regrettable that a division has arisen between President Truman and Gen. Douglas MacArthur as evidenced by the recall of the statement from General MacArthur to the Veterans of Foreign Wars. Washington columnists are today saying that Secretary of State Dean Acheson has aged 10 years, is trying to resign, and they are comparing the situation in which he finds himself with that of the late James Forrestal.

The same columnists are now going back to dig up the statements Forrestal made just before he killed himself and saying he was absolutely right in his predictions about Russia's preparations and the threat of war. In Japan high officials and military leaders who made mistakes developed the fine art of hara-kiri, but it is hoped that the persecution of public men will not persist in this country to the extent that there will seem to remain "only one way out" for those who have attained the highest offices.

Of course, we may be able to make scapegoats out of Louis Johnson, Dean Acheson, General MacArthur, and others, but we had better save a few top generals, admirals, and diplomats, whether we like them or not, because we may need them before the crisis is over.

Mr. Speaker, the truth and the clarity of this editorial which I have read, to me expresses the thoughts into words that I have been thinking for some 2 or 3 weeks. May I ask each Member of this House a question which he himself may answer, and that is, Who would I appoint to fill the places of Johnson and Acheson should I have the power of appointment? When President Truman made these appointments the Senate confirmed them, Johnson unanimously, Acheson 83 to 6. At the time the Senate confirmed these men they were considered to be qualified and men of high caliber.

After they have undergone the slander and the abuse, if you were President, what would your action be? There are things in the President's life that I wish to call to your attention today, and to me these incidents are such that I, for one, admire him. When Thomas Jefferson Pendergast died no one had ever claimed that Harry Truman had anything to do with the cause of Pendergast's conviction, but Pendergast had been Harry Truman's friend, and Harry Truman had the loyalty of a friend and he did the last thing that we can do for a friend—that is to attend his funeral, giving evidence to the world of our loyalty and friendship. When President Roosevelt died and Vice President Truman was notified of the President's death his first words of humility were, "Why could not it have been me?" When notified on Wednesday morning, November 2, 1948, of his definite election, certainly we can all remember the statement he made: "There will be no eating of crow, but we will all work together for peace." On September 7 he walked into the convention hall of the Marines after he had in the letter to General Cates apologized for his "mistaken choice of language." He went to the rostrum—your President and my President—a mere man just like you and just like me. He acknowledged his mistake and said:

When I faced the decision of supporting the United Nations or backing out and surrendering you know what the decision was because I do not think any other way. I hope this organization will support the President of the United States in his effort to secure the peace of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I, for one, believe in the President, and especially in the President as a man of humility, and I, for one, believe that there is some way that we all can get together and work with the President of the United States in bringing peace to the world. And if there is the most infinitesimal part that I might give in my small and unworthy way, I pray each night to an understanding God that I be allowed that part to give.

Small Business in the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the New Republic, August 7, 1950. The article deals with the Small Defense Plants Corporation Act of 1950—H. R. 9243—which was introduced in the House by the Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas. This is a vital piece of legislation deserving of immediate attention by the Congress. Its basic purpose is to utilize fully the productive facilities of small-business men in the defense effort. It is also designed to enable the small-business men—the backbone of our free competitive economy—to survive this period of voluntary allocations and exemptions from the antitrust laws.

SMALL BUSINESS IN THE WAR

As an integral part of President Truman's "partial mobilization" of our manpower, a Small Defense Plants Act of 1950 has been introduced, patterned along the lines of the Smaller War Plants Corporation set up during the last war. In 1940, when World War II defense efforts got under way, it became clear that larger corporations were building up the resources of their own companies with little concern about making full use of the facilities of small business. Between 1940–42 many small business plants lay idle, and the small-business man watched his markets vanish, his supply of materials dry up, and his labor drift away to other plants. The Smaller War Plants Corporation established in 1942 served to keep small business alive as well as to marshal the resources of the country.

Senator JOHN SPARKMAN, Democrat, of Alabama, and Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, Democrat, of Texas, co-authors of the Small Defense Plants Act, want to prevent a repetition of 1940, when growinlg scarcities of basic materials and their control by large corporations rapidly resulted in (1) the elimination of many small businesses and (2) the subjecting of many others to the dictates of big-business primary contractors. "Today a similar need exists for special legislation," Senator SPARKMAN said, "to insure that small business will have a fair share of available supplies—for defense and essential civilian production—and a fair and equitable system of subcontracting in those cases in which primary contracts are awarded to large concerns."

SPARKMAN points out that there is already a dangerous trend revealed in the plan to grant private industry "exemption from the antitrust laws" in order to permit the voluntary allocation by industry of scarce materials. Small business will suffer under a plan of "voluntary allocation" if big business is allowed to continue its present authority to decide who will get supplies, how much one can secure, and at what prices. Harry Blythe, Munitions Board adviser and chief of industrial mobilization planning, has already advised small-business men "to establish contacts with larger companies immediately with a view toward obtaining subcontracts on Government work" (the New York Times, July 22, 1950).

"A critical problem of partial or complete mobilization arises in the abnormal demands for the basic commodities—such as steel, copper, lead, zinc, aluminum, and chemicals—for use in processing and fabrication," Senator SPARKMAN points out. "The experience of World War II indicated that when basic supplies become scarce large corporations proceed to embark on their own programs of allocation. Ample supplies are channeled to their own subsidiaries, while supplies sold to independents—for civilians and defense uses—are sharply curtailed."

Representative PATMAN, who was one of the creators of the World War II Smaller War Plants Corporation, emphasized that its passage came late, after we had mobilized a large part of our economic and industrial resources. "The present proposal for a Small Defense Plants Corporation is needed to supplement and coordinate the small-business segment of our economy with the Defense Production Act of 1950 now under consideration by Congress," PATMAN said. It is in complete accord with the aims of the act which states: "It is the sense of the Congress that small-business enterprises be encouraged to make the greatest possible contribution toward achieving the objectives of this act."

PATMAN believes that any plan of mobilization which does not utilize the capacities and skills of small business is incomplete, negligent, and dangerous. "Decentralization and diversification must be based on small-business participation and, therefore, must be made while we have the choice," he said.

The proposed Small Defense Plants Corporation would have authority to make loans and provide credit to small-business concerns and to perform certain special functions relating to procurement and other matters. The Corporation would have a revolving fund of $500,000,000 to carry out its operations which include: loans to finance plant construction or expansion, the purchase of land, equipment, and supplies, entering contracts with the Government for the purpose of furnishing equipment or materials, and arranging such contracts by letting subcontracts to small-business concerns.

Upon introducing the measure last week, SPARKMAN and PATMAN issued a joint statement warning that "Free enterprise and economic vigor depend upon the maintenance of small-business opportunity. Let us not make the mistake of losing democracy at home while winning the battle against a foreign aggressor. Competition and free enterprise are at the heart of a democratic economic system. Small business is the vital element without which that system cannot function."

Can We Have Freedom Without Justice?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I am sure many of the Members recall with affection one of our former Congressmen, the Honorable J. H. Hoeppel. Mr. Hoeppel is now the editor of a magazine entitled "National Defense." I am pleased to include with my remarks the following article that appeared in that magazine concerning certain discriminations against the aged and disabled retired enlisted men of the armed services, and which was brought to my attention by our former colleague. Included also is a copy of the letter Mr. Hoeppel wrote to the New York Times:

Mr. HANSON W. BALDWIN,
New York Times, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. BALDWIN: Your article in today's Los Angeles Times on the subject of universal military training is an American he-man's presentation of self-evident facts, which the average American should approve.

With a continuous experience with the military since 1898, (when I first enlisted) and with over 23 years experience with this periodical, I can definitely say you hit the bull's-eye when you discussed our lowered morale, due to weakness in training, discipline and will to fight.

Your reference to volunteers is also 100 percent perfect. The volunteer who gives the most, however, is the most neglected of veterans.

Please read the enclosed paper, to see how men who have given the most to our Government in combat, are actually now receiving the least. In addition, the present breed of political highbrass has no interest or regard for the men who gave their all in the yesteryears.

Officers who have so little concern for the aged and disabled retired men, never can, and never will, inspire the fighting instinct in today's inductees.

With thanks for your consideration, I am,
Your well-wisher,
J. H. HOEPPEL,
Manager.

CAN WE HAVE FREEDOM WITHOUT JUSTICE?

We respectfully appeal to the Members of Congress and to the editors of American newspapers to read the true statement of facts which are presented in this periodical showing the injustices and discriminations perpetrated against the aged and disabled retired enlisted men of the armed services, virtually all of whom today are 70 and more years of age.

We print on this page a picture of Maj. Samuel Woodfill, who is a veteran of the Spanish-American War, World War I, and World War II. Because he showed unusual heroism and ability, he was placed on the retired list at a higher rank than the rank at which he retired after 30 years' service—including credit for double time.

Because Comrade Woodfill on account of extraordinary heroism and accomplishment in battle was promoted after retirement, he and approximately 1,000 other aged and disabled former retired enlisted men are denied longevity for their double time at the higher rank they now hold.

Other men served in the ranks as enlisted men side by side with Comrade Woodfill and thus gained double-time credit for retirement, all such enlisted men who never held rank higher than the rank at which they retired—all of them receive longevity pay on the retired list for their double time.

We merely present Major Woodfill as indicative of our group. There are also quite a number of other men who were advanced to commissioned rank because of bravery in combat—they all, like Comrade Woodfill, were double-crossed when Congress, at the behest of the War Department, enacted into law Public Law 351—Eighty-first Congress without authorizing these men "on parity with other men having double time" to receive retired pay for the double time they gained fighting our Nation's battles in Cuba, China, and the Philippines.

SERGEANTS ALSO PENALIZED

There are quite a number of sergeants (enlisted men) who were promoted to the grade of first sergeant on the battlefield because of bravery and extraordinary accomplishments. When these men returned to the United States after World War I (because of the reduction of the Armed Forces at that time), many of them were, through no fault of their own, reduced from the grade of first sergeant (the first grade enlisted man) to the grade of sergeant (the fourth grade enlisted man) and they were therefore forced to retire in such lower grade. If they agree to continue to receive pay as fourth grade enlisted men, then finance officers will pay them longevity pay for their double time. If, however, they choose to receive the retired pay of a first sergeant (the first grade) then the finance officers of the armed services refuse to recognize their double time or to pay them longevity pay for this double time.

The Boxcar Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, the effects of the boxcar shortage upon the small-grain harvest of Montana and neighboring States are becoming more serious daily. Millions of bushels of grain are now piled on the ground in the Northwest. More is being harvested every day. Elevators are blocked, and from every section of the State of Montana we are hearing reports of hundreds of thousands of bushels of grain piled in the open.

We have been blessed this year with a bountiful harvest. We cannot afford to lose it through lack of proper handling. The Association of American Railroads assures me that it has been doing everything possible to get cars to the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, and other northwestern railroads, but it is apparent that this effort is not sufficient. Drastic steps must be taken to divert cars into this area, and at once. I hope that a better solution will be worked out immediately, while there is still time to save the situation.

Under leave to extend my remarks I include a copy of a telegram on this subject received today. I have had similar statements from elevator operators in my State.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1950.

Col. J. M. JOHNSON,
Chairman, Interstate Commerce Commission, Washington, D. C.:

Dismal picture of hundreds of locked elevators and grain harvest being piled on ground throughout territory was reviewed today in committee meeting. Record shows persistent failure of AAR and ICC efforts to date to build up shockingly low percentages of ownership of boxcars on lines serving Minnesota, Dakotas, and Montana. Somehow it must be brought home that this situation cannot be met without special treatment over other areas because you are dealing with perishable items. As for example flaxseed which simply cannot be put on ground even temporarily or in any ordinary bin and which will have no place to go unless elevators are unblocked. Departure of Canadian cars empty leaves territory in desperate shape and if ever drastic action were justified taking cars away from someone else to give to grain farmers this is the time. Everyone in Northwest including growers, elevators, railroads, and Government agencies agreed the time for talk is past and the occasion for immediate and drastic action is now. Everyone understands the reasons for the trouble and all the background, but the need now is to get some cars to move this harvest. What are you willing to try to do?

United Nations Should Decide Formosa Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CECIL F. WHITE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Speaker, it is my earnest hope that someday all disputes which may lead to war will be submitted to the United Nations for final settlement.

If we allow ourselves to be drawn into another world conflict, in which atomic and hydrogen bombs are used, civilization is doomed.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the McClatchy newspapers of Fresno, Modesto, and Sacramento, Calif., of September 1, 1950, in which the editor asks that the Formosa problem be submitted to the United Nations. In taking this position the McClatchy newspapers are joined by another highly respected newspaper the Christian Science Monitor. Mr. Speaker, I commend these newspapers for their correct and forthright position on this important matter in the interest of world peace:

FORMOSA PROBLEM IS ONE FOR THE UNITED NATIONS

Secretary of State Dean Acheson told a news conference in Washington Wednesday that the United States, by word and action, is doing her utmost to keep the Chinese Communists on the side lines in the Korean war.

But the very fact the Secretary made this statement with such a show of earnestness indicates the possibility of some startling development ere peace is restored in the Orient.

And who would be the certain gainer should the United States find herself engaged in a death struggle with the hordes of the Chinese Reds?

The roars of gleeful laughter in Moscow could be heard clear around the world.

Yet a clear-sighted realism tells us it is not the Korean war whose sparks might light the fires of a Sino-American conflict, but Formosa.

Even the anything but alarmist and always strongly anti-Communist Christian Science Monitor felt compelled to say editorially last Saturday:

"No American can view the Formosa situation with complacency. The American position there is irregular enough to provide devastating Russian propaganda. It is unneutral enough to risk the animosity of China's millions if not actual war with them."

And what American in his right senses wants any such thing to happen?

The Monitor joins Gov. Thomas E. Dewey and several other prominent Americans in urging that the whole Formosa problem forthwith and immediately be turned over to the United Nations—that the United Nations take the full responsibility for the solution of its involved and controverted status.

Settlement of the Formosa controversy on an international level through the UN conceivably could remove the danger of the Chinese Communists jumping into the Korean war on the pretext that the United States had violated China's territorial rights in Formosa.

Surely, if Korean peace is a United Nations responsibility that of Formosa is much more so because Formosa poses the threat of a conflict beside which that in Korea would be just a mild limbering up exercise.

Below the Belt

OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the Washington (D. C.) Post on September 7, 1950:

BELOW THE BELT

Another mean and shabby hoax in the McCarthy manner has been perpetrated on the Senate of the United States. The author—or at least the instrument—on this occasion was Senator ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL, of Kansas. His target was the Secretary of the Interior. His method—made painfully familiar by Senator MCCARTHY—was to distort wholly innocent acts and impute to them disloyal motives. Fortunately Secretary Chapman will have an opportunity this morning in his appearance before the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to show the absuridity of Mr. SCHOEPPEL's allegations. We have no doubt that he will do so with complete credit to himself.

The most sensational portion of Mr. SCHOEPPEL's speech in the Senate on Tuesday was an assertion that Secretary Chapman struck out the loyalty affidavit section of the oath of office when he became Under Secretary of the Interior Department on March 27, 1946. The Senator implied plainly that this represented on Mr. Chapman's part an attempt to conceal subversive affiliations. Of course, it represented nothing of the kind. It is common practice when high officials are sworn into office in the Government to mark the occasion with a ceremony attended by friends and well-wishers. To keep the ceremony from becoming tedious, it is customary to read only the first paragraph of the long affidavit—the portion containing the standard oath of office—and to omit the involved legal language dealing with advocacy of overthrow of the Government by force or violence. In Mr. Chapman's case, the oath was administered by the late Supreme Court Justice Wiley Rutledge; and because, for the simple sake of brevity, he read only the first paragraph, the balance of the affidavit was struck out by a clerk.

If Senator SCHOEPPEL was not familiar with this practice, he could have learned about it—and discovered for himself the simple and innocent explanation of the stricken paragraphs—by calling the Secretary of the Interior on the telephone and asking him a question. The plain fact is that Mr. Chapman, who has served the Interior Department in several capacities for a good many years, has on file there three separate affidavits in which the paragraphs stricken at the time of the formal swearing in ceremony of 1946 are included. Thus his loyalty to the United States is fully attested by oath. It is attested also by a long record of honorable and devoted public service.

Reds Threaten To Liquidate 700,000 Christians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 11 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, with the question as to seating representatives of the Chinese Communist Government in the United Nations coming up for decision next week, it is imperative that the Members of the Congress, our Delegate to the UN, and our people generally be fully informed as to the type of government which is seeking the official endorsement of our own country and the other members of the United Nations.

For this reason I would call to the attention of my colleagues an article from Lake Success in the Catholic Standard and Times, Philadelphia, Friday, September 1, concerning a memorandum sent by the Republic of Korea to each of the 57 member nations concerning what it believes to be the "imminent danger" of mass murder facing some 700,000 Christians in South Korean territory but held by the North Korean Communists.

I ask unanimous consent that it be included in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REDS READY TO LIQUIDATE 700,000 KOREAN CHRISTIANS

LAKE SUCCESS, N. Y., August 25.—The Republic of Korea has sent a memorandum to each of the 57 nation-members of the United Nations, alerting them of the "imminent danger" of mass murder facing some 700,000 Christians in South Korean territory now held by the North Korean Communists.

The memorandum appealed to the governments to ratify the United Nations genocide pact, which would outlaw as an international crime the extermination of racial, religious, and national groups. In the United States the pact is awaiting action by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The South Korean Government contends that the Communist invaders will try, and already are trying, to liquidate some 400,000 Protestants and 300,000 Catholics in the Red-held areas. The memorandum says the Christians have been singled out because they are impliedly opposed to rule by Moscow and because many of the South Korean leaders are Christians. The memorandum also states that the Seoul government was prepared to ratify the genocide pact but was prevented from doing so by the Communist invasion.

Resolution Adopted by Thirty-second Annual Convention of the American Legion, Department of Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I have been advised that the American Legion convention, meeting in Alexandria, Va., on August 19, 1950, adopted a resolution favoring House bill 9099, which I had introduced to allow physicians or dentists to make written statements in support of a veteran's claim for benefits under VA rules and regulations without requiring that the doctor's signature be notarized.

This practice of requiring the signatures to be notarized has caused considerable delay and certainly a great inconvenience to our busy doctors and it would be of considerable benefit to the veteran to be able to get these reports on the doctor's letterhead without requiring the doctor stop his work and find a notary public to witness his signature.

The resolution adopted by the Department of Virginia will be submitted to the national convention to be held in Los Angeles, Calif., and it is my hope that we will eventually be successful in enacting into law the provisions of H. R. 9099. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the resolution adopted by the American Legion Convention, Department of Virginia:

Whereas a hardship has been experienced by veterans and dependents in obtaining notaized statements from doctors and hospitals; and

Whereas this requirement on presumptive cases by the Veterans' Administration is believed to be the only place in the Federal Government where notarized statements are necessary in establishing proof; and

Whereas House bill 9099 has been introduced, instructing the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs not to require that a written statement signed by a physician or dentist be made under oath when submitted for the purpose of establishing an individual's eligibility for any law administered by the Administrator: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this Thirty-second Convention of the American Legion, Department of Virginia, go on record as endorsing H. R. 9099; and that this resolution be submitted by the department of Virginia to the national convention held in Los Angeles, Calif., and request that the national convention of the American Legion endorse our action.

I Am Grateful to My Friends

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I have just emerged from one of the most savage primary fights in history.

It is a matter of record that as great power as ever to be marshaled for the purpose of crushing a people's Representative was brought to bear against me last August 22.

While the alibi Als have been busy telling the people of my district why it was that they did not win, and have devoted acres of newspaper columns to their excuses, I have remained silent.

In view of these pathetic pantings, however, I feel the time has now come for me to break the silence, and clear the air.

My victory in the Republican primary was due to just one factor. My friends rallied around me as never before. They fought the people's enemies and they became aroused over the terrific campaign of falsehoods and innuendoes thrown about by irresponsibles.

I am grateful to my friends. I am grateful to the Republican committee men and women—and there were many of them—who refused to be turned against me even in the face of threats of retaliation in some cases.

I am grateful to the rank and file of our Republican voters who felt that an incumbency of six terms of productive representation in the interest of all the Americans of my district merited more than a slap-down.

I am grateful to the Townsend organization in my section which dared the wrath of the mighty in their struggle to keep me in Congress. The Townsendites furnished me haven and sanctuary on the platforms of each club in the Triple Cities, from which I could launch the counterattacks that won the victory.

Especially am I grateful to several Townsend leaders who ran a battering ram and effective interference for me when I was beset with a host of designing enemies.

The national Townsend representative from New York State, Mr. Merlin Casterlin, who served as my campaign manager, is personally attributed with keeping a powerful Member of Congress out of my district by his excellent and well-timed attack on this man in my defense. Thus, such formidable opposition was relegated to the sidelines and rendered impotent.

Though the Trojans were numerous, I am happy to say our friends overpowered them and the victory, which the professionals considered impossible, came to our side.

My thanks again to so many loyal, hardworking, devoted, and courageous companions. I have no intention of relinquishing any of them and will start building anew for any and all threats of 1952.

Are Ex-Service Men Subject to Draft?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, inquiries from ex-service men are coming into congressional offices asking whether under present law they are subject to be drafted again. This is a question that is worrying hundreds of thousands of young men who served in World War II and who are now just beginning to establish themselves in civilian and family life.

In view of the Korean war, the uncertainties of the war situation, and especially as to whether Uncle Sam by his action in Korea has already started world war III, the question is a serious one and should be given a direct, definite answer. The following facts secured from Selective Service sources and from the War Department indicate that the question is a major headache for both Selective Service and the War Department:

First. Under present policy, formulated but never officially promulgated, those GI's who saw at least 12 months of active duty in World War II need have no worry over the possibility of being recalled to duty—barring, of course, total mobilization for another world-wide conflagration.

Second. The 1940 Selective Service Act, as amended, provided that all enlisted men when discharged were to be placed in a special reserve, subject to recall at any time within 10 years, if needed. This provision has never been repealed, and is therefore still in force.

Third. The 1948 Selective Service Act provided that ex-service men with at least 12 months active service in World War II are exempt from the draft. It also provides that ex-service men who joined the National Guard or signed up for the Reserves are exempt from the draft. But both the National Guard and the Reserve units are subject to call, and some have already been recalled.

Fourth. In order to avoid confusion over the status of the two Selective Service Acts, we must keep in mind that any new act of Congress supersedes an earlier act. Where their provisions conflict, the conflicting provisions of the earlier act are nullified. But where the provisions of the earlier act do not conflict with the provisions of the later act, they remain in force unless specifically repealed by the later act. Since the 1948 Selective Service Act did not specifically repeal the act of 1940, the provisions of both acts—where they do not conflict—are present law and available to the President.

Mr. Speaker, the whole question is in doubt. The thing is in a terrible mess. If the legal authorities of the Government decide that the provisions of the 1940 act override the present administrative policy that is based upon the 1948 act, then ex-service men would become subject to recall regardless of 12 months of active service. This matter should be cleared up immediately. Conflicting opinions and uncertainties in connection with this question should be settled by new legislation. This could easily be done by a simple bill to repeal that provision of the 1940 Selective Service Act that places the men when discharged into a special reserve for 10 years, subject to call if needed. Congress should act in this matter now before it adjourns.

Need for Pipeline to West Coast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 1, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the West Coast Pipeline Co., of Dallas, Tex., made up of some 50 independent oil operators in the Southwest, proposes to build a 20-inch pipeline of 200,000 barrels daily capacity, to carry crude oil from Texas to the Los Angeles area.

This to me appears to be a national-defense measure and in the best interests of our country, and one that should certainly be seriously considered at the present time when our security and safety is threatened.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article entitled "Background Information on Need for Pipeline to West Coast":

BACKGROUND INFORMATION ON NEED FOR PIPELINE TO WEST COAST

West Coast Pipeline Co., Dallas, made up of some 50 independent oil operators in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California.

proposes to build a 20-inch pipeline, of 200,000 barrels daily capacity, at cost of $66,000,000, to carry crude oil from Monahans, Tex., to the Los Angeles area. The line would tap the Permian Basin of west Texas and New Mexico.

The officers are: President, R. J. Bradley, Dallas, who is also president of the San Juan Oil Co.; vice presidents, R. L. Foree, Dallas, president of Texas Independent Producers and Royalty Owners' Association, and Jack Frost, Dallas; and secretary-treasurer, Jay Simmons, Dallas.

The company is made up wholly of independents.

They have been instructed that they do not have to file an application with the Interstate Commerce Commission to build the line, but are to make a report later. The pipeline will be a common carrier. Application for priorities and allocations of steel will be made with the proper Federal agency to be given that authority after the economic controls bill is law.

The company was organized last January and was progressing steadily toward its goal when the Korean war started, making it necessary thereafter to look to the Government for allocations of steel.

The idea to have a pipeline to the west coast started years ago as the Permian Basin became productive. There are ample pipelines going to the Gulf coast and to the East, but none leading to the west coast where oil reserves seem to be playing out. During the last war it became apparent that the only way Uncle Sam's ships could be refueled was by shipping oil from the Southwest and West to California by railroad tank car or tanker.

It was during the last war that Texas independent oil operators began telling the Government to no avail that shipping oil by railroad and tankers through the Panama Canal was putting too much dependence on facilities that might easily be blocked for the remainder of the war by bombing.

The Big Inch and Little Big Inch lines were performing so effectively on the east coast with their deliveries of oil that it was felt this was proof of the logic of the plan for the west coast.

Of this, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram on July 28, 1945, had this to say:

"An opportunity to rectify partially the mistake has now been afforded PAW by the sponsors of the proposed pipeline. At their request, a rehearing on the application was held recently before the Transportation Subcommittee of district 3 of the PAW and it is reported to have recommended tentatively a 14-inch line. The final decision is in the hands of PAW Director of Transportation George Wilson and Ralph K. Davies, Deputy Petroleum Administrator. Mr. Davies in private life, it will be remembered, is vice president of the Standard Oil Co. of California and is serving in Washington on leave of absence.

"In view of the rail congestion and the unnecessary expense to the Government which has resulted from the lack of the proposed pipeline, if the permit for it is again refused, as sources close to the administration have forecast, it will be interesting, indeed, to hear Mr. Davies' justification for the action.

"If the pipeline had been authorized last year it could have been completed long before this and would now be delivering 175,000 barrels of this rich west Texas oil, or as much of it as needed, to California refineries. Since it was not built, the quantity which is reaching California is far short of that figure. At the moment, 36,000 barrels are being shipped by rail, and this is to be increased to 56,000 barrels daily if and when additional shipping facilities can be obtained.

"Even the 36,000 barrels now being moved is placing an undue burden on the railroads which are overtaxed with unprecedented troop movements and a staggering load of war freight that can be handled in no other way."

Bradley states these facts in justification of the critical need for such a pipeline:

The east coast has over 110,000 miles of pipeline bringing oil either directly or indirectly to the east coast from the Southwest for the safety of this Nation, plus all inland waterways.

The west coast has not one mile of pipeline from other oil-producing areas, and no waterways other than the Panama Canal. What if something were to happen to it?

There are only two railroads leading from oil areas to the west coast, the Southern Pacific and the Santa Fe.

There are 8,006 miles of United States Pacific coast line which must be defended.

What if a bomb were to be dropped on the west coast refineries?

West Coast Pipe Line Co. proposes not only to pipe oil to the west coast for refining there but in case anything should happen to those refineries, then it will have the pipeline facilities so set up that in a matters of hours it can switch the machinery and be delivering refined oil from Gulf coast refineries to the west coast for our ships and planes. There are already sufficient pipelines to which it could connect which lead from west Texas to the Gulf coast refineries. It would be simple to reverse this process and deliver products.

The Permian Basin of west Texas-New Mexico is the United Nations' only safe and dependable supply of crude oil. This area now has over one-half million barrels of excess oil available daily for this pipeline.

The west coast oil supply is already severely taxed to supply existing civilian demands, to say nothing of the needs of our Armed Forces.

Time is particularly important in the delivery of oil to the war fronts. From Houston to Panama Canal to Los Angeles is 4,406 miles. To Japan from San Francisco is 4,536 miles. From the west coast to Honolulu is 2,041 miles and from Pearl Harbor to Tokyo is approximately 4,300 miles.

Time is the important thing and a pipeline could deliver more oil quicker and cheaper than railroad tank cars.

To deliver 200,000 barrels of oil per day to the Pacific coast, it will take 12,320 railroad tank cars, 140 locomotives and 2,100 men, or 60 ocean tankers and 3,000 men plus convoy or this 20-inch pipeline and 200 men.

This pipeline which is of the utmost importance in the national defense can be constructed in a period from 4 to 6 months from the time the material is made available.

Fuel to the west coast from the United States continental reserves is a must for our national security.

During the last 20 months of World War II, according to PAW chart No. 34, there were 65,000,000 barrels of crude oil shipped by tank car at $2.28 per barrel, or at a cost of $148,000,000. This is about 2½ times the cost of the pipeline to the west coast.

The 20-inch line could deliver 200,000 barrels of oil daily.

Delivering oil by tank car to the west coast involves enormous waste of the taxpayer's money. The pipeline will save $1.78 per barrel.

With 36,000 barrels a day being moved, the waste amounted to $82,080 every time the sun rose and set, or $2,462,080 monthly.

In July 1945, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram said: "If and when facilities can be provided to increase the shipments to the 56,000 barrels a day which PAW has requested, the waste will amount to $127,000 a day, $3,830,400 a month. On this basis, the annual waste will amount to $45,964,800, which is almost equivalent to the cost of the proposed pipeline.

"This makes it appear that the pipeline would have been a good investment even if the Government itself had borne its construction cost. But in this case the cost was to have been borne by private investors and all of the savings the line could have made possible would have been realized by the Government.

"Although $47,000,000 is a lot of money, it is less than half the cost of one battleship —and a pipeline is unsinkable."

Then, too, it is important to give consideration to two other important factors. First, the railroads at the present time inasmuch as most of them are propelled and driven by Diesel engines, will use much more fuel than before and their needs must be supplied.

Second, it is also a matter of common knowledge that with the use of jet planes an even greater demand will have to be supplied.

At present the military says it takes 20 days by Liberty ship from San Francisco to Yokohama and 13 days by a ship making 15 knots. To Pusan this time is lengthened by 1 to 2 days.

To load and unload a cargo ship requires 7 to 8 days.

Therefore, the time it takes to get oil from interior of the United States to the west coast for ship loading should certainly be speeded since so much time will be required for the delivery process after the tanker is loaded.

A pipeline would greatly expedite this time for delivery. Since sea distance is so great, land time for delivery should be cut.

Another thing, railroads should not be taxed. They should be left free to transport men. Here are some figures. To move an armored division, 77 trains are required, 33 freight trains of 70 cars each and 44 passenger trains of 10 cars each. An infantry division requires 73 trains, 23 freight trains of 70 cars each and 50 passenger trains of 10 cars each.

"The operation in Korea," to quote the National Defense Establishment, "is in large measure a war of logistics."

EXCERPTS FROM TESTIMONY GIVEN AT CONGRESSIONAL HEARINGS PROVING NEED FOR PIPELINE TO WEST COAST IN NATIONAL DEFENSE PROGRAM

"Before a special committee of the United States Senate investigating petroleum resources, Seventy-ninth Congress, first session, pursuant to Senate Resolution 36, held November 28, 29, and 30, 1945, factual data was submitted which supports the need for a pipeline. The construction of this pipeline is imperative if we are to be in a position to defend our 8,000-mile Pacific coastline. The true facts are that there is barely enough crude oil produced on the west coast to supply the civilian demand, to say nothing of the growing military demand in the Pacific." (Statement taken from company brief.)

Commander Bradley, who qualified himself as having been in the oil business for approximately 15 years, primarily connected with the Standard Oil Co. of California, in testifying before the House Subcommittee on Appropriations on February 28, 1946, said in part as follows:

"It would be difficult to say to the constituents of you gentlemen that Alaska, No. 4, if developed will guard us against all future requirements of petroleum for war. But there is no place on the west coast today that offers any future hope. I think you know that there have been holes sunk in practically every section of California. Certainly we will get more oil, and we will probably get another billion and a half barrels out of California before it gets right down to bedrock, and we will develop the tar sands at Sisquoc and probably go into greater secondary recovery, and maybe out into the ocean. When I say 'we' I mean the industry. But the fact remains, that California is expected to, in a very few years be unable to meet its peacetime requirements for oil—we said 1955 to be ultraconservative—my personal view is 1949, others in high positions say even less than that. As a matter of fact, Mr. Collier, chairman of the board of Standard of California, before the Senate Naval Affairs Committee yesterday discussed 1947—there is no question that California has reached a peak if there is an area of which that can be said. Therefore, if we look forward to the future of oil on the west coast, where in time of emergency there simply would not be enough, not only to supply the normal requirements of the area, but where there would not be enough to fight a war at all, we would have nothing to contribute." (P. 1729 of said hearing.)

Further in his testimony, Commander Bradley stated:

"Paradoxically enough, because California is growing, and more people are coming to it, the civilian demand is greater than it was in 1941 by about 14 percent, so that, with California domestic demand increasing, and with the excess capacity gone, it will be partially dependent upon other sources. The point is, of course, that if a war comes along, we do not have an excess capacity to draw upon, an excess capacity that is already developed.

"And now we have arrived at a point, a year after the European war ended and many months after the Japanese war ended where right at this moment, as we sit here, the Navy has ships swinging at anchor in west coast harbors because they have not enough fuel oil to go back and bring the boys home. That is pretty important information. They have not been swinging long, that is true, we manage to get them going, but they are short 47,000 barrels a day of Navy special fuel oil and 23,000 barrels a day of Diesel oil, so that we cannot carry out the program set by you gentlemen right here on the Hill.

"It means the Navy has officers in west coast ports every day trying to get fuel oil, and they have not been able to get enough of it. However, the fact remains, that there is not enough fuel oil in California right today. Where would we be if we were fighting a war?"

L. W. MacNaughton of the firm of DeGolyer & MacNaughton, employed as special consultant to the Secretary of the Navy, appeared in behalf of the same appropriations bill as recorded on page 1732 of the hearings. He said:

"The value of petroleum reserves to the Navy, of course, is greater if it is located within the continental United States. It can be defended much better than if is located outside the continental United States."

Referring to California production, Mr. MacNaughton said:

"They will still be producing oil, but by 1950 they will not be able to meet the total market demand."

Commodore W. G. Greenman, United States Navy, director Naval Petroleum Reserves, also testified in support of such appropriations bill. On page 1935 of such hearings is found this very vital testimony, from this officer who was entirely conversant with the subject matter at hand:

"But when you get out on the west coast and you begin to consider operations in the Pacific on the order of this last war, and you realize that the oil resources of the State of California are going down, you see the importance of having in reserve and available to the armed services a supplemental source of oil.

"During the last war the railroads tried to move to California 50,000 barrels a day to boost up the failing supply but they never got much over 25,000 because the railroads just could not carry it.

"For future emergencies involving the Pacific area we have studied the possibilities of putting in a pipeline comparable to the Big Inch, but then we find even with the railroads and the proposed pipeline operating at maximum capacity we would still be short of oil sufficient to meet war operations in the Pacific on a scale comparable to those of the last war" (p. 1935 of said hearings).

Commodore Greenman also appeared before the Special Committee of the United States Senate investigating petroleum resources. His testimony is found at pages 265–273 of the hearings held by such committee on November 28 through November 30, 1945. Commodore Greenman in part said:

"Mr. Chairman, the military services are primarily responsible for the defense of the Nation in time of war. Petroleum products in ample supply and available wherever needed are absolutely essential to the discharge of their responsibility. In the recent great conflict, approximately 60 percent of the supplies shipped overseas was made up of petroleum products" (pp. 265–266 of said hearings).

Conditions today will verify that the need is even greater now than it was when these statements were made in 1945 and 1946.

The Railroad Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THRUSTON B. MORTON
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, since the new social-security law has gone into effect, I think it is high time that the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce review in its entirety the Railroad Retirement Act. Railroad employees are not under the provisions of the general Social Security Act. Several years ago the Congress established for railroad workers an independent retirement system. Contributions are made by both the employees and the railroad. This original act was modified during the Seventy-ninth Congress by what is known as the Crosser amendment. It is my opinion that grave discrepancies exist between the payments made and the benefits received by railroad workers as compared to the 45,000,000 other employees now covered by social security. I do not claim to be an actuary, and I frankly admit that the problem of equalizing these discrepancies is highly complex in nature; however, I am convinced that the proper committee should immediately launch a full-scale and thorough study. This will enable the Congress to pass any corrective legislation that proves necessary. From my own limited knowledge of the subject it is my conviction that it is a discrimination against the railroad worker. I do not believe that his benefits are as generous when compared with his payments as are those of persons covered by social security.

It has been argued that the Railroad Retirement Fund is on a much sounder basis than the Social Security Fund. This I think is true; yet we know from a practical standpoint that social-security obligations will be met as long as the Government of the United States maintains a credit standing. It also seems to be obvious that should the credit of the United States Government collapse the value of the Railroad Retirement Fund would likewise collapse. The Government bond today plays such an important part in our entire financial structure that one cannot live without the other. If the bond goes, the structure will tumble like a house of cards. The Railroad Retirement Fund will be caught in that destruction. It is only fair to the railroad employees to place them on a comparable basis with the employees of other industries.

I trust that the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has the legislative jurisdiction over the Railroad Retirement Act, will set up the proper subcommittee to make the study and to report its recommendations to correct any unfairness that may be found. No segment of our society should enjoy any undue privilege. By the same token no segment should be unduly penalized. The railroad workers constitute an important segment of our society, and they should be accorded fair and equitable treatment.

Legislation Should be Enacted to Permit Colonel Mashbir's Return to Regular Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article from the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star on August 19, 1950, with reference to Col. Sidney F. Mashbir:

HE QUIT THE ARMY TO SPY ON JAPAN
(By William Hines)

Five years ago today a stocky American officer stood on the apron of Nichols Field, Manila, awaiting the arrival of an airplane. The officer was Col. Sidney Forrester Mashbir, of 4934 Indian Lane NW., and the aircraft he "sweated out" was the peace plane carrying armistice envoys of the imperial Japanese Government to General MacArthur's Philippine headquarters.

In all but legal fact, World War II ended the moment the plane taxied to a halt and the Japanese envoys dismounted. At the same instant, a strange and unprecedented American spy story reached its climax.

Colonel Mashbir had been an American spy in Japan in the years after World War I. He had been pledged to secrecy about his mission by congressional leaders in 1928—secrecy that would last until "after the war with Japan," as one perceptive legislator put it to him.

Even as a junior officer in the Arizona National Guard before the First World War, Sidney Mashbir had been intelligence-conscious. When he joined the Regular Army in 1917, he specialized in military counterintelligence, and after the war, developed a plan for an espionage network in Japan.

In the normal, unimaginative fashion of the Army, Captain Mashbir was posted to Tokyo as an assistant military attaché. Within 24 hours after confidential orders were handed him in Washington, an official of the Japanese Foreign Office in Tokyo queried the American Embassy there, "Who is this Mashbir who has been assigned to your Embassy?" Some one, it was plain, had planted a Japanese spy in the American War Department.

It became equally plain to the military attaché's staff in Tokyo that if Captain Mashbir were to be of any value as a spy, he must sever his connections with the Army. And, remembering the Japanese agent in the War Department, the break must be a genuine one, and its cause equally authentic.

Colonel Mashbir had been a civil engineer before he joined the Army, and in 1921 the up-and-coming Japanese were screaming for engineers to supervise building projects. He found little difficulty in lining up construction projects which would assure him an income of $60,000 to $80,000 a year. With these commitments, he resigned from the Army, explaining that civilian opportunities offered him more than he could ever hope to make in military life. His resignation was accepted with the subrosa understanding that when his spy mission was completed he could rejoin the Army in his old grade of captain.

Much of his engineering revenue was plowed back into espionage activities which he even now refuses to discuss in detail. The great Japanese earthquake of 1923, however, put him out of business. He sought to rejoin the Army.

By then the Government was in the midst of an economy wave, and he was informed that current policy prevented his being readmitted to the service at a time when other men were being discharged. For nearly 5 years he sought by one means or another—including private legislation in Congress—to get back in service. Then, in 1928, he was asked, "for patriotic reasons," to say no more until after the showdown with Japan.

When war broke out in 1941, Colonel Mashbir returned to active duty as an emergency officer and organized General MacArthur's Allied Translating and Interpreting Service. As a sideline he conducted psychological warfare against the Japanese he knew so well, and counseled General MacArthur as the war neared its end to promise the Japanese that no harm would come to their Emperor.

Finally, in 1947, private bills were introduced in Congress for his reappointment to the Regular Army. Loosely drawn, the bills were opposed by the Army as setting a precedent for other, less justified, appointments.

Colonel Mashbir appears—5 years after his encounter with the Japanese at Nichols Field—to have a good chance for readmission to the Regular Establishment. A new bill, by Delegate FARRINGTON of Hawaii, spells out Colonel Mashbir's peacetime spy services as a preamble to the proposal for his return to the Regular Army as a colonel.

Well-to-do from civilian investments and patents, Colonel Mashbir has had no ax to grind in his 25-year fight to get back into the service. Why has he sought so persistently to rejoin the Regulars?

"There is a place in the Army today for men who are willing to do the kind of work I did in the 1920s," he explains. "Perhaps complete separation from service will be necessary if they are to carry out their missions. I want to establish for them a precedent that will insure them a continuation of their military careers when their secret work is over."

Slave Labor in Russia—Free Labor in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege in the fall of 1945 to be a member of a special congressional committee that was authorized and directed by the House of Representatives to make a study of postwar conditions in Europe and the Near East. We visited England, France, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Germany, Russia, Iran, Egypt, Greece, and Italy. The information we received was not only interesting but in some particulars astounding.

One of the most revealing areas was the Soviet Union. It was surprising to learn, notwithstanding the claim that communism is a system or ideology that is designed to advance the well-being of the workers, yet, in Russia where that ideology is supposed to have full sway, we found that the standard of living of the workers was far, very far, below that in our own country.

I have read with interest an article by Arnold Beichman, AFL News Service, appearing in the Progressive Labor World, a newspaper published in Philadelphia, Pa., issue of August 31, 1950. This article parallels in every particular the information we gained as a result of the study we made as a committee of Congress. In no way is the contrast between communism and democracy, as systems of government, more plainly demonstrated than in the treatment of labor. The article, which I include as part of these remarks, makes plain that under communism in Russia there is a system of what might properly be termed "slave labor," in view of lack of choice of employment. When this is contrasted with the free labor of America it makes crystal clear there is no system of government that provides the dignity and importance to labor, which it is entitled to have, as in America and other countries where the principles of democracy prevail.

The article reads as follows:

HARSH LABOR RULES OF SOVIET EXPOSED TO UNITED NATIONS—AFL MAKES REPORTS ON SLAVE LABOR CONDITIONS FOUND IN RUSSIA—ICFTU DOCUMENT—EXPECT FULL-DRESS DEBATE ON ACCUSATIONS OF LABOR UNIONS

(By Arnold Beichman)

The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions has submitted to the United Nations Economic and Social Council a document bristling with charges of violations of trade-union and workers' rights by the Soviet Union.

A report of these violations, based on Soviet publications and documents was submitted in Geneva, Switzerland, by Miss Toni Sender, ICFTU representative, to the UN Council. It is expected that a full-dress debate at the next session of the group will occur on the basis of these accusations.

The report just received here by the AFL News Service is a mass of detailed information—with dates, places, and names—about the slave labor conditions extant in the Soviet Union. Here are some of the report's highlights:

Trade-unions in the Soviet Union since 1932 have not called a convention. In 1934, the practice of fixing wage rates and working conditions by collective bargaining was discontinued. Since then, wages in the U. S. S. R. have been determined by Soviet Government agencies.

In 1947 the idea of collective agreements was reintroduced, but in name only, since such currently negotiated agreements in the Soviet Union exclude wages and working conditions.

Trade-unions in the Soviet Union are directly under the thumb of the Communist Party. The ICFTU report quotes a statement from the Soviet magazine, Trud (April 20, 1949), by V. V. Kuznetsov, chairman of the Central Council of Soviet Trade Unions, that "in all their activities the trade-unions unrelentingly follow the directives of Lenin and Stalin on the role of trade-unions."

The ordinary Soviet laborer is as tied to his machine as if he were chained to it. Surrounded by laws which inhibit free choice of job, hedged about by regulations which bar movement from one job to a better job, he faces drastic penalties for the most trivial offenses.

One decree June 26, 1940, declared that no worker could leave his job or apply for another job without the consent of his employer. A worker found guilty of such offense faces imprisonment up to 4 months. A worker employed in a munitions factory who is found guilty of the same offense can go to prison for as high as 8 years.

The Soviet Government has published a work called Model Rules for Workers. According to section 21, disciplinary penalties are visited upon any worker "who is late in coming to work without valid reason or leaving his work to go to lunch too early or late in returning after lunch time or slacking during working hours." This provision applies only to those less than 20 minutes late. Anybody more than 20 minutes late is liable to criminal prosecution.

There are special regulations regarding "the material liability of workers for damages" and losses of plant property for which they are made responsible. Management has a unilateral right to deduct from wages specific sums as compensation for losses and damages attributed to the workers. This is from the Official Textbook of Soviet Labor Law, pages 284 to 297. Workers have to pay five times the value of the actual loss if any raw materials, partly processed, or manufactured goods, tools, working clothes, and other factory property entrusted to them are lost or damaged because of their negligence.

The individual worker has no control or bargaining power in determining his wage. His foreman decides that, based on an official handbook which classifies various jobs and the corresponding wage category.

"In effect, no diversity," says an official comment in 1947 (No. 8, Trade Union, organ of the Central Council of Soviet Unions), "in the determination of wage systems and levels can be admitted under the conditions of unified national economic planning.

"For this reason wages are regulated in our country in a centralized manner by the Government of the U. S. S. R. through appropriate normative acts (that is, acts having the character of binding legal rule), and not by contract. The inviolability of this principle was emphasized by the decree of the Council of Ministers of the U. S. S. R. of February 4, 1947, according to which it is expressly forbidden to include in collective agreements any system of pay for the work of manual workers, engineers, technicians, and white-collar workers which has not been approved by the Government."

The outgrowth of such literal wage slavery is the widespread use and government-endorsed practices of piece-rate cutting and speed-up. The foreman is assigned the task of revising piece rates and forces him to use "drive" methods.

Another sample of how to enslave workers is the outlawry by the Soviet constitution of a secret ballot in the election of so-called trade-union group organizers.

The group, with a maximum of 20 members, is the lowest unit of the Soviet trade unions. The key person in this group is the group organizer who is the unit's steward and should be the person through whom the workers' sentiments and desires are transmitted. But the group organizer is imposed upon the group and not voted on by the secret ballot.

The ICFTU statement to the UN Council charges that "trade-unions, in the true sense of the word, do not exist in the Soviet Union." It further charges that "wherever the Soviet influence exists the same pattern is applied."

My Voting Record in the Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. GARY CLEMENTE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. CLEMENTE. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the social-security legislation because it is my considered judgment that this is one of the most democratically progressive bills of the Eighty-first Congress, and is in the best interests of the people. The entire legislative program of the Eighty-first Congress is replete with progressive legislation which is far-reaching in its effect on the people of this country.

In attempting to fulfill my obligation to the people of my district I voted for all major legislative actions of the Eighty-first Congress.

As the Eighty-first Congress draws to its close I deem it appropriate to report briefly on my voting record in that Congress on some of the more important issues.

It is my honest belief that my voting record during this Congress spells out a pattern of true progressive legislation that has been in the best interest of the Nation, my State, Queens County, and, more particularly, the people of the Fourth Congressional District of New York, whom I have been privileged to represent.

The last 2 years unquestionably have been the most eventful peacetime years in our history. As such the issues have been momentous, and while the task is not yet finished, a great deal has been accomplished in these 2 years.

During the past 2 years I have supported continuance of Marshall-plan assistance, low-income housing and slum clearance, revision of social-security regulations, an increase in the minimum wage to 75 cents per hour, economic and military aid for Korea, and a great deal of legislation designed to safeguard national security.

From time to time I have introduced legislation in the House, among others, the following measures: A resolution providing for the return to the United States of ships delivered to Russia under the Lend-Lease Act; a resolution providing for the exercise of the veto to prevent Communist China from becoming a member of the United Nations; a bill removing the limitation on the commencement of prosecutions for offenses arising from espionage and for other purposes, which means that a man is punishable for subversive acts at any time during his life; a bill providing for the construction of a veterans' hospital in Queens County, N. Y.; a bill requiring that a loyalty oath be taken by all officers and employees of the United States Government; several amendments to the social-security regulations, some of which were enacted in H. R. 6000, such as increased monthly payments and including disability benefits; legislation attempting to establish a Federal district in Queens County, including a collector of internal revenue and branches of all Federal agencies; a bill to rescind the order of the Postmaster General curtailing postal services—I voted for similar legislation when it reached the floor of the House.

I stand on this record and pledge my every effort to continue to support legislation in the best interest of my country and the people of Queens County.

Summary of Principal Provisions of Social Security Act Amendments of 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 11 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a summary of the principal provisions of the Social Security Act amendments of 1950 (H. R. 6000) which was recently passed by Congress and signed by the President. This summary was prepared by Mr. Wilbur J. Cohen, technical adviser to the Commissioner of the Social Security Administration. It is an excellent document in easily understood language and clearly presented.

I have been informed that many Members of both the Senate and the House of Representatives are interested in obtaining reprints of this document for their constituents or for their own use. The Social Security Administration, however, does not have the funds to supply sufficient copies of the summary to meet the demand. The Government Printing Office has estimated that the document will require three and a quarter pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at a total cost of $266.50. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed regardless of the additional cost of printing.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF PRINCIPAL PROVISIONS OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950 (H. R. 6000) AS SIGNED BY THE PRESIDENT

BRIEF SUMMARY OF THE MAJOR PROVISIONS

The new law makes 30 major changes in the programs established under the Social Security Act.

FEDERAL OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE

There are 21 major changes in the insurance program. They are, as follows:

1. Extension of coverage to self-employed persons other than farmers and certain professional persons.
2. Coverage of regularly employed agricultural workers.
3. Coverage of regularly employed domestic workers.
4. Coverage of State and local government employees not members of retirement systems, through voluntary agreements between the State and the Federal Government, and compulsory coverage of certain employees of certain transit systems taken over by States or local governments after 1936.
5. Provision for voluntary coverage of employees of nonprofit organizations at the option of the employer and the employees.
6. Coverage of certain Federal employees not covered under retirement systems.
7. Coverage of employees and self-employed persons in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.
8. Coverage of certain Americans employed outside the United States.
9. Inclusion of certain additional persons as employees for coverage purposes.
10. A substantial liberalization of the benefit formula for future beneficiaries.
11. Elimination of the increase in benefits for years of contributions to the insurance program.
12. Liberalization of the method of computing average monthly wage for benefit purposes.
13. Increase in the wage base for benefit and contribution purposes from $3,000 to $3,600.
14. A substantial increase in benefits for current beneficiaries, averaging 77½ percent.
15. Liberalization of the eligibility provisions so as to make it easier for persons to qualify for benefits within the next decade.
16. Payment of benefits to dependent husbands and widowers of insured women workers.
17. Liberalization of survivors' insurance benefits with respect to insured married women.
18. Payment of the lump-sum death benefit in all cases of insured deceased workers.
19. Increase in the benefits for dependent parents and for the first child in a family from 50 to 75 percent of the primary insurance benefit.
20. Increase in the amount a beneficiary may earn in covered employment without loss of benefits from $14.99 to $50, and elimination of the retirement test at age 75.
21. Provision of wage credits of $160 for each month of military service during World War II.

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

There are five major changes in the assistance program. They are, as follows:

1. Provisions for Federal grants to the States for the needy permanently and totally disabled.
2. Inclusion in aid to dependent children of one adult relative in a family, for Federal matching purposes.
3. Provision for mandatory exemption of $50 earned income for the blind, beginning July 1952.
4. Extension of Federal grants for public assistance to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.
5. Provision for Federal grants to aid-to-the-blind programs in Pennsylvania, Missouri, and Nevada until July 1, 1955.

OTHER PROGRAMS

There are four other major changes, as follows:

1. Increase in Federal grants for maternal and child health from $11,000,000 to $16,500,000 annually (except that for present fiscal year the grant would be $15,000,000); for crippled children, from $7,500,000 to $15,000,000 (for present fiscal year, $12,000,000); and for child welfare services, from $3,500,000 to $10,000,000.
2. Amendment of the child welfare program by adding the following proviso: "Provided, That in developing such services for children the facilities and experience of voluntary agencies shall be utilized in accordance with child-care programs and arrangements in the State and local communities as may be authorized by the State."

3. Continuation for two additional years of the George loan fund for State unemployment insurance funds which run low.

4. Provision for review by State courts of administrative decisions by State agencies in certain cases prior to a ruling by the Secretary of Labor on conformity questions under the Federal unemployment insurance law.

The following summary explains in more detail the provisions of the new legislation:

OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE (TITLE II)

I. Coverage

The new law extends compulsory coverage under old-age and survivors insurance to about 7,500,000 persons, and voluntary coverage will be available for about 2,000,000 employees of State and local governments and nonprofit organizations. Table 1 shows the number of persons covered in the new groups.

The specific changes in coverage are, as follows:

A. Self-employed: The new law covers approximately 4,750,000 self-employed persons whose annual net income from self-employment is at least $400. It does not cover self-employed farmers, physicians, lawyers, dentists, osteopaths, chiropractors, optometrists, Christian Science practitioners, naturopaths, professional engineers, veterinarians, architects, funeral directors, or certified, registered, licensed, or full-time practicing public accountants.

B. Agricultural workers: The new law covers certain borderline agricultural labor, such as processing workers. In addition, it covers "regularly employed" agricultural workers. A farm worker is "regularly employed" if he has 3 months' continuous service for one employer before coverage starts, and thereafter employment by that employer on a full-time basis for at least 60 days in a calendar quarter with cash wages of at least $50 for services in the quarter.

TABLE 1.—Extension of coverage under the new law (number in an average week)

	Number covered
Nonfarm self-employed	4,700,000
Agricultural workers	850,000
Borderline employment	200,000
Regularly employed on farms	650,000
Domestic workers	1,000,000
Employees of nonprofit organizations (voluntary coverage)	600,000
Employees of State and local governments (voluntary coverage)	[1] 1,450,000
Federal civilian employees not under a retirement system	250,000
Employees outside the United States	150,000
Employment in Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands	400,000
New definition of "employee"	400,000
Total under compulsory coverage	7,750,000
Total under voluntary coverage	2,050,000
Grand total	9,800,000

[1] Exclusive of a relatively small number of transit workers who will be compulsorily covered.

C. Domestic workers: The new law covers approximately 1,000,000 domestic workers not in farm homes—those in farm homes would be covered as agricultural workers. A domestic worker is covered if employed by a single employer for at least 24 days in a calendar quarter with cash wages of at least $50 for services in the quarter.

D. Employees of nonprofit organizations: The new legislation contains the following provisions for voluntary coverage of employees of nonprofit organizations:

1. If the employer does not agree to pay his share of the contribution the employees cannot be covered.

2. Even if the employer agrees to pay his share none of the employees can be covered unless two-thirds of them accept coverage.

3. If two-thirds or more of the employees accept coverage those employees who do so, plus any employees hired in the future, will be covered.

4. Coverage must be for an initial period of at least 8 years, and in addition 2 years' advance notice must be given before coverage can be terminated. Thus, the minimum period of coverage is 10 years.

Ministers and members of religious orders will continue to be excluded.

E. Employees of State and local governments: The new law provides voluntary coverage for approximately 1,450,000 State and local government employees through agreements between the States and the Federal Government. Public employees covered under a retirement system on the date when the agreement is made applicable to the governmental unit which employs them cannot be covered under old-age and survivors' insurance. In addition, the new law extends compulsory coverage to employees of transit systems taken over by State or local governments after 1936 unless they are covered by a general retirement system—if the transit system was taken over before 1951 the employees are covered even if under a general retirement system unless that system is protected by the State constitution.

F. Federal civilian employees not under a retirement system: The new law covers employees of the United States Government, or of wholly owned corporations of the United States, who are not covered under any Federal retirement system. This results in covering most short-term Federal employees, including those serving under temporary appointment pending final determination of eligibility for permanent or indefinite appointment. In addition, employees of the following instrumentalities of the Federal Government are covered: national farm-loan associations; production credit associations; Federal credit unions; the Tennessee Valley Authority (if not under the TVA retirement system); post exchanges and similar activities under the National Defense Establishments; State, county, and community committees under the Production and Marketing Administration; and certain employees of the Federal Reserve System.

G. Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands: The new law extends coverage to employees and the self-employed in the Virgin Islands and (if requested by the Territorial Legislature) in Puerto Rico, on the same basis as in the continental United States.

H. Americans outside the United States: The new law extends coverage to Americans employed outside of the United States by an American employer, and to employees on American aircraft outside of the United States.

I. Definition of employee: The new law defines an employee as "any individual who, under the usual common-law rules applicable in determining the employer-employee relationship, has the status of an employee," and also covers as employees (1) full-time life-insurance salesmen, (2) agent-drivers or commission drivers engaged in distributing meat or bakery products, vegetables or fruit products, beverages (other than milk), or laundry or dry cleaning services, (3) full-time traveling or city salesmen (other than house-to-house salesmen) taking orders from retailers, hotels, wholesalers, jobbers, and contractors, and (4) industrial homeworkers who earn at least $50 in a calendar quarter if they are subject to regulation under State law and work in accordance with specifications prescribed by the employer.

J. Effective date: The effective date for the new coverage will be January 1, 1951.

II. Benefit amounts

A. Current beneficiaries: Under the new law, persons currently receiving benefits will have their benefits increased on the average by about 77½ percent. Increases will range from about 50 percent for the highest benefit groups to about 100 percent for low-benefit groups. The average primary benefit of approximately $26 per month for a retired insured worker will be increased to about $46. Table 2 shows the increased amounts which will be payable.

$40	64.00
$46	68.50

B. Future beneficiaries: The new law provides for a new benefit formula for persons retiring in the future. It will be applicable to those who have at least six quarters of coverage after 1950, if it results in a higher benefit than would the use of the old formula plus the increase for present beneficiaries. For persons now under age 22, the new formula will be the only one used.

The new formula is 50 percent of the first $100 of average monthly wage, plus 15 percent of the next $200 (based on a maximum wage base of $3,600 per year). The increase in benefits for years of coverage provided for under the old law has been eliminated although the Social Security Administration had recommended that it be retained.

Under the new law the old minimum primary benefit of $10 is increased to $25, except that for those with wages averaging under $35 per month the minimum may be as low as $20. The old maximum family benefit of $85 is increased to $150 (but not more than 80 percent of the average monthly wage).

Under the new formula, average benefit amounts in the next decade will be about 110 percent higher than under the old law. Table 3 compares the benefits payable under the new formula with those payable under the old law.

400	78.00	120.00

[1] 40 percent of the first $50 plus 10 percent of the next $200, increased by 1 percent for each year of coverage.

[2] 50 percent of the first $100 plus 15 percent of the next $200; no increment for years of coverage.

C. Computation of average wage: The new law does not change the basic method of computing the average monthly wage, but if the individual has six quarters of coverage after 1950 and if a larger benefit will result, his average wage will be computed over the period following 1950 rather than from 1936 on.

III. Eligibility for benefits

Under the new law future eligibility requirements are greatly liberalized by requiring quarters of coverage for only one-half of the number of quarters since 1950, instead of since 1936 as under the old law. Quarters of coverage earned before 1951 may be counted toward the requirement. Thus a person aged 62 or over on January 1, 1950, will be fully insured for benefits at age 65 if he has at least six quarters of coverage acquired at any time. The maximum requirement for fully insured status remains at 40 quarters of coverage, and the minimum at 6 quarters, as in the old law, and a quarter of coverage is a calendar quarter with $50 or more in wages.

This liberalization will enable many people now 65 or over to draw retirement benefits immediately, and also will enable the newly covered groups to qualify much more quickly. About 500,000 additional persons will be paid benefits in the first year of operation.

Table 4 indicates the number of quarters of coverage required by individuals in various age groups.

VIII. Effective date

1. The benefit increases for persons now on the benefit rolls will be effective for the month of September 1950, as will most of the other new benefit provisions.

2. Benefits based on the new benefit formula will first be paid in May 1952. Persons coming on the rolls before that time will have their benefits computed under the present formula with the increases provided for those now receiving benefits.

IX. Financing of old-age and survivors insurance

A. Taxable wage base: The limit on total annual earnings on which benefits are computed and contributions paid has been increased from $3,000 to $3,600.

B. Contribution schedule: Under the new law employers and employees will continue to share equally. The rate on each will be as follows:

Calendar years:	Rate (percent)
1950–53	1½
1954–59	2
1960–64	2½
1965–69	3
1970 and thereafter	3¼

The self-employed will pay 1½ times the above rates.

C. Level premium cost: The level premium cost (on an intermediate basis) of the program as amended by the new law is about 6 percent of payroll, as compared with about 4½ percent under the old law.

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

The major provisions of the new law relating to public assistance are, as follows:

I. Aid to dependent children (title IV)

The Federal share of expenditures will be increased by the inclusion of one adult relative in aid to dependent children families as a recipient for Federal matching purposes.

II. Aid to the blind (title X)

A. Beginning July 1952, all States administering federally approved aid-to-the-blind programs will be required to disregard earned income, up to $50 per month, of recipients of aid to the blind in determining eligibility for and the amount of aid. Prior to July 1952 the exemption of earnings is discretionary with each State.

B. Until July 1, 1955, State aid-to-the-blind plans are to be approved for Federal matching even though they do not conform to the requirements of the Federal law concerning the determination of need.

C. The State plan will be required to provide that, in determining blindness, there shall be an examination by a physician skilled in diseases of the eye or by an optometrist.

III. Aid to the needy permanently and totally disabled (title XIV)

The new law establishes a program of Federal grants-in-aid for a fourth category of assistance—aid to the needy permanently and totally disabled. The matching formula for this category is the same as is provided for old-age assistance and aid to the blind payments; i. e., three-quarters of the first $20 of a State's average monthly payment per recipient, plus one-half of the remainder, within individual maximums of $50.

IV. Inclusion of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands

The new law extends the four categories of public assistance to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands under the following matching formula: The Federal share, for old-age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to the needy permanently and totally disabled, is limited to one-half of the amounts expended under an approved plan up to a maximum payment for any individual of $30 per month. For aid to dependent children the Federal share is limited to one-half of the expenditures under an approved plan up to individual maximums of $18 for the first child and $12 for each additional child in a family. The total Federal share for Puerto Rico for the four programs is limited to $4,250,000 a year, and for the Virgin Islands, to $160,000 a year.

V. Direct payment for medical care

The new law authorizes States to make direct payments to doctors or others furnishing medical care or other remedial care as authorized under State law. Under the old law the Federal Government did not participate in the cost of medical care unless payment for such care was made to the recipient.

VI. Medical institutions

The new law authorizes the Federal Government to share the costs of assistance to needy aged and blind persons in public medical institutions. Previous law limited Federal participation to residents of private institutions.

MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH, CRIPPLED CHILDREN, AND CHILD WELFARE

The new law increases substantially the Federal grants to States for the service programs provided for in title V of the Social Security Act.

I. Maternal and child-health services (pt. 1 of title V)

The new law increases the authorization for Federal grants for maternal and child-health services from $11,000,000 per year in existing law to $16,500,000 ($15,000,000 in the present fiscal year).

II. Services for crippled children (pt. 2 of title V)

The new law increases the authorization for Federal grants for services for crippled children from the $7,500,000 per year in existing law to $15,000,000 ($12,000,000 in the current fiscal year).

III. Child-welfare services (pt. 3 of title V)

The new law increases the authorization for child welfare services from the $3,500,000 per year authorized in present law to $10,000,000. The law also adds the following amendment to the child-welfare provisions of the act: "Provided, That in developing such services for children the facilities and experience of voluntary agencies shall be utilized in accordance with child-care programs and arrangements in the State and local communities as may be authorized by the State."

Table 5 compares the provisions in the old law with those in the new law:

[Amounts in millions]

Provision in title V	Old law	New law
Maternal and child health	$11.0	[1] $16.5
Crippled children	7.5	[2] 15.0
Child welfare services	3.5	10.0
Total	22.0	41.5

[1] $15,000,000 in current fiscal year.
[2] $12,000,000 in current fiscal year.

GENERAL

Osteopaths

The new law adds to section 1101 of the Social Security Act a definition of the terms "physician," "medical care," and "hospitalization." These terms are defined to include osteopathic practitioners and the services of osteopathic practitioners and hospitals within the scope of their practice as defined by State law. The effect of this definition is to permit the States to utilize the services of the osteopathic profession and its institutions.

Costs of changes in public assistance and service programs to children

Under the new law the additional cost to the Federal Government on a full-year basis for public assistance and child welfare services above the old law will be about $180,000,000 to $220,000,000 annually.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE (TITLE XII)

A. The new law provides for reestablishment and continuation of the George loan fund, which permits advances to State unemployment insurance funds which may run low. The loan fund is continued for the 2 years 1950 and 1951 by amending title XII of the Social Security Act.

B. The new law provides for review by State courts of administrative decisions of State agencies prior to a ruling in certain cases by the Secretary of Labor on compliance questions under the Federal unemployment insurance law and title III of the Social Security Act (Knowland amendment).

Failure of H. T.'s Policy on China Due to Lack of Common Sense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mark Sullivan:

[Washington Post of September 10, 1950]

H. T.'s POLICY ON CHINA

(By Mark Sullivan)

South Korea is a tiny country, some 20,000,000 people. To prevent subjection of it to communism we are using the utmost strength we have available and are mobilizing more.

Yet South Korea is only a tiny piece of Asia. And up to 2 years ago an immense part of Asia, China with some 400,000,000 people, was under attempt at subjection to communism—an attempt coming from the same source and in other respects largely identical with the present attempt in South Korea. Against that attempt at communizing China the policy of the Truman administration did not exert resistance. That policy raises a question, expressible in three letters but monumental in its relation to present disaster, "Why?"

An answer made at the time was that we could not afford to exert ourselves in resisting the communizing of China, that our resources did not permit. That answer was plausible, to a considerable degree it had merit. We had begun in 1946 to lay out billions to enable countries of western Europe to resist communism there, the aid that became known as the Marshall plan. The theory was that our resources were not enough to resist communism in both Europe and China, and that of the two it was more immediately important to resist in Europe. The countries in western Europe that we were defending composed, next to the United States itself, the area of the world's greatest productive capacity and economic strength. Fall of them to Russian communism could be directly fatal.

Yet the answer that we had not the resources to resist communizing of China's 400,000,000 becomes a tragic irony when today we are pouring out billions without stint to resist the communizing of South Korea's 20,000,000 people. The irony is increased by what was apparent in advance, that once Russian communism should take over China it would attempt to take over the rest of eastern and southeastern Asia, including Korea.

When the overcoming of China by communism was under way, there was an outpouring of prophecy and warning about the consequences. A typical one came from a military source, Maj. Gen. Clair Chennault (retired), who had been head of our air forces in China during World War II. Writing about the strategy of the Russia Communist leaders he said: "The domination of China is one of the strategical essentials necessary * * * before they can feel safe in making war on the world." In a book entitled "China, the Land and the People," Gerald F. Winfield wrote in 1948: "Our stake in Asia has now become a matter of the survival of our democracy * * * even our very existence as a free people." A report of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs said that success by the Communists in taking over China would result in one Soviet-dominated world.

Now that the consequences have begun, with the Communist aggression in South Korea, there is inevitable questioning about the relation of the Truman administration to the Communist overcoming of China when it was under way. The Republicans announce that the actions and policies of the administration will be reviewed completely. In such a review there is one condition, commonly overlooked, but having great weight.

At the time the Communist conquest of China was under way, there was just one organized opposition to it. This was the Nationalist Government of China under Chiang Kai-shek. Either Chiang Kai-shek would resist successfully, or the Communists would triumph; and whichever the outcome it would be the final answer. In simple common sense the interest of the United States lay in giving Chiang Kai-shek every support we could. This the Truman administration conspicuously did not do. That we should not give Chiang Kai-shek large military and economic support was understandable, because of what we were committed to giving western Europe. But we did not give him even moral or political support; on the contrary we conspicuously withheld them. As an example we at one point publicly urged Chiang Kai-shek to take the Communists into a coalition government. This and other actions and attitudes of the Truman administration caused Chiang Kai-shek to lose "face" with the Chinese people. And that loss of face was a major cause of his defeat.

In explanation of the Truman administration's attitude toward Chiang Kai-shek, it was said that his government was weak and inefficient. A frequent word used about him was "reactionary." As if that, whether justified or not, should have weight, considering the stake we had. Among the mistakes and worse of the Truman administration about China, a glaring one was lack of ordinary common sense.

Licking County Voters Must Register in September To Vote in November

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under a recent decision of the Ohio secretary of state—a ruling upheld by the courts—all the voters of Licking County must register in September 1950 in order to vote in November.

Licking County citizens can register at their regular voting places, in their precinct or township, on the following dates: Thursday, September 21; Saturday, September 23; Wednesday, September 27.

Registration can be made at the board of elections, 40 West Main Street, Newark, any day, except Sunday, up to and including September 27.

I urge all to register so they can vote and exercise the right given them under our Constitution.

Register in September.
Vote in November.

Optometrists in our National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article which appeared in the Missouri Optometrist for July 1950:

OPTOMETRISTS IN OUR NATIONAL DEFENSE

(By Hon. Dewey Short, Republican, Member of Congress, Seventh Missouri District, ranking minority member, Committee on Armed Services)

It was my privilege to introduce in Congress the bill to establish an Optometry Corps in the United States Army. This was during World War II and the bill passed both Houses in May 1945. It was vetoed by President Truman upon the representation of the Surgeon General of the Army that they proposed to submit to the Congress a bill to establish a Medical Service Corps in the Army, which would include an optometry section.

When the Eightieth Congress convened, the Reorganization Act had become effective and the old Military Affairs and Naval Affairs Committees had been combined to form the Armed Services Committee. Companion bills were introduced to establish a Medical Service Corps in both the Army and the Navy. Following hearings one bill was written to cover both services, and to include an optometry section in the Medical Service Corps. This legislation was passed by both Houses and signed by the President.

Since that time the medical department of the Air Force has been established by Executive order with a Medical Service Corps and an optometry section. There are 18 Reserve officers on active duty in the Air Force Optometry Corps, with Lieutenant Dunn the ranking optometrist.

At the present time Commander Raymond Sullivan, of the Navy Medical Service Corps, is not only head of the optometry section but the ranking optometrist in the armed services. He is on duty in the Office of the Surgeon General of the United States Navy. There are 21 optometrists who are commissioned officers on active duty in the Medical Service Corps of the Navy.

Maj. John W. Sheridan, on duty at Walter Reed Hospital in Washington, is the ranking optometrist in the Army. There are about 20 optometrists in active duty as officers in the Army Medical Service Corps. An optometrist who is a Reserve officer in the Army Medical Service Corps may request 1 year active duty, called a competitive tour. At the end of the year of extended active duty he may apply for a commission in the Regular Army. Several men have completed the competitive tour and will soon join Major Sheridan as officers in the Regular Army. Every 3 months two or three more will be selected for Regular Army, dependent upon the requirements of the optometry section.

The Army still employs many civilian optometrists at various hospitals in the United States and at the Army hospital in Honolulu. These men are given an opportunity to learn eye pathology; help in taking visual fields; study mechanical optics; and shop management. There is also a limited amount of work on industrial vision and various types of research.

In a national defense system which uses aircraft flying at supersonic speeds, guided missiles with speeds many times the speed of sound, and more gadgets and precision instruments than the hound dog has fleas, vision is of vital importance. It is the function and responsibility of the optometric profession to make certain that all of the men in the armed services have the best possible vision for the particular duty assigned to them, and that where correction is needed it is adequate and comfortable.

The men and women in the factory who are fabricating the material for our national defense are an important part of our national security. Their accuracy of vision is ofttimes as vital as that of the man on the firing line—for a slight error in the fabrication of the missile or of the aircraft may be as disastrous as an error in vision at the front.

The optometrists in the armed services are doing a good job, and I am confident that their civilian brethren will continue to improve their knowledge and skill in this particular field, which means so much to the safety, welfare, and peace of our people.

Immortal Words of Famous Americans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 11 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in this hour of history when our young men are fighting once more for the defense of freedom and the democratic way of life, I think it is appropriate to place in the RECORD some of the immortal words of famous Americans who have inspired us in the past.

In January of 1942, I placed many of these quotations in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I received thousands of requests from citizens who wished to refresh their memories on these great statements which have become part of our heritage of freedom. Now we are challenged again by a totalitarian dictatorship, and these words of wisdom and courage should be made available to the people of America.

There being no objection, the compilation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CREED FOR DEMOCRATS: OUR IDEAL, AS EXPRESSED BY FAMOUS AMERICANS

IN THE BEGINNING

(William Bradford, History of the Plymouth Plantation)

But here I cannot stay and make a pause and stand half amazed at this poor people's present condition. * * * Being thus past the vast ocean and a sea of troubles before in their preparation, they had now no friends to welcome them, nor inns to entertain or refresh their weatherbeaten bodies, no houses or much less towns to repair to, to seek for succor. * * * And for the season, it was winter, and they that know the winters of that country know them to be sharp and violent and subject to cruel and fierce storms, dangerous to travel to known places, much more to search an unknown coast. Besides, what could they see but a hideous and desolate wilderness full of wild beasts and wild men? * * * May not and ought not the children of these fathers rightly say, "Our fathers were Englishmen which came over this great ocean, and were ready to perish in this wilderness"? But they cried unto the Lord, and He heard their voice and looked on their adversity.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

(Roger Williams, The Bloody Tenent of Persecution)

Breach of civil peace may arise when false and idolatrous practices are held forth, and yet no breach of civil peace from the doctrine or practice, or the manner of holding forth, but from that wrong and preposterous way of suppressing, preventing, and extinguishing such doctrines or practices by weapons of wrath and blood. * * * Whereas it is light alone, even light from the bright shining sun of righteousness, which is able, in the souls and consciences of men, to dispel and scatter such fogs and darkness.

"WE MUST FIGHT"

(Patrick Henry, speech in the Continental Congress, 1775)

If we wish to be free; if we wish to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending; if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged, and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained, we must fight. An appeal to arms and to the God of hosts is all that is left us.

"WE HOLD THESE TRUTHS—"

(Declaration of Independence)

We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundations on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

TIMES THAT TRY MEN'S SOULS

(Tom Paine, The Crisis, 1776)

These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country, but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap, we esteem too lightly; it is dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated.

AN EARLY CHARTER

(Virginia Bill of Rights, 1776)

That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable to them. * * * That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and, therefore, all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience; and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity toward each other.

THE AMERICAN

(Crévecoeur, Letter From an American Farmer, 1782)

The American is a new man who acts on new principles; he must, therefore, entertain new ideas and form new opinions. From involuntary idleness, service, dependence, penury, and useless labor he has passed to toils of a very different nature, rewarded by ample subsistence.

THREE ESSENTIALS

(The Northwest Ordinance, 1787)

Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

"WE THE PEOPLE"

(Preamble of the Constitution)

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

THE FOUR FREEDOMS

(First amendment to the Constitution)

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

INTOLERANCE CONDEMNED

(Jefferson, first inaugural address, 1801)

Let us restore to social intercourse that harmony and affection without which liberty and even life itself are but dreary things. And let us reflect that, having banished from our land that religious intolerance under which mankind has so long bled and suffered, we have yet gained little if we countenance a political intolerance as despotic, as wicked, and capable of as bitter and bloody persecutions.

THE WORLD'S BEST HOPE

(Jefferson, first inaugural address, 1801)

I know, indeed, that some honest men fear that a republican government cannot be strong; that this Government is not strong enough; but would the honest patriot, in the full tide of successful experiment, abandon a government which has so far kept us free and firm on the theoretic and visionary fear that this Government, the world's best hope, may by possibility want energy to preserve itself? I trust not. I believe this, on the contrary, the strongest Government on earth.

REMEMBER THE ALAMO

(William Barrett Travis, Appeal from the Alamo, 1836)

To the people of Texas and all Americans in the world: Fellow citizens and compatriots: I am besieged by a thousand or more of the Mexicans under Santa Ana. I have sustained a continual bombardment, and cannonade for 24 hours and have not lost a man. The enemy has demanded a surrender at discretion; otherwise the garrison are to be put to the sword if the fort is taken. I have answered the demand with a cannon shot, and our flag still waves proudly from the walls. I shall never surrender nor retreat.

THE BUILDING OF THE SHIP

(Longfellow)

Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
Fear not each sudden sound and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale!
In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!

Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
Our hearts, our hope, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphs o'er our fears,
Are all with thee—are all with thee!

THE FIERY TRIAL

(Lincoln, Message to Congress, December 1, 1862)

Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history. We of this Congress and this administration will be remembered in spite of ourselves. No personal significance or insignificance can spare one or another of us. The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down in honor or dishonor to the latest generation. * * * We shall nobly save or meanly lose the last, best hope of earth.

SHALL NOT PERISH

(Lincoln, Gettysburg Address)

It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

SHIP OF DEMOCRACY

(Walt Whitman, from Leaves of Grass)

Sail, sail thy best, Ship of Democracy,
Of value is thy freight, 'tis not the present only,
The past is also stored in thee.
Thou holdest not the venture of thyself, not of the Western Continent alone.
Earth's résumé entire floats on thy keel, O ship, is steadied by thy spars
With thee time voyages in trust, the antecedent nations sink or swim with thee,
With all their ancient struggles, martyrs, heroes, epics, wars, thou bear'st the other continents.
Theirs, theirs as much as thine, the destination port triumphant;
Steer then with good strong hand and wary eye, O helmsman, thou carriest great companions,
Venerable priestly Asia sails this day with thee,
And royal, feudal Europe sails with thee.

IN WAR AND IN PEACE

(Ex parte Milligan, 1886)

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy and despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence.

SAFE FOR DEMOCRACY

(Woodrow Wilson)

The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

ETERNAL TRUTHS

(Franklin D. Roosevelt)

If the fires of freedom and civil liberties burn low in other lands, they must be made brighter in our own. If in other lands the press and books and literature of all kinds are censored, we must redouble our efforts here to keep them free. If in other lands the eternal truths of the past are threatened by intolerance, we must provide a safe place for their perpetuation.

LIBERTY UNDER GOD

(Franklin D. Roosevelt)

We are going to win the war and we are going to win the peace that follows. And in the dark hours of this day—and through dark days that may be yet to come—we will know that the vast majority of the members of the human race are on our side. Many of them are fighting with us. All of them are praying for us. For, in representing our cause, we represent theirs as well—our hope and their hope for liberty under God.

Will the Canadian Aluminum Deal Be Repeated?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, subsidy payments and other concessions granted by the Government of the United States during World War II, together with substantial contributions by the Governments of Canada, Great Britain, and Australia, established the Aluminum Co. of Canada as the largest and lowest cost producer of aluminum in the world. The result of this is well indicated by the Government brief filed January 18, 1950, in the Aluminum Co. of America antitrust case, in which the Department of Justice, referring to the Aluminum Co. of Canada as "Alted," made the following statements:

Alted's transportation costs to major markets in the highly industrialized northeastern part of the United States, together with Alted's low cost of production give Alted a very great competitive advantage over Reynolds and Kaiser in supplying pig and ingot to this most important market * * * In the years ahead it can be expected that Alted will become even stronger. It is carrying on a big expansion program, including a very large smelting plant in western Canada. It is enough that Alted exists, that it serves as a barrier to the operations and development of Reynolds and Kaiser in their operations both here and abroad, and that Alted's vast capacity and resources are under stockholder control of the same small group which has stockholder control over Alcoa.

Until 1941 the Aluminum Co. of America, commonly referred to as Alcoa, was the only producer of primary aluminum in the United States. In 1928 Aluminium, Ltd., was organized in Canada to hold the Canadian and certain other foreign properties of the Aluminum Co. of America. The Aluminum Co. of Canada is a subsidiary of Aluminium, Ltd. A small group of Americans own the majority stock in both the Aluminum Co. of Canada and the Aluminum Co. of America. In addition, family, financial, and business ties exist between Alcoa and Alcan. For instance, it is reported that since World War II Alcan sold to Alcoa approximately 80 percent of all primary aluminum, which it sold in the United States. The principal officers of Aluminum Import Corp., the Alcan subsidiary in the United States, are said to be former officials of Alcoa.

In the spring of 1942, the Governments of the United States, Canada, Great Britain, and Australia entered into a series of contracts and agreements to underwrite a huge increase in the production capacity of the Aluminum Co. of Canada. This expansion increased Alcan's annual capacity from 165,000,000 pounds to 1,050,000,000 pounds, more than a sixfold increase.

During World War II the Aluminum Co. of Canada mushroomed from a relatively minor enterprise to the largest and lowest cost producer of aluminum in the world without the investment of additional private capital and at no financial risk to itself. This was accomplished by the following means:

First. The Metals Reserve Company of RFC contracted with Alcan for deliveries of 1,370,000,000 pounds of aluminum during 1941–45.

Second. The extra cost or subsidy paid to Alcan amounted to $49,320,000 on the total quantity delivered. The Surplus Property Board disclosed in its report of September 21, 1945, that—

The actual average cost of the Canadian metal to this country was 18.6 cents as compared with the American price during 1942–45 of 15 cents and 14 cents.

In addition, interest due on advances was waived in the amount of $2,500,000, giving Alcan a total subsidy by the United States Government of $51,820,000.

Third. The Aluminum Co. of Canada obtained from foreign governments loans of approximately $90,000,000, including lines of credit, and advances on purchases of nearly $80,000,000. This assistance included $68,500,000 in advances by the Metals Reserve Company, of RFC, and a $34,000,000 loan from the Export-Import Bank of the United States.

Fourth. According to the Surplus Property Board, the Canadian Government allowed a special depreciation rate on Alcan's plant investment for war purposes. Approximately 60 percent of the cost of the power project and all of the cost for production plant and machinery, an amount totaling $164,100,000, was written off against profits during 4½ years.

The Surplus Property Board report to the Congress, dated September 21, 1945, in referring to the expansion program of the Aluminum Co. of Canada, financed by the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, and Australia, and by generous provisions for accelerated amortization from the Canadian Government, observed that—

All of this assistance including that by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was equivalent of a drastic subsidy of post-war production of the Canadian Co.

The independent aluminum producers in the United States, as distinguished from Alcoa, have suffered additional setbacks since the end of World War II. The Aluminum Co. of Canada is shown to have disrupted the United States aluminum market by glutting it in periods of low demand, thus causing the independents to curtail production and close certain facilities, and by reducing shipments in periods of high demand. The inadequate tariff on aluminum was further reduced. Approximately 99 percent of all ECA purchases of aluminum have been from the Aluminum Co. of Canada. Only now, when there is a shortage of aluminum for civilian and industrial needs, has the Munitions Board made any move to stockpile aluminum.

The New York Times recently reported that the United States Government is considering a proposal to purchase 440,000,000 pounds of primary aluminum from Canada over a 3-year period at a cost in excess of $75,000,000. Although this report has not been confirmed, to award such a contract to the Aluminum Co. of Canada or to its parent company, Aluminium, Ltd., of Canada, in preference to the independent producers in the United States, would be an unconscionable act, detrimental to the security and economy of the United States.

The independent producers of primary aluminum in the United States stand ready and willing to commence a substantial expansion of production facilities immediately. They have submitted proposals to the Munitions Board for the delivery of several times the amount of aluminum reported to have been proposed by Canadian interests.

The projects proposed by domestic producers would be privately financed and so dispersed as to greatly increase the security of the United States. On the other hand, Canadian production facilities which produce one-fourth of the world's aluminum are concentrated at Arvida, Quebec, an isolated and highly vulnerable target for enemy action. Furthermore, the bauxite required to make aluminum metal at Arvida, Quebec, must be brought in over a long and dangerous water route from foreign sources. It should not be forgotten that early in the last war Germany, which had far less submarines than Russia now has, was able to sink 52 out of 60 special ore boats bringing bauxite from the north coast of South America to the United States.

The New York Times article concerning the Canadian proposal for a long-term aluminum contract further stated "Persons in the aluminum industry who support the proposed deal with Canada point out that the shortage of cheap electric power here militates against immediate expansion of domestic production." There is no substance to this claim. The independent domestic producers of primary aluminum propose projects which can be completed quickly and utilize sources of power that do not exist today.

If any long-term contracts are made by the Government of the United States for the delivery of primary aluminum to the stockpile, they should be awarded to domestic producers. The interest of the national security and economy would demand such action by our Government. Should long-term contracts for primary aluminum be awarded to the Aluminum Co. of Canada or its parent company in preference to domestic producers, a congressional investigation should be commenced immediately to ferret out the responsible parties and determine all facts in the case, including a minute examination of the present and past connections and interests of each responsible official.

Address by Matthew Woll Before American Federation of Teachers Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 11 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered at the convention of the American Federation of Teachers, in Detroit, by Matthew Woll, vice president and chairman of the committee on education of the American Federation of Labor.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am very happy to be at this fine convention.

The American Federation of Teachers, though not among the largest of our A. F. of L. affiliates, is certainly among the most important.

Your importance cannot be measured by numbers alone. There is no more vital function in a democratic society than education. Even in times of war, as we have learned, sound thinking is as essential to our national welfare as steel. And to develop sound thinking is the responsibility of the men and women you represent.

I wish that it were possible to say that the Nation as a whole is fully aware of this responsibility you bear. Unfortunately, any such notion is coldly contradicted by the facts.

There is a great deal of talk about the noble and indispensable mission of the teacher. But all too often this talk is not supported by action, or even by the desire to act.

I am informed that 200,000 teachers in the United States earn less than $35 a week. The records show that many teachers earn barely half that sum.

Not long ago, I read of a teacher who wrote a letter to his county superintendent which said:

"DEAR SIR: I don't think I'll teach any more. I'm now earning $8.25 weekly. I can't get married on that. I reckon I'll go to work on the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad. They pay section hands $7 a day."

That, in a sense, is one of the most shocking letters I have ever seen.

It is shocking not only because of the pitiable underpayment of the teacher involved, but because it reveals a brutal negligence on the part of the community involved in the education and mental development of its young.

Such saving on education is economy of the most destructive sort. It imperils our growth and future as a nation.

Nearly 30 years ago, in addressing a convention of the Workers Education Bureau, I said:

"If we will but briefly review the rise and fall of nations and the historical development of mankind, we will find in all periods of time that those possessed of the greatest amount of knowledge, were those in control of all affairs of man."

This is truer today, I believe, than ever before in history. In our increasingly complex world, education—the ability to absorb and to employ knowledge discriminately—becomes an ever more urgent necessity.

It has frequently been said that an educated people is the most effective bulwark of freedom. But never before has the validity of this been so unmistakably evident.

It is no accident that in all totalitarian nations education, in the true sense, has been warped, perverted, and virtually destroyed.

It has been replaced by a system of propaganda and indoctrination designed not to advance intellectual growth but to stunt it.

Except in narrowly defined channels, totalitarian governments have made the pursuit of knowledge a crime. They know that their vaunted supremacy is a myth that cannot survive objective inspection.

It is obvious to their hard and distorted cunning that free inquiry, which is basic in the educational process, is inimical to their system of government; and so they have wrung an iron curtain down around the minds of the millions they control.

This has been the way every despotism in history has sought to perpetuate itself. Yet it also explains why, in the end, no despotism has been able to withstand the challenge of freedom.

The blind can be driven. But they are no match for those who can see.

Korea will bear witness to that fact. So will the other Koreas to come.

But we, in this country, cannot afford complacence. The qualities of a free and educated people, which are our greatest asset, cannot be permitted to languish. They must be strengthened and made more vigorous. And our schools are the place where this fundamental task is begun.

More than a generation ago Samuel Gompers, founder and first president of the A. F. of L., whose centennial we are commemorating this year, wrote an editorial in the American Federationist which said—I quote:

"The whole problem of progress is fundamentally educational in character. The problems of today and the future will tax the ability of our citizens even though equipped with the best education which our schools can afford. * * * To withhold opportunities for education for the least among our people is a crime committed against our Republic."

This awareness of the crucial role of education has been demonstrated by organized labor in this country since its earliest days.

Campaigns waged by the trade unions in the 1820's and 1830's were largely responsible for the beginning of the public-school system. In 1834 the trade unions of the country met in convention in New York City to urge the adoption of an equal, universal, republican system of education.

Nearly every major advance in public education in this country has resulted, to a very great degree, from labor's efforts.

We—in the American Federation of Labor—have never been content with the semblance of education. We did not accept public schools that were for the poor alone. We do not accept the counterpart of such schools in any part of the country today. We have wanted, and we have been instrumental in getting, the advanced and more democratic school system we have today. We shall continue to work for a better one tomorrow.

In that better school system, as we recognize, your organizations—the American Federation of Teachers—must have a central importance. For we know that education is more than books and buildings. In the first instance, it is teachers. And teachers, if they are to perform their functions properly, must be free of political hindrances, adequately equipped, and adequately compensated.

That is the objective of your organization. It is an objective I am sure you will achieve in an ever wider scale.

It is an objective, I should add, for which you have the full support of the American Federation of Labor.

Nor is there anything new about this support. It will interest you to know that Samuel Gompers actively assisted in the formation of the first teachers' union in Chicago. And, in 1919, in his annual report to the A. F. of L. convention, he wrote—again I quote:

"To elevate and advance the interests of the teaching profession and to promote popular and democratic education, the right of the teachers to organize and affiliate with the movement of the organized workers must be recognized."

The increase in your membership has not come easily for a variety of reasons. Teachers, along with other white collar workers, have been slow to realize the need for effective union organization. Labor people generally know little of the pressures that can be and frequently are so subtly applied to forestall effective organization of teachers.

I am happy to know that in the hope that your organization program activities would be extended, President Green has assigned two field representatives to work with you in carrying the union message to unorganized teachers.

Gompers, in my judgment, was one of the country's greatest educators. In thousands of speeches and articles, through his vigor of mind and expression, he gave millions of Americans, in and out of the trade-union movement, a new insight into social and economic problems.

But he was a great educator, too, in the sense that he understood, better than most of his contemporaries, the true purpose of education.

Let me read to you from an address he delivered before the National Education Association in 1916. He said:

"The noblest mission of the schools is to teach the worth of a man or woman, to teach the value of an individual and his life. * * * Education must be founded on truths that break down insidious and unjustified distinctions between the kinds of work by which individuals express themselves * * * An education that glorifies the creative ability of the individual—his labor—is injecting a revolutionary idea into all our philosophy of life. Such a plan of education will bring into the spirit of our Nation a force that will make for a larger freedom, for greater progress and effectiveness. It will be in direct opposition to that education which promotes docility, submissiveness, and conformity. It will make possible for each to stamp his life work with all of the artistic imagery of which his nature is capable."

In these words of Gompers you have the educational credo of one of the wisest democratic leaders our Nation has known, a true humanist, and a very great man.

Gompers was not only an educator; he was also an idealist, but his idealism was tempered by a realization that where the livelihood of workers was concerned, neither he nor any other labor leader was justified in sacrificing concrete gains to theory.

He was greatly criticized for this, but today some of his severest critics acknowledge his wisdom.

Those who charged Gompers with a lack of idealism, with an undue concentration on "bread and butter" union issues, underestimated and misunderstood him. To Gompers it was a case of putting first things first. To him a union must have a record of solid, practical accomplishment for its members; it could not be a mere debating society and endure.

That record of practical accomplishment meant for Gompers that the worker would achieve through organization that sense of human dignity and worth that he considered the birthright of all Americans.

To whatever area of human concern one may turn, one finds that Gompers had a passionate concern for the individual, his rights, his privileges, his welfare as a citizen and as a worker.

His attitude to political action and to the role of government in labor relations, greatly misunderstood and criticized, is coming more and more to be appreciated as sound.

The labor leaders of the thirties, the forties, and the fifties have repeated, altogether too frequently after bitter experience, the conclusion that Gompers had reached in 1909 when he said:

"We must be partisan for a principle and not for a party, but we must make manifest the fact that we have political power and that we intend to use it; otherwise, the ballot will become an impotent weapon. Our members and friends cannot expect that the officers of the Federation can impress either upon political parties or upon Congress the demands of the workers for justice and right, unless those workers themselves have shown sufficient interest in the use of their political power as to make it clear that they are the potent force behind their chosen officers and representatives."

Here we briefly catch something of the spirit and vision that animated Samuel Gompers and many of the generation of labor leaders who worked with him.

The organization they built in the face of hostility and often opposition of the forces of law, the press, and the respected opinion of their day—the organization in which we carry on today is the finest tribute to their accomplishment.

Today, with 107 international unions, State federations in every State and central labor bodies in all industrial and trade centers, the American Federation of Labor is indeed a living and growing memorial to its founders.

Its activities in rebuilding the trade unions in Europe and in strengthening the unions in Asia and Latin America merely carry on the work that Samuel Gompers started.

Our publications in various languages carry the message of unionism to all parts of the world.

Increasingly our officers and members are called upon to serve on community and public agencies at all levels of government. This, too, stems from the ground work Gompers laid.

I have been referring to Gompers not merely because of the fact that this is his centennial—as a bow to chronology, but because Gompers, though dead for more than a quarter century, still has much to teach us.

John R. Commons, the historian, called Gompers one of our 10 or 12 greatest Americans. His greatness was not only in his acts, which built the modern American labor movement, but in his ideas, which provided it with an enduring democratic philosophy.

His story, I think, is one of the most valuable and inspiring in the American past. Yet all too few people are aware of it. I believe it is entirely accurate to say that no figure in this country's recent past has been at once so important and so little known.

It was encouraging to learn, for this reason, of the Samuel Gompers' Workshop, conducted by the American Federation of Teachers, for the purpose of acquainting its members with Gompers' significance in American life. But I hope that it will not end there. I hope that, through your members, Gompers' significance will be brought home to millions of students.

In fact, I should like to see your organization take the lead in preparing material on the various aspects of labor's contribution to American democracy for use in the schools. It would, and should, help to counteract the material now flooding the schools glorifying the big corporations.

I do not think it an exaggeration to say that the American Federation of Labor, which has done so much to lift the material and spiritual level of American life, is as worthy of a student's attention as General Motors or United States Steel.

Nor do I think that it is an exaggeration to say that the American Federation of Labor, the most consistent antagonist in this country to totalitarianism in all its forms, provides a better example of Americanism than certain corporations which, for profit, have bolstered some of these totalitarian governments.

We realize, too, the efforts being put forth to have the schools, the press, the radio, the arts, music, and the sciences, business, and even the workingman's organizations become puppets performing at the direction of one officially accepted, superimposed point of view, as in Russia and the satellite countries.

We have particular reason, therefore, to value and defend our democratic heritage which makes it possible for us to participate in a determination of our personal and common economic, social, and institutional lives.

Much indeed remains to be done to free the schools from the pressures of selfish and special interests in many communities of our Nation.

We, your fellow trade-unionists in the labor movement, need your continuous advice and counsel on how we may most effectively join you in eliminating their influences. Whether these pressures on the schools would make them instruments of totalitarianism of the left or of the right, organized labor shares with you the responsibility for exposing, challenging, and resisting them.

This defense, in view of the tremendous cost to our Nation of underwriting the United Nations program of defense against Communist aggression in Korea may again mean that the health and welfare measures and certain educational measures, including Federal aid to education, which we regard as vital and necessary, may be given scant consideration by the Eighty-second Congress.

It would be premature to make any forecast because the possibility of change that might alter our plans for the future is ever with us. However, a long needed and forward-looking step that should be in our thinking is that of providing an opportunity for the various groups interested in Federal aid to get together to exchange their points of view and, if possible, agree upon provisions which should be included in a Federal aid bill.

For the moment, I have strayed from my topic in discussing problems of the present and the future. Yet, this I am certain would be as Samuel Gompers would have wished it. For he preferred to think of his contribution, great as we know it was, as merely one to the foundation of an organization.

This organization itself in Gompers' mind would never be finished, but was one to which you, your fellow workers, I, and those who come after us, each in our turn and through and out of our talents, whatever they might be, would make our contribution.

It is in this light and to these ends I would urge the utmost and unrestricted cooperation between all who labor, whether of mind or hand, of brawn or intellect, for as Gompers so well stated nearly half a century past:

"Today modern society is beginning to realize that the trade-unions are the only hope of our civilization, and to regard them as the only power whose mission it is to evolve order out of social chaos, to some of us from reaction, brutality and, perhaps, barbarism."

The realization to which Gompers referred has been slow in developing. Yet the fact is that today, more than ever, trade-unionism is the strongest force for democratic power.

All of us may be proud that we are a part of it.

Our Inner Defenses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 11 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, while we are considering the various antisubversive bills, I should like to call attention to a thoughtful and sound editorial of the Chattanooga Times of August 21, 1950. I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR INNER DEFENSES

There is in the United States today a rising tide of fury against Soviet Russia and its purveyors of communism in this country. The anger springs from deep within the American consciousness. It is based on the knowledge that the Communists deliberately provoked the Korean aggression and that Americans are fighting and dying as a result. It feeds upon the presumption that Russia has set the timetable for these little wars by which we are to be bled white in conflict against Russian stooges and made ready for the final assault by Russia's own forces. It is fanned to white heat by battlefield atrocities against American prisoners of war.

With it comes a louder, more insistent clamor for direct action against Communists in the United States, not the result of hysteria alone, but also in the sober realization that we must look to our inner defenses. The demand for stringent laws no longer comes from the extreme right or the Fascist-minded, although the latter, of course, is still with us.

The very urgency of the matter requires that we base our actions upon clear thinking rather than emotional stresses.

A very large segment of our citizens believes the thing to do is to outlaw the Communist Party and to make membership in it a punishable offense. They cite the fact that the party is an organ of an international conspiracy, dedicated to the overthrow of this Government. They declare that to continue to allow it to exist in our midst under the myth that it is an ordinary political organization is not democratic, but dangerous. They say: "Ban it, break it up, destroy its strength."

They have persuasive arguments which, would be well-nigh unanswerable if the methods they prescribe actually would accomplish what they would like to see done. We are not yet convinced.

In the first place, the proscribing of any organization is alien to our principles. Our cherished freedoms of assembly, of expression, of thought are intended to protect those who disagree as well as those who agree with us. They imply the right to be unpopular, to be wrong in beliefs and attitudes.

To outlaw the Communist Party would be to send its members and activities completely underground, instead of only partly so, making them more difficult than ever to detect. A law may prevent a man from calling himself a Communist; it won't change his beliefs. And it is his belief and not a label which makes him a danger. No law can be strong enough to combat an idea; it can be overcome only by a better idea, a more enduring principle.

Our constitutional liberties, of course, do not include the right to spy, to sabotage, to disrupt through the perversion of one's freedoms in the service of an ideology which denies all freedom. But these are actions which come into the province of enforceable laws. We have on our statute books measures which protect the Nation against their commission. Some of the laws need strengthening and this should be done at once. Subsequently, a campaign of vigorous enforcement should be undertaken in protection of the Nation.

Such a course of action would answer the immediate needs for greater internal security without endangering the freedoms which are the basis of all our security and without weakening the moral fiber of the leadership we must present to the world.

We still do not need thought control in this country. We do need more and better and straighter thinking.

Army Is Carrying the Ball, But Acheson Calling Plays—State Department Dictates Military Strategy Through White House

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Star of September 3, 1950:

ARMY IS CARRYING THE BALL, BUT ACHESON CALLING PLAYS—STATE DEPARTMENT DICTATES MILITARY STRATEGY THROUGH WHITE HOUSE

(By Constantine Brown)

The conflict between Secretary of State Acheson and Defense Secretary Johnson is much deeper than a mere clash of personalities.

It is, in fact, a conflict between two groups of men—those in the Pentagon, on whom was thrown suddenly the problem of fighting a well-armed enemy who has been preparing for conflict for the last 5 years, and those in the State Department, who are still optimistic and who believe that diplomatic formulas will solve our present problems.

From the day when our enemies of the last war surrendered, the handling of our national defense—in the broad sense of the word—was taken over by the State Department, under the general supervision of President Truman, who, however, had many other problems which required his more immediate attention.

Unlike his predecessor, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Mr. Truman had to rely exclusively on the State Department to formulate policies which he invariably approved. He did not have that vast knowledge and understanding of foreign affairs which permitted Mr. Roosevelt to be his own Secretary of State.

ENTER THE IDEOLOGISTS

The men who were placed at the head of the State Department were not experienced either. James F. Byrnes had been a shrewd Senator. General Marshall was an able soldier who, until the day he gave up his post as Chief of Staff, not only was uninterested in but actually detested what he generally regarded as diplomacy. Mr. Acheson had been in the State Department for a number of years, but until he became Under Secretary of State his role there was confined to economic affairs.

All these men, like their predecessors over many years, had to rely on the help of their staff—the State Department career men. Whatever criticism may have been made of these officials, there is no question that until the end of the war they were hard-working men. Sometimes they lacked imagination and were sticklers for formality, but by and large the Foreign Service—particularly in the last 25 years—has been composed of hard-working men who made diplomacy a career, just as men in the Regular Army and Navy.

It was not until the DP's were brought into the State Department in large numbers that the quality of that vital agency began to change. The DP's were outsiders who had worked in the FEA, OWI, OSS and other Government organzations which had been suppressed because they had outlived their usefulness. A number of ideologists—generally described as "wooly haired and wavy-brained" individuals—were brought into the Department.

PROFESSORS BLAMED

These newcomers, who had no practical knowledge of what makes international relations tick, are the underlying reason why our foreign relations have reached the stage where we find ourselves close to another world war.

The weakness of our foreign policy is due largely to the professors, both inside and outside the State Department, who by training or other reasons could not bring themselves to see the realities of the world in which we live.

Our present predicament is due to the misconceived idealism which has permeated our foreign policies.

When it became too obvious that Russia could not be induced to cooperate in a move to assure world peace, we decided to strengthen the economic structure of the free world but strictly on lines of prejudice. The Marshall plan did much to restore confidence and prosperity to European nations which had been severely damaged by the war. But our diplomats refused to accept the obvious fact that the problem was to strengthen all the nations which were willing to oppose Russia.

When it became obvious that mere economic measures were not sufficient and that a military alliance, a coalition of nations to defend us against the Eastern colossus, was necessary, such an alliance was created, also on strict lines of prejudice. In Europe we made our Allies in the fothcoming contest with the U. S. S. R. mostly played-out and tired nations which no longer have the will to fight.

The inexperienced newcomers in the State Department kept the ideological line which was necessary during the war, but which was of no use in the present conflict. Germany still was regarded by them as a Nazi country. Despite cries to the contrary from those who understood the situation practically, the dismantling of German industries continued.

But, what was worse, up to a few weeks ago any suggestion that this territory, from the borders of the U. S. S. R. controlled zone of Germany to our first line of defense ond the Rhine, should be protected by a Germany army had been violently rejected by our own policy makers.

Similarly, the State Department refused stubbornly to understand the enormous strategic importance of China. The timid arguments set forth by a number of military men were that if the Chinese mainland fell into the hands of a regime strictly controlled by Russia another world conflict would be inevitable, since Russia's rear would be safe against attack while we once more would be faced with war on two fronts. These arguments were drowned out by the shouts of those men in the State Department and their kibitzers outside that the Chinese Nationalist Government was a corrupt and undemocratic outfit. This was as true in 1947 as it was 10 or 15 years earlier when we challenged the Japanese over their encroachment in Manchuria and later in the rest of China.

IN DRIVER'S SEAT

These men went in for high-sounding words and denunciations of the corrupt Kuomintang officialdom. When men like Generals MacArthur and Wedemeyer—to mention only those names which are prominent in the eyes of the public—ventured to say that we should be mindful, under present circumstances, of what is best for America and worry over social changes in China after world peace has been established, they were shouted down or described as reactionaries or worse.

Our policies in Europe—where we tied ourselves to the militarily weakest nations—and our polices in China—where we abandoned a military force which could have been saved for the sake of our own security—have brought us today face to face with the stark reality of fighting another war almost single-handed against an enemy which possesses vast military power.

Until the Russians showed their hand in Korea, where one of their puppet armies was ordered to advance against the South Korean Republic, the military men kept themselves in the background. Defense Secretary Johnson made foolish speeches about our being ready at 5 a. m. if the Russians attacked at 4 a. m. He trimmed the armed forces to the bone.

President Truman impounded appropriations for a 58-group Air Force and permitted this important arm of national defense to build only 48 groups. The Marine Corps, our ablest force for fighting campaigns in the Far East, was reduced to a weak contingent. The word has been passed from the State Department that we must not give any impression to the rest of the world that we even think in terms of war, lest our moral prestige suffer in the world.

Between the fall of 1945 and the summer of 1950, the State Department assumed indirectly the control of our military strategy. Whenever the Joint Chiefs of Staff was asked pertinent strategic questions regarding Korea and Formosa, they had to submit their military opinion to the political views of the diplomats. Thus, only a few months ago they conceded that neither Formosa nor Korea had any real strategic value—except possibly from the purely defensive viewpoint.

DICTATES THROUGH PRESIDENT

The ambitious Defense Secretary, mindful of what had happened to his predecessor, James Forrestal, and anxious to keep the "teamwork" going, was easily "handled." He had some definite ideas about the importance of Spain in another world war. He had been thoroughly briefed about the importance of creating a German military force to supplement the weak Allied contingents in Germany. His first visit to Tokyo, where he had a long and illuminating talk with General MacArthur, convinced him that our hold in the Pacific would be made untenable unless Korea and Formosa are kept out of Russia's hands. But, in order not to disturb the "teamwork," he preferred to play along with the ideologists of the State Department, much as he disliked the idea.

The alternative would have meant his resignation. And he felt that on the eve of an important domestic political contest next November he could not give his own party a black eye.

It is true that in recent months he has disagreed with his colleague in the State Department. He has tried to convince him that old prejudices must be discarded in the face of the grave crisis which faces us now. But as far as can be ascertained at present neither his views, those of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, nor the forceful arguments presented by General MacArthur have made much of a dent in the general outline of our foreign policy.

The State Department is dictating our military strength through the President of the United States. But the Armed Forces, which have to take up where the diplomats leave off and do the actual fighting, in the past have had no voice in certain aspects of our foreign relations which affect our fighting ability.

How Quickly Can America Strike Back At the Power To Make War?—Time Article Explores the Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 11, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand one of the most challenging and provocative articles that I have ever read.

With conditions as they exist in Korea today—and the fact that men here at home find it expedient to seek out and discover all possible political ammunition to fire in the coming congressional campaigns, it is to be expected that questions will be raised as to the factual security and defenses of our own country.

If any one wants to know in truth as to how quickly America can strike back at and strategically destroy the power to make war, on the part of any enemy who might attack us—no matter from what quarter—let him read this all revealing article on our Nation's air defenses, taken from this week's copy of Time magazine.

This article looks in on Gen. Curt LeMay, head of the Strategic Air Command; the man, who with his men, are readied to take to the air on a moment's notice in the almost unbelievable mammoth aircraft, the United States Air Force's B–36.

Ride the midnight air with Gen. Curt LeMay, 8 miles above the earth through the long twilight of the fifty-fifth parallel which crosses Moscow, in the blunt nose of one of the fleet of B–36's, the mightiest of all bombers ever conceived by the mind of man.

There is not a citizen of these United States who will not take pride and find a new security in life after reading this article from Time magazine which I now insert into the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The article is as follows:

BACKGROUND FOR WAR—MAN IN THE FIRST PLANE

For an airliner, the 463-mile flight from Fort Worth to Kansas City is a matter of 2 hours, but for the B–36 bomber that waddled out onto the runway one day last week, the flight would take some 30 hours and its course would take it over 7,000 miles. Shortly after noon, the long, blimp-nosed craft, her six propellers glinting in the sun, climbed out westward from her Texas base, on past the sandy fringes of California, high over the glazed emptiness of the Pacific; then her navigator pointed her northward to the tip of the Aleutians. She did not have an atom bomb aboard, but she had its equivalent weight.

She headed east through the long twilight of the 55th parallel—which also crosses Moscow—over the frosted spikes of southern Alaska, and rumbled southward to bore through the storms that lay down the spine of the Rockies. At 2 a. m., in the cold, subzero blackness 8 miles above the earth, she found the telltale bend in the Missouri River on her radar, opened her bomb bays, and sent—not a bomb, but a long flash on her radio.

In the brightly lit war room at Offutt Air Force Base (Nebr.), midcontinent headquarters of the United States Air Force's Strategic Air Command, an operations control officer made a routine notation in his log. Another night's work was done, another major United States city had been theoretically demolished by the United States' mightiest atom-bomb carrier. More important, another weary plane crew had flown through much the same kind of weather, over precisely the same number of miles it would have taken to deliver the bomb to the industrial heart of Russia.

AT THE READY

This was the Air Force's intercontinental bomber at the ready last week. The free world's Sunday punch was getting its daily windup. These were the men and this was the weapon, which in Winston Churchill's words, form the one "effective deterrent" hanging over the heads of the Soviet Politburo—the likeliest reason why Russia's aggressors have so far started only a proxy war in Korea, and not the big one.

In the middle of a nation pursuing a faraway war in a faraway mood, a tough, hard-driving Air Force bombardment expert had tirelessly trained the Sunday punch to battle fitness. Lt. Gen. Curtis Emerson LeMay, commanding general of the Strategic Air Command, was leaning on no hope that the world might get better or the U. S. S. R. more reasonable. His 16 air bases, strung across the Nation from Puerto Rico to California—and his outposts in England, Japan, and Okinawa—bristled with readiness. His officers wore their sidearms at desks, at meals, and in the air; his A. P.'s (air police—Air Force for M. P.'s) cradled loaded carbines ready for sabotage or parachute attack. Even ground crewmen worked at their big planes with their guns besides them. At one base Curt LeMay strode by a master sergeant who had laid aside his piece to dive into his lunch bag. The CG rounded up all the maintenance men for one of his longer speeches. "This afternoon," said he, "I found one man guarding a hangar with a ham sandwich. There will be no more of that."

A quick, certain fate awaited any LeMay man who betrayed the slightest sign of the milkshaky unpreparedness that enveloped the occupation troops of Germany and Japan. The Strategic Air Command (known to the Air Force as SAC) was a $310,000,000-a-year business, a top-priority task force with 1,100 planes, some 60,000 pilots, crewmen, and groundmen. For 22 rugged months Curt LeMay had been holding them all to a relentless, competitive training schedule. With an impersonal assortment of charts and graphs—his numbers racket, he called them—he kept a sharp, hazel-eyed watch on everything from bombing accuracy (up 500 percent) to venereal-disease rates.

Every month he waved the numbers in the faces of his wing and group commanders. "Al, your maintenance is down to 62 percent," LeMay might say. "Joe's is up to 72 percent. He's got the same problems you have. How come? Now, Joe, don't look so damned smug. Your costs are up." One colonel complained that he was being marked down for "an act of God," because an eagle had damaged one of his planes in flight. LeMay sucked on his pipe, replied in a flat, low voice: "I'm not interested in distinguishing between the unfortunate and the inefficient. The result is the same." Such ruthlessness, which comes easily to some commanders, can either be sensible or silly. One of LeMay's victim's shrewdly summed him up: "He's tough, but he's not stupid-tough."

THE PLANE

SAC's complicated and out-size bombers demand ice-cold thinking, endurance, and guts from the men who fly them. The Consolidated Vultee B–36, a cigar-shaped aerial monster, is LeMay's blue-ribbon flying warship. It costs $4,700,000 before it ever gets off the ground (a small submarine costs $6,000,000). The tanks in its 230-foot wing can swallow 2½ tank-car loads of gasoline, enough to feed its six pusher engines for nearly 2 days. It can cruise over the enemy out of sight of earth—and, the Air Force insists, fairly well above the range of effective interception. Four new jet engines, hanging beneath the wing tips, were designed to give it a spurt over the target to at least 435 miles an hour. It can carry a bomb load equal to 30 B–17's at extreme range, or four B–29's.

A commander of a B–36 is usually a captain or a major, on the average a seasoned "old man" of 29 years and 3,000 hours' flight experience. LeMay laced SAC with veteran pilots, navigators, and bombardiers from his old World War II bomber commands in England, India, and the Marianas. Around them he has tailored the individual B–36 flight crews, trains them for weeks in ground school and on the Consolidated assembly line before he allows them to set foot in the superplane.

"If they build an airplane any bigger they'll have to give the aircraft commander a desk and a secretary to help him run things," a harassed plane skipper groused last week. The pilots, sitting far forward in the ribbed, safety-glass nose, can't even see back to the six engines at midfuselage. Said one: "It's like standing in the bay window and flying your house."

Before the plane can take off, the commander and his flight engineer spend an hour chanting their way down a 600-item check list to be certain every one of their maze of controls is working—and will work in the air. The engineer operates from a console of 120 dials and gadgets, spends nearly half of every hour logging their readings. Just figuring the miles-per-gallon on a 5,000-foot climb keeps him scribbling for 20 minutes. "A man can just about keep up with his work if the flight is ideal and not a damn thing goes wrong," an engineer explained. "If anything slips, it's a rat race all the way back to the base. What this thing needs is an engineer with four hands and five eyes."

Thirty continuous hours in the air, ground out in the seconds, degrees, and miles of a B–36 flight, mean packing aboard survival kits for the Arctic, life rafts for the ocean, 100 pounds of food [1] to be cooked in two tiny electric ovens—and endless time for minor irritations of dreadnought flying to sap the toughest crewman. The crew's sections are pressurized like bug bombs. To get from the nose compartment to the rear chamber a crewman has to lie full length on a little roller sled, pull himself hand over hand down an 85-foot connecting tube.

Among the guns and fire-control apparatus of the after section are eight inviting bunks. But at high altitude nobody is allowed to "sack out." Reason: An accidental pressure failure would fill the cabin with a frigid blue haze, and the loss of oxygen would kill a man in 30 seconds if he didn't slap on his oxygen mask. A sleeper would be a dead duck. A more earthy problem: The toilet mechanism won't work at high altitude. The most practical makeshift is a bucket, and by unwritten law, the first man who needs it on the flight cleans it after landing. This makes the hours of flight a competition in painful restraint.

In the B–36's early days it was grounded so frequently by "bugs" in the 30 miles of wiring, tubing, and cables that the crews dubbed it "the ramp rooster." But after long, slow shakedown, it is now admiringly known as "the magnesium monster," and the SACmen are ready to battle anyone who says it isn't the best bomber in the world. When the Navy insisted a year ago that the B–36 could be shot down, Curt LeMay shot back a blunt answer.

"I think that under certain circumstances it can be shot down," he told a congressional committee. "But I do not think, whether it can or cannot be shot down, enters into this controversy at all. * * * The thing that I am concerned about is whether the proper number of B–36's in the proper tactical disposition can penetrate enemy defenses and destroy a target with acceptable losses ourselves, and I believe the B–36 can do this job. * * * I expect that if I am called upon to fight I will order my crews out in those airplanes, and I expect to be in the first one myself."

The number of B–36's now in service is secret, but the United States has more atom bombs than B–36's. Of SAC's 14 striking groups, only three have the intercontinental bombers. The rest of SAC's groups are equipped with World War II-type heavy bombers, now known as mediums. There are eight groups of Boeing B–29's (which SAC pilots used to call "mouse-powered," and their 2,200-horsepower engines, "dollar alarm clocks"), and there are three groups of their beefed-up postwar cousins, the Boeing B–50's. The mediums can't fly from United States bases to Russia without elaborate aerial refueling,[2] but they could shuttle devastatingly between Britain, Russia, and the Middle East.

THE C. G.

Curt LeMay, 43, runs his armada from a second-floor office at Offutt Base, a converted World War II aircraft plant set peacefully among the rolling cornfields just west of the Missouri River. He leaves his door wide open and is usually "at home" to any brass hat or buck private—somewhat as a lion is at home on meatless Tuesday. He sits immobile behind his polished walnut desk, black-maned, broad-shouldered and heavy-faced, his lips set as straight as the five rows of service ribbons on his tan uniform jacket.

"The Old Man doesn't say 'hello' to you; he just looks up from his desk, nails you with a stare and listens," one SACman says: "You begin talking and you don't hear a reply—all you hear is your own voice. Then when you are in midsentence he takes the pipe out of his mouth and says, 'Get to the point.' A minute or two later: 'You're straying from the point. Don't waste my time. Come back when you've got this thing in hand.' "

LeMay's capacity for anger has probably never been tested to its fullest. He runs himself as he flies an airplane; to spout smoke or to get off course would be inefficient. He can ignore an uncut lawn or an unpolished shoe, but will pick out an unkempt airplane across the field. "He is a single-minded 'why?' guy, an administrator of high ability, and above all a hard-shelled military realist," one of his staff said appraisingly. "And I'm damn glad he's not on Russia's side."

The only place where he is likely to unbend is in the privacy of the commanding general's red brick house, across from the green Offutt parade ground. There in the evenings he sits in a comfortable armchair pulling at his ever-present pipe. His gregarious twinkly-eyed wife Helen, whom he met 19 years ago at a dance, is not afraid to chatter or to stray as far from the point as she chooses. SAC's officers have unconcealed admiration for LeMay's 11-year-old daughter Jane, who frequently tells the Old Man "No; I won't."

LeMay first landed on SAC in October 1948, relieving 59-year-old Gen. George Kenney, MacArthur's top airman in World War II. Kenney, a good commander, had neither LeMay's training as a long-range bomber specialist, his experience as a battle pilot, nor his hard-driving temperament. Kenney's bombers spent much of their time making easy training flights, "just boring holes in the air," as one of them recalls it. LeMay picked the outfit up by the neck, shook it in a way none of the oldtimers will soon forget, and flung it across the United States to get ready for its mission.

THE STAFF

To help him get going in a hurry he wangled the best officers he knew. Slight, short Brig. Gen. John B. Montgomery, one of the Air Force's rising young (38) one-stars, moved into SAC's new headquarters at Offutt. For his deputy commander LeMay picked handsome, high-polished Thomas Sarsfield Power, 45, a bold, skillful pilot, and something the Old Man is not—a diplomat and smoother-over. LeMay's chief of staff, tall, soft-spoken Maj. Gen. August Walter Kissner, 44, is two other things LeMay is not—a West Pointer and a man who can do paper work and like it.

[2] In March 1949, one of LeMay's B–50's, Lucky Lady II, flew 94 hours and 23,452 miles nonstop around the world from Carswell Air Force Base, Tex. It refueled from B–29 tankers over the Azores, Dhahran (Saudi Arabia), Manila, and Hawaii.

Neither the staff nor anybody else fawns—for long—around Curt LeMay. His friends are few and he works them the hardest. "They know how I feel about them," he once explained. "They know I wouldn't hesitate to send them out on a one-way mission if it ever became necessary." For his commanders he has one stock warning: "You will make some mistakes, and I will back you up—until you make the same one the second time. But don't ever try to fool me. That will be your last mistake."

THE AMBITION

Curt LeMay's fierce single purpose first showed itself back in high school in Columbus, Ohio. Boyhood friends recalled that he paid girls little attention, preferred to spend his leisure building crystal wireless sets or prowling through the hills of southern Ohio with a gun and a bowie knife.

His one ambition even then was to fly for the Army. He tried to make West Point, but couldn't get a congressional appointment. So at Ohio State [3] he began an alternate route to flying. He busied himself in ROTC, graduated (in 1928) to a National Guard summer camp with a Reserve commission. In the fall he began training as a flying cadet at California's March Field.

LeMay loved flying (has since logged 7,000 hours), but he was no comic-strip fly boy. While his classmates swooped off for week ends in Los Angeles, he often hung back to take engines apart, work at machine guns, pore over weather charts and navigation logarithms. Result: After 7 years in fighters, he was called from Hawaii to fly the first of the Army's flying fortresses because he was the rare Army airman who could find his way around with a navigator's sextant and chart. From then on his career was set as a big-plane man.

In World War II he became a legend—a brigadier general at 36, a major general 6 months later. In England, LeMay decided that too many of his B–17's were missing enemy targets because they zig-zagged out of the way of heavy antiaircraft fire. He clamped a cigar in his jaw, led the next raid over St. Nazaire, held his plane on course up to the bomb drop through murderous ack-ack for a grim 7 minutes. Next day he issued a fiat order: no more evasive action on the final bombing run. Plane damage went up, but results went up more.

In the Pacific, where he ran the 300-plane B–29 raids against Japan, he suddenly pulled the high-tailed bombers down from the clouds, took out their guns and gunners, and overloaded them with fire bombs to dump on Japan from low level. It was a risk that could have wrecked an air fleet and a career, but it caught the Japanese off guard, ripped Tokyo and three other industrial centers as devastatingly (over a period of 10 days) as the atom bomb tore up Hiroshima.

THE AIRLIFT

Less than 3 years after the peace, when everyone else was loosening up their military girdles, LeMay found himself running the Berlin airlift as chief of United States Air Forces in Europe. One day a C–54 pilot at Frankfurt felt a heavy hand on his shoulder, looked up into the Old Man's three stars. "Son, I'll take this load," said LeMay. "Go and tell your dispatcher—and if he lets the other end know I'm coming he'll get hell from me." LeMay flew into Berlin, unloaded, then took his place in the take-off waiting line for 40 minutes.

Back in Frankfurt he buzzed for his staff. Said he: "Get it fixed. I will expect airplanes to be taking off 5 minutes after they have unloaded—by day after tomorrow." Three days later he dropped in again. "O. K., it's fixed," he grunted. "See if you can better it."

When things eased up in Germany, he relaxed by hunting wild boar in the Black Forest and running his own "ham" radio transmitter at Wiesbaden. He invited his enlisted men to draw all the surplus radio equipment they needed to set up their own stations, often swapped midnight advice with his fellow hams. It was characteristic of his attitude toward his men; he never would step out of his way to make a public show of thoughtfulness, but was willing to rustle up radio gear on their behalf, be responsible for it and sit up late at night telling them how to use it. His reasoning: "I might want a lot of radio operators some day."

FLYAWAY DAY

When SAC moved from a field outside Washington to Offutt, next-door Omaha was tingling with anticipation of the big armadas to come. "What will this mean to Omaha?" asked a reporter as LeMay arrived on the scene. "It doesn't mean a damn thing to Omaha, and it doesn't mean a damn thing to me," he growled.

Actually, Offutt was to become the nerve center; no war planes are based there; the armadas and their crews are safely dispersed around the world at the other end of private telephone lines and powerful short-wave radios.

On the morning of Korea, LeMay didn't wait for the Pentagon to stir. He got on the wire with the commanders of his air forces: the second, eighth, and fifteenth. He ordered in Maj. Gen. Emmett O'Donnell, boss of the fifteenth at March Field. For 2 days, while SAC was in the dark on Washington's plans, the staff pored over their own top-secret intelligence on North Korean targets. "Rosie" O'Donnell's B–29's were loaded with flyaway kits, holding enough spare engines and parts to keep them flying for 30 days until normal supply lines could be set up wherever they might go.

Within 4 days and 23 hours after LeMay got his orders, Rosie's B–29's were bombing targets in Korea. LeMay almost worked up a pleased smile at this achievement,[4] then nearly bit through his pipestem when he heard that his high bombers had been used, as they were never intended to be, in low, front-line support. He recognized, of course, that in a tight spot a commander had to use whatever he had wherever he could.

ONE HAND TIED BEHIND

Korea wasn't really Curt LeMay's fight and it made him as restless as any main-eventer during the preliminaries. His Sunday punch was tense and ready, but, like a fighter with one hand tied behind him, he knew he would probably never be allowed to use it until the enemy struck first.

One thing that most worried LeMay and his command was the possibility that their outfit could be crippled before it ever got orders to strike back. LeMay has a hunch that SAC itself offers a more tempting initial target for an all-out Russian atomic attack on the United States than cities like New York and Detroit. That is why he keeps his men on ever-ready alert; why all of them constantly wear sidearms; why Offutt is fenced in and on the watch for saboteurs and guarded against paratroop surprise; why two men have been trained to spring to LeMay's side in case of trouble. It is why, too—though they know the decisions of state are not theirs to make—that men in SAC often fidget at the notion that they must first be hit before they can hit back. Like most men, they prefer peace and life to war and the possibility of death, but, more than most men, they have had to condition themselves to a pessimistic reading of the possibilities of peace.

Guarding themselves and keeping fit is a negative necessity; retaliating against an enemy is SAC's real job. That is why, nearly every night, the big B–36's nose through the long twilight of the fifty-fifth parallel, learning more and more about Russia's kind of weather, and how to get through it, in case of war, with their death-spreading weapons.

[4] A bad sinus condition years ago paralyzed some of LeMay's facial muscles, making smiling difficult and exaggerating his reputation for ferocity. He has long used a pipe or a cigar to anchor these muscles.

Field Day at the Farm of Herbert Bruce Thomson, at Forest, Va.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by me on September 9, at the field day on the farm of Mr. Herbert Bruce Thomson, Forest, Va.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There have been just 5 years since World War II ended. They may well go down in history as the most irresponsible 5 years of the great American Republic, and, unless we begin thinking straight and acting accordingly, they may be recorded as the prelude to the downfall of the greatest democracy of all time.

To think straight and act accordingly from this point forward, we would do well to analyze the postwar orgy to which we have indulged ourselves, for we are about to find that the adversaries which now confront us are strong and ruthless.

In these 5 years we have squandered the greatest prosperity ever to come to any nation; the Federal Government has collected far more taxes than ever before; it has spent far more money on purely domestic-civilian programs than ever before; it has spent far more money abroad than ever before; it has spent far more money for defense than ever before without achieving preparedness; and we have failed to curtail the greatest public debt any nation has ever known. In the past 20 years our Government has been in the black only 2. We have started deficit spending again in a large way, and it is possible that our Federal budget may not be balanced before we go over the precipice of financial disaster.

Before the invasion, Congress was told that the South Koreans were well trained, well equipped, and well prepared to defend themselves, and later we were told that we did not dare to train them extensively, or give them effective military equipment for fear they would attack the North Koreans.

We were told that the ECA (Marshall plan) expenditures abroad are necessary to contain communism and prevent war, but at the same time, we were told by Administrator Hoffman that the great effect of the foreign give-away program in Korea provoked the Communist Koreans into starting a war to hide its benefits.

We unified our armed services, and joined the United Nations to work as an integrated national and international team for peace. But, as we sent the marines to the war front to do a dirty job of shock-troop relief for our own unified forces under the direction of the United Nations, we called them a bunch of ballyhoo-bedecked policemen.

Our leaders complained that the high cost of defense was depriving socialistic domestic-civilian programs of Federal funds, but now we are saying we didn't spend enough for defense.

How inconsistent can national policy be?

To shift the blame, or conceal it, is a natural and inevitable follow-up to irresponsibility. Thus we have what is obvious hostility between the two greatest and most vital departments in the executive branch of the Government. Who is shifting the blame or whose blame is being concealed remains to be seen.

These are some of the things I have in mind when I say we had better start thinking straight and acting accordingly, for I assert without fear of contradiction that the American democracy—all of the things that make it and all of its beneficence—stands today in the hour of its greatest peril. If we don't recognize it it's because we haven't thought about it, and if we don't know it it's because we haven't been told about it. If we haven't thought about it then our civilization is void of its vaunted intellect. If we aren't told about it then our leadership is criminally delinquent.

We have maneuvered the greatest country, the best form of government, and the finest nation of people in the history of the world, into a position where they are fiscally vulnerable from within, and perhaps so greatly extended that they may be militarily vulnerable from without. Neither democracy nor freedom can survive in either the shackles of overwhelming debt or the bondage of military dictatorship.

This then is a simple plea for the preservation of freedom in our homes, in our work, and our religion. It is a simple plea that we do what we know has to be done—strip off the luxuries of sociological ventures and political bids for votes by spending public money. It is a simple plea that we get down to the sweat and the toil of the work that is required to make this country fiscally sound and militarily impregnable.

Here is the situation into which we have gotten ourselves—the situation which we must overcome if we are not to be overcome.

We have only 6 percent of the world's population. We have assumed the responsibility for propping up the economy of half the world and defending more than half the countries of the world from military attack by Communist dictators who control the other half of the earth.

These are tremendous responsibilities which we have assumed at a time when our national debt is more than a quarter of a trillion dollars—more than any other nation ever dared to conceive, much less assume. Our taxes are already approaching confiscatory levels, and much greater taxation must yet come.

Our only hope to meet the responsibilities we have assumed and to preserve our free way of life lies in the capacity of the free-enterprise system to produce in mass quantities those goods, materials, and engines of war which are needed under such conditions in better quality and greater quantity than all of our adversaries combined. And there is no reason for us to expect much help from the nations who are associated with us, for they are more wards than allies.

Yet, the President and our leaders are still insisting upon expansion of socialistic legislation—socialized housing, socialized medicine, socialized farming (the Brannan plan)—which, if adopted, will destroy the free-enterprise system. This free-enterprise system upon which we depend cannot survive in confiscatory taxes or overwhelming debt, or state socialism. What happens to free enterprise under socialism has been demonstrated by the British before our very eyes in these same 5 years since World War II.

In these 5 years the Federal Government has spent approximately $40,000,000,000 for strictly domestic-civilian programs, exclusive of the cost of the interest on the debt, veterans, foreign assistance and defense. Since 1948 domestic-civilian expenditures by the debt-ridden Federal Government increased approximately 75 percent, exclusive of interest, veterans, foreign assistance and defense. At the same time, during these 5 years, we thought it was necessary to spend approximately $100,000,000,000 to prop up our foreign friends economically, and defend them and ourselves militarily—roughly $35,000,000,000 in foreign assistance and $65,000,000,000 in our defense and in foreign military aid.

Whether our Communist adversaries will continue to weaken us by prolonging this series of sideline satellite wars breaking out here and there all over the globe, or whether they will risk committing themselves and their own resources to an all-out third world war, is to be their decision—not ours. Russia has the timetable—not us.

Perhaps there is no sadder commentary on the quality of postwar Yankee shrewdness at Washington than the fact that we have allowed ourselves to be maneuvered into the shameful position where communistic dictators can call the tunes to which the free people of Christian democracies must dance.

At any rate the end of the sacrifices we must make—in blood, in standards of living, and in hard-earned dollars—is not in sight, whether we continue hopping thither and yon to put down sideline wars set off by satellites in remote areas, or whether we are called upon to exert our supreme effort in another world conflagration.

We must do everything it takes to defend ourselves. Our own defense should be as nearly impregnable as possible and should be our first consideration. But, even before we started building our own military defenses, we committed ourselves to military defense of virtually indefensible foreign nations. To defend ourselves in any circumstances, of course, is our duty, and to defend the others in the current circumstances is a responsibility to which we have committed ourselves.

These things the Russians know. Apparently they know it better than we do. And, these things the Russians are exploiting. They are especially exploiting our vulnerable fiscal condition at home, as Russia is waging against us today a war of economic attrition. More than her own military might, the Russians are probably counting on the traditional American reluctance to give up luxuries as usual, business as usual, and politics as usual. In short, they want us to beat ourselves by our own profligacy.

I have been frequently criticized by some of the New Dealers and Fair Dealers for voting with Republicans in the Senate, but I tell you now, as I have said before, the test of my vote in the Senate and my actions elsewhere, now, as they have been in the past, and as they will be in the future, are determined by the test of what I believe in my conscience to be the best for my country. I say with all the sincerity of which I am capable that such must be the test to be applied to everything by everybody in this country—in public office or out—for a long time to come if we are to restore the peace and freedom for which this Nation was founded, and to which it is dedicated.

There is no short cut—there is no easy way; it can't be postponed—it must become a part of us for a long time to come.

Our Federal expenditure budget this year will be between $50,000,000,000 and $75,000,000,000, and it will be higher for years to come before it gets lower. Our tax budget must approach the expenditure figure as nearly as possible, and it, too, will be higher for a long time before it gets lower. Our debt, also, will rise for years to come before it gets lower. Add to these the dangers of uncontrolled inflation, and the outlook for the future is gloomy indeed. As awful as these prospects are, they, of course, cannot be compared with the fact that our casualty lists may be expected to grow much greater before they become smaller.

These are the grim facts that we face but have not been told about. Unfortunately, the more gruesome part of the burden we carry must be borne by the fresh young armies, navies and air forces we send abroad. It is not too much to ask the older generation to roll up its sleeves and cast aside its luxury and make the economic sacrifices which are necessary to the preservation of the Nation, the form of government, and the freedom which were its heritage.

I do not concede that either democracy, or free enterprise, or any other American freedom has run the course of its usefulness in the world. They have been worth fighting for and winning for in the past against both economic and military challenge, and I do not concede that they were any dearer to those who have fought and won before than they are to us today. We shall win again, but not until we begin thinking straight through all the double talk that we hear to the hard core of the problems that confront us, until we recognize the sacrifices we must make; until we see clearly the course we must take; and until we act accordingly.

In all of these, leadership characterized by unselfish and selfless patriotism is the first requirement. We have had it in the past. It is not too much to ask now.

"To Malik" Is To Lie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILLARD E. TYDINGS

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Dewey L. Fleming entitled "'To Malik,' Voice Tells World, Means Violent, Repeated Lying," from the Baltimore Sun of August 26, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"TO MALIK" VOICE TELLS WORLD, MEANS VIOLENT, REPEATED LYING

(By Dewey L. Fleming)

WASHINGTON, August 25.—The new verb "to malik," which appears to have made its debut in print in a Baltimore Sun editorial of August 14, has been bouncing over world air waves recently in English and 10 foreign languages via the State Department's Voice of America.

The Voice picked up the word on the day after initial publication and subsequently in repeated broadcasts has sought to explain its origin and meaning and to impress its utilitarian value upon all the peoples of the world.

DERIVES FROM DELEGATE NAME

In the French, Chinese, Hungarian, Greek, Czechoslovak, Polish, Serbian, Italian, Spanish, and Russian languages—and, of course, in English—the Voice has explained that the word derives from the name of Jakob Malik, Russian delegate and current president of the United Nations Security Council, and has quoted the definition constructed by the Sun:

"Malik—verb, intransitive (Russian): To lie repetitiously and violently in the hope of overwhelming the obvious truth; especially to lie in this fashion to obstruct parliamentary proceedings."

Certain linguistic difficulties have attended the efforts to translate the newly coined word into all tongues, but experts of the Voice seem to have surmounted all of them and it would not be the fault of the Voice if the word fails to win a place in world-wide diplomatic vernacular.

EMBELLISHED FOR RUSSIANS

In the Russian tongue the new word comes out "malikovshchina," and for the benefit of Russian listeners the Voice has embellished the Sun's definition with some additions of its own.

"Malikovshchina," said the Voice in a broadcast of August 16, "means an endless systematical distortion of facts, remembering well that water hollows a stone. The word 'malikovshchina' is based on the assumptions that repeated mendacious distortions of fact finally succeed in obscuring the most obvious truths."

In its French broadcast, after transmitting the Sun's definition, the Voice added a facetious footnote to the effect that "Malik" may have been the original source of the expression "Honi soit qui malik pense."

In passing the new word along to the Hungarians, the Voice explained that there could be no objection from the philological point of view to making a verb out of the proper name "Malik."

"The word 'galvanization' derived from the name of Galvani," the explanation continued, " 'pasteurization' from that of Pasteur, 'lynch' from Lynch, and Captain Boycott gave his name to the word 'boycott.'

"After last week's performance," the script continued, "Jakob Malik, representative of the 'glorious' Soviet Union at the United Nations, seems to deserve that in view of his activities his last name should be preserved for posterity in the form of a verb or noun."

IN CHINESE, ITS DEER HORSE

The Voice gave the word to the Chinese, too, but pointed out that the Chinese already had a word meaning the same thing. That word, it said was "deer horse," deriving from the story of Eunuch Chao Kao under Ehr Shih Huang Ti, who forced his puppets among the emperor's ministers to call a deer a horse, and then liquidated those who would not lie when the eunuch wanted them to.

"Today, to call a deer a horse has become proverbial in Chinese as a quality belonging to a person who distorts the truth," the Voice added.

In appraising the Greeks of the new word, the Voice said it would be glad for the Academy of Athens to pass judgment on it, and to the Czechoslovaks it commented:

"This verb could be, naturally, used in various other forms, as—to malik in, to malik out, to malik under, to malik over, but the meaning remains in principle the same."

In Spanish the new word emerges as malikear, and Spanish listeners were advised that those who attempt to copy Mr. Malik's behavior could be called "maliks, synonym of lies and fallacies."

Tax Loopholes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article on taxes appearing in the September 4 issue of the Trainman News be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE UNIT IS WALL STREET SANTA

(By Public Affairs Institute)

Any tax structure that lays claim to fairness should be related to income and wealth. Individuals and businesses should share the tax burden on an ability to pay basis.

Incorporation of the progressive income tax schedule in our tax laws is supposed to reflect that principle.

A majority of Members of the Eighty-first Congress Senate Finance Committee, however, do not share this belief. An analysis of the tax bill reported by this group shows that it lays heaviest burdens on those least able to pay and actually provides new gratuities for the few well-to-do individuals and families at the highest income brackets.

The table in the next column shows, for example, that the largest increase in tax liability under the Senate bill is levied on the lowest income groups.

This table shows the principle of progression applied in reverse. For the entire income group earning under $5,000 taxes are raised over 20 percent, while for the entire income class earning $5,000 and over the bill increases the tax less than 15 percent.

Look at the individual income classes and notice how the percentage rise in tax bears heaviest on those in the lowest brackets—20.48 percent and then diminishes to an 8.5 percent increase in the million-dollar-and-over bracket.

The effect of the Senate bill is to wipe out the percentage reductions of 1945 and 1948 and restore tax rates close to the highest wartime level of 1944. However, the Senate bill does not repeal the gratuity made to the wealthiest families in 1948 which permits a husband and wife to split their income for tax purposes.

The story of inequities, however, does not end with the analysis of the tax liabilities schedule. The well-to-do get other special considerations.

For example, capital gains, whether from a bona fide investment, a purely speculative venture, or merely as a clerk for other income, are taxed at a rate considerably lower than the surtax rate on income.

Capital gains is in reality a device for tax avoidance and constitutes a major loophole in the tax structure benefiting the few who derive substantial income from stock investment.

Instead of attempting to close the loophole, the committee's bill now makes it easier to get preferential rate treatment for capital gains by reducing from 6 months to 3 months the period that an asset must be held for the gain to be taxed at the 25 percent long-term rate.

The committee has made numerous other gifts which benefit only a minority of wealthy families.

One amendment under the guise of preventing further concentration of industry reduces substantially the tax liability on dividends paid out by family corporations.

Another amendment specifically nullifies a United States Supreme Court decision which held that a gift of a partnership interest to a member of the family cannot be used as a device for tax avoidance. This amendment is made retroactive to 1938 and since many cases are in litigation will involve considerable refunds of taxes.

The tax avoidance loophooles inserted by the committee is by no means exhausted by these few illustrations.

To add insult to injury the committee has announced that its staff is to study the possibilities of increasing revenues by means of a Federal sales or transactions tax.

As with wealthy individuals, the committee's treatment of corporate income is also marked by considerable leniency.

The chairman has not only refused to enact a corporate excess profits tax but has threatened there will be no tax bill at all if such a tax is adopted by the Senate.

Corporate income before taxes will be running in excess of $35,000,000,000 before the year is out. The rate will be over three times as high as the wartime peak of $10,800,000,000 in 1944.

Dividend payments are currently running at a rate of over $8,000,000,000, almost double 1944 and are rising rapidly. Corporate profits retained in company treasuries currently are at a rate close to $12,000,000,000, also double the 1944 rate.

In the first quarter of this year the profits of stockholders in the largest private manufacturing corporations was over 21 percent. This means that profits were at a rate which would return the stockholders' entire investment in less than 5 years.

The liquid-asset position of corporations is the highest in history.

By any reasonable standards of comparison, profits were phenomenally high and rising from 1946-48. They are going even higher now.

These profits are excessive and arise in large part from the Government's expenditures for defense. Yet the Senate Finance Committee has refused to tap these profits to pay for defense.

Under the committee bill total corporate tax liability is to be raised $1,500,000,000. The maximum increase is under seven percentage points in the effective tax rates. And it is by no means certain that corporations will make even this relatively small contribution.

For corporations are to be given additional tax relief in the form of accelerated amortization of defense facilities. Many such plants built during World War II are still producing civilian goods—a gift to their owners from Uncle Sam.

Corporations will also recoup some of these extra taxes from the extension of the period over which a loss may be carried against income in the preceding period.

The committee report acknowledges that some revenue loss is involved in this amendment. "The amount (is) uncertain and will depend upon future business conditions."

This bill is a bad tax bill. It is grossly inequitable and will further shift the burden of taxation on those least able to bear it.

Resignation of Morris Shenker From Democratic National Finance Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there has been considerable controversy over the question of the disgraceful new appointment to the Democratic National Finance Committee. I have contended that no individual connected as an attorney, or in any other capacity, temporary or permanent, with a racing wire service or any similar activity should hold a political post of any party.

But I do not want to take the valuable time of the Senate, particularly today when it is debating this very important anti-Communist legislation, and so I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the text of a supplementary statement which I have prepared.

There being no objection, Mr. WILEY's statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILEY SAYS SHENKER RESIGNATION "DOES NOT CLOSE BOOK ON THIS DISGRACEFUL EPISODE"; EXPRESSES REGRET CRIME COMMITTEE WILL NOT PROBE

The latest news reports that Morris Shenker, St. Louis attorney, is resigning from the Democratic Finance Committee because of an allegedly crowded legal schedule. This sudden turn of events is another one of those "coincidences" that seem to dog the Democratic Party. Whatever the real reason (which it will never admit) the Democratic Party may feel assured that this will not close the book on this disgraceful episode. The minds of the American people cannot so easily forget nor forgive this outrageous appointment.

The Democratic bosses of Kansas City and Washington consistently underestimate the intelligence, memory, and decency of the American people.

KEFAUVER WAS RIGHT IN URGING RESIGNATION

I am sure that the American people read with deep interest and support the previous statement of the distinguished chairman of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee, the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] to the effect that Shenker should resign from the appointment. From the very moment the news of the appointment came out, there was a feeling along all segments of American society, regardless of political party, that it was a brazen act to appoint any individual remotely connected even in the slightest way with the forces of interstate gambling.

KEFAUVER WAS WRONG IN REJECTING PROBE OF SHENKER

I am indeed sorry, however, that Chairman KEFAUVER did not feel that this shocking episode merited an investigation by the Crime Committee. Apparently it is all right to investigate the racing wire service, but it is not all right to investigate individuals legally associated with the service, who have high-up political connections. To my mind, high-up political connections are the most sinister aspect of the whole situation.

Chairman KEFAUVER felt that the situation apparently was foul and malodorous, but not foul enough for the Crime Committee to investigate. I am sorry, but I disagree with him completely.

With regard to Shenker's telegram, I may say that as former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, as an attorney for over 30 years and as a former district attorney, I naturally respect the rights of American attorneys. I respect the privacy of attorney-client relationships. But at the same time, I am sworn to protect and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States, and I do not believe that any individual could remain silent or inactive in the face of this terrible situation.

SHENKER'S PIOUS PLEADINGS DO NOT EXCUSE SITUATION

Yes, it is the right of an American attorney to defend whomever he pleases. Yes, it is quite obvious that there must be individuals to defend persons accused of crime, and in legal history some of the finest attorneys in America have indeed represented such individuals. However, I do not believe that it is the right of any attorney to wrap about himself the flag and the Constitution and piously plead that he has the right to simultaneously represent racing interests and also serve on a political committee.

Let us discuss, however, the principle involved; not personalities or individuals. I am speaking for the principle of clean government and clean politics. I don't want civic students in American schools to read that the way to become a member of a party finance committee is to represent gambling interests.

RACING WIRE HISTORY IS LONG BLOOD BATH

The able chairman of the Crime Committee has often stated that the racing wire service is a key to interstate gambling. Illegal horse betting approaches a total often estimated as high as five to eight billion dollars a year. The whole history of the racing wire service from the days of James Regan, before and after, is a story of blood baths, killings, corruption, extortions, beatings, and every other sort of foul play. The racing wire service is right now being investigated by the Senate Crime Committee. Shortly the committee will leave for open hearings in Kansas City and St. Louis to explore it further. How, then, could any American condone, forget, or forgive the apointment of an individual who represents one section of the racing wire service—Pioneer News Service of St. Louis.

THIS REPRESENTS PENDERGAST PATTERN

There are larger implications to this situation. The great State of Missouri is, unfortunately, the home of the vicious Pendergast philosophy. A St. Louis attorney seeking parole of gangsters is entertained at the White House. Another St. Louis attorney (Shenker) receives a high political appointment. This is a part of the whole historical pattern of Pendergastism.

The most obvious fact is that the Democratic Party has, to say the least—and take the most charitable interpretation—been careless about its associations, or, at the worst, that it has intentionally adopted a policy of associating itself with individuals who do not command the respect of the average American. The same party which coddled the Pressmans, the Hisses, and other individuals with alien political associations also coddles individuals associated, albeit in an entirely legal way, with sinister subrosa interests. This is, as I said yesterday, symptomatic of a decline in moral standards, a breakdown in moral values on the part of a political party. These are not just my conclusions, but the conclusions which come from the very facts in this matter. It is evidenced by the fact that decent segments of the Democratic Party quickly rushed to get rid of this individual.

Decent Democrats like decent Republicans, have no stomach for a situation which is ripe for political favoritism to illegal interests. We all know that gambling interests have contributed fabulous sums to political campaigns in the past.

NEWS FACTS ABOUT SHENKER

Lastly, so as to keep the record straight, may I quote from a Washington Post story by Chalmers Roberts in the Sunday, September 10 issue. This story which preceded my initial statement shows the facts about Mr. Shenker—facts carried by the great news services of America:

"NAMING OF GAMBLERS' LAWYER BY DEMOCRATS STARTS TROUBLE

"The Democratic National Committee has just made itself a peck of political trouble by naming to its finance committee a St. Louis attorney who represents some of the country's biggest gambling figures.

"The man is Morris A. Shenker. He has appeared here before the Senate Crime Investigating Committee and before the Senate Commerce Committee with St. Louis betting commissioner James J. Carroll, with William P. Brown, chief owner of the Pioneer race news wire, with Brown's partner, William Molasky, who contributed $2,000 to Missouri's Governor Forrest Smith's 1948 campaign, and he has been on hand several other times as an interested spectator

"Only yesterday, the Associated Press reported he was in Jefferson City, the Missouri capital, representing four St. Louis men indicted along with Western Union officials for conspiracy to violate gambling laws in New Jersey by accepting telegraphed horse race bets. Shenker lost his effort to prevent their extradition."

Democratic Functions of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Democratic Functions of Labor," published in the Eugene (Oreg.) Register-Guard of September 4, 1950. This is a very sound account of the labor movement in the United States.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRATIC FUNCTIONS OF LABOR

More than 16,000,000 men and women today are members of labor unions in the United States. (Some claim the figure is actually more than 20,000,000 but 16,000,000 is the number which is officially accredited and accepted.) Organized labor in the United States is almost as old as the Nation itself. It is not, as many seem to believe, a relatively new and startling phenomenon. The last 20 years have merely been the years of greatest growth and power.

Associations of free workingmen have existed nearly 150 years. In the beginning they were entirely local and limited to a very few of the more skilled trades and crafts. But as early as 1827, the failure of a carpenters' strike in Philadelphia led to the formation of the Mechanics' Union of Trade Associations, and it grew to have considerable power, both economic and political in its area.

The depression of 1837 had a disastrous effect on this early movement toward broad organization. In those days, the courts in many States interpreted strikes as a form of conspiracy against property. The movement was undoubtedly retarded by the opening of new frontiers, the call of opportunities in the West. The labor movement received its greatest impulse in the period of industrial expansion which followed the Civil War.

A National Labor Union was attempted in 1866, and in 1869 came the Noble Order of the Knights of Labor (a sort of combination lodge and one big union plan). This order came to have 700,000 members by 1886, but its influence waned after the bloody Haymarket riots in Chicago during that year. The American Federation of Labor which was founded in 1881 at Pittsburgh as the Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions of the United States and Canada moved in to take its place. Sam Gompers, the cigar maker, was one of the founders. In 1885 he became president of the AFL and held that office until his death in 1924.

The great railroad brotherhoods date from this period, although most of them have remained independent on the theory that they could fight their battles alone, theirs being highly specialized trades. In our times, we have seen the development of the CIO which is based on the theory that in many industries unions must be "horizontal" or industry-wide instead of by crafts, as in AFL.

Today organized labor must be accepted as one of the most important facts of American life. After more than 100 years of continuous and sometimes bloody struggle, the right to organize and the right to bargain collectively for wages and hours and pensions and privileges has become law of the land, but we have not yet found any very efficient or orderly process for the adjustment of industrial disputes. It is a futile truism to say:

"Peace will come only when labor and management realize that their interests are essentially mutual and not antagonistic."

There are many who fear that labor will not be content with anything less than control of government and control of industry. There are some labor leaders who are obviously power mad. Such a dictatorship as that of John L. Lewis over 600,000 coal miners is not healthy, even for the labor movement. Those labor leaders who set political goals ahead of the progress and welfare of the members violate the principles set down by the statesmanlike Gompers who preached as long as he lived that labor's political power should be used only to achieve its rights, not for purely political gains.

(The troubles labor is having today with its Communist infiltrators and its crackpots are not at all new. Throughout its history, the labor movement has always been beset by schemers and theorists seeking to divert it from its major aims).

It has occurred to us on Labor Day that a review of labor history in the United States might be helpful, because to our mind this history means just one thing—organization of working men to bargain for their rights is essentially a democratic function. Labor leaders who use czaristic tactics often forget this. Those few employers who still do not recognize it as a natural and inevitable process for free men are forgetting something that is part of the inheritance of every American—his right to speak up, his right to choose his representatives, his right to claim as rights many benefits which otherwise take the character of "largesse" or a form of charity.

Perhaps the greatest service the labor unions have rendered this Nation is what they have achieved for the self-respect of the man who works for wages. Union members owe it to themselves and to the Nation to keep their unions truly democratic. In spite of any faults which may be in unions the rest of us owe it to ourselves and to the Nation to understand their essential meaning to the 16,000,000 Americans who use this means of expressing and asserting their rights.

The Sunken Battleship "Arizona"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article that appeared in a recent edition of the Denver Kiwanian.

It is an interesting report by a member of the Denver Kiwanis Club who had visited in Honolulu and was impressed with the sight of the partly sunken battleship Arizona in Pearl Harbor.

I feel certain Members of Congress will be interested in knowing that through the efforts of this visitor the flag again flies daily over the Arizona as a permanent memorial to the 1,032 American boys whose bodies remain buried in the sunken hulk of the battleship.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMEMBER THE "MAINE", FORGET THE "ARIZONA"—UNITED STATES SLEEPS

On February 17, 1950, Denver Kiwanian Bill Wafer went on a sight-seeing cruise of Pearl Harbor. The sunken battleship Arizona, the unmarked tomb of 1,092 American boys, was pointed out to him, and from then until the day he left Hawaii, February 25, he worked, cajoled, and threatened in his efforts to remove the stigma of the unmarked tomb. He went to the Governor, the Army, the Navy, and the Air Corps, and he was met with: "* * * it is forbidden to fly the American Flag over a sunken battleship." So he went to that citadel of builders—his Kiwanis Club in Honolulu—and said, "There is a monument in Havana, a memorial for the boys on the battleship Maine * * * across the road from the Maine monument stands a tribute honoring four Cuban boys killed in Spain. This is a life-size memorial done in marble at a cost of one-half million dollars—to mention but two of many throughout the world. I know my Kiwanis club in Denver will help me, and I want your help to get a memorial for these lads of the Arizona." Bill stayed after the meeting, and two members of the club were selected to call on the Navy the following day.

On March 7, 1950, just 17 days after Bill began his fighting campaign for a memorial—the flag flew again over the sunken U. S. S. Arizona. Here are excerpts from an article that appeared in one of Honolulu's newspapers that day:

"The American flag for which they died flies again over 1,092 U. S. S. Arizona crewmen, trapped in the seared and mortally wounded battleship in the opening hour of World War II * * *.

"Yesterday was the first time a flag has flown over the Arizona since 9 a. m. of that day of infamy when she crumpled and sank in the shallow water off Ford Island. That was just 8 years and 4 months ago yesterday * * * Only the barettes which seated her gun turrets and the rust-ruined superstructure protrude today from the water tomb of the battleship.

"Underneath the shredded deck lie the remains of 1,092 Navy men who never really knew why they died. It was in their memory that the 20-by-30-foot flag was hoisted yesterday atop a 50-foot silver flagpole, welded to the armored trunk of the midship superstructure.

"The sun shone brightly, the sky was clear, and the waves lapped easily during the 4-minute ceremony attended by Governor Stainback, Hawaii's Navy and Marine chiefs, and a handful of newsmen.

"A color guard of marines in dress blues and sailors in neatly-pressed whites came to attention as Admiral Arthur W. Radford, Pacific Fleet commander, stepped aboard the orange-stained hulk.

"He spoke just 32 words: 'We are here this morning,' he said, 'to do honor to the Arizona and her splendid crew, so many of whom are still with their ship.

"'From today on, the Arizona will again fly our country's flag just as proudly as she did on the morning of December 7, 1941. I am sure the Arizona's crew will know and appreciate what we are doing.'

"Capt. E. B. Harp, the Pacific Fleet chaplain, then offered a short prayer. 'May our efforts,' he asked, 'now be viewed as a solemn covenant with our fallen comrades—a covenant to complete the tasks which will help shape a better world for tomorrow.' He prayed that 'the flag we are about to raise will ever stand as a symbol of our devotion to those virtues which have made our Nation great.'

"The ceremony was over. The Governor and 10 white-clad admirals left the Arizona.

"From today on, a color guard will go out by boat each morning and at sundown to raise and lower the flag over the permanent tomb of one-third of all Pearl Harbor Day victims."

At our Wednesday's meeting, as part of our Armed Services Day observance, past president Col. Floyd Pool recounted these facts to us while Bill Wafer sat in humble silence at our head table. As Floyd finished, every man in the room was on his feet and the burst of applause told Bill how we felt. What did Bill do? In a voice which he couldn't quite keep steady he said, "Will you all stand a bit in silent prayer for those kids, and when you're praying say, 'Kids, on this day we'll remember you from now on.'" And as we sat down there wasn't a dry eye in the room!

Tuesday, September 12 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "How the Public Was Deluded," by Editorial Research Reports, published in the Portland Oregonian of August 13, 1950.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW THE PUBLIC WAS DELUDED

(By Editorial Research Reports)
